Over half of the Members of this body have served their country on foreign soil, during the two World Wars and the Korean war. It was but a few months ago that the last veteran of the Spanish-American War to serve in Congress departed from this Chamber. It is true that there was opposition to our entry into those conflicts, but it was, for the most part, expressed before we went to war. Once the decision was made to fight, the American people closed ranks and everyone did his or her bit.

Although World War II created deep divisions between interventionists and noninterventionists, the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor unified the Nation and the challenge from the National Socialists of Germany and the Fascists of Italy was accepted. Millions, including many of those who had bitterly opposed our involvement in the affairs of the Old World, donned uniforms, while others accepted food rationing, travel restrictions, and other curtailments of their normal routines, most of which were slight inconveniences compared to the sacrifices made by those who fought on fronts all over the globe. Even those who refused to salute the flag took jobs in the war plants and the accompanying time-and-a-half for overtime.

During World War II, the American people had no patience with demonstrators, draft obstructors, purveyors of enemy lies, and flag-burners. No correspondents of metropolitan newspapers journeyed to Berlin to interview Adolf Hitler.

Much has been made of the fact that the war in Vietnam is an undeclared one. The same was true of the war in Korea, but once the people of the United States accepted the fact that we were engaged in hostilities, they looked forward to victory over our enemies. Congress backed the President by providing the men, the materials, and the money.

While Congress did not declare war against North Vietnam, it did, on August 7, 1964, overwhelmingly approve the Gulf of Tonkin resolution, which gave the President power to "take all necessary measures to repel any armed attack against the forces of the United States and to prevent further aggression." The vote in this body was unanimous, 416 to 0. In the other body the vote was 88 to 2.

Since then, the body representing the people and the body representing the States have both voted for whatever authorizations and appropriations have been deemed necessary for the proper support of our fighting men. These sums have been huge, Mr. Chairman, and the advocates of more and greater spending are licking their chops in anticipation of the day when these billions will become available for their pet programs.

Mr. Chairman, I too, am looking forward to the day when the money of our taxpayers can be spent on domestic programs or, better yet, left in the States and cities so that the local governments can solve their own problems with their own money, or, even better yet, left in the hands of the taxpayers who are, after all, more capable of spending their own money than the bureaucracy in faraway Washington. That is one of the reasons I sponsored the resolution we are now considering. The main reason I sponsored it, however, is that I want to strengthen the hands of the President as he endeavors to bring about a just peace in Vietnam so that our young men can return home.

We can best bring about an honorable peace, not through marches on the Nation's Capital, not through demonstrations against lawfully constituted authority, and not through obstruction of the war effort, but through the use of the proper political and diplomatic agencies. Let us listen, for a change, to the voice of the majority, the overwhelming majority which would like to exercise its right of assent. I believe it is for this overwhelming majority that the President spoke on November 3.

There is room in our country for honest dissent, but there is no room in America for sedition, treason, and anarchy. There is no room in America for the overeducated fool in the classroom who would welcome a victory by our enemies. There is no room in America for the wolf in sheep's clothing who dishonors the pulpit by slandering our fighting men. There is no room in America for the politician who weeps bitter tears for those who would destroy us.

"Who lets his country die lets all things die, and all things dying curse him.

"Who lets his country live lets all things live, and all things living bless him."

Mr. Chairman, let us adopt the resolution before us, unanimously if we can, but, if we cannot adopt it unanimously, let us at least stand up and be counted!

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in strong support of the House resolution supporting the President's valiant efforts to achieve a just peace in Vietnam.

As members of the committee know, I was one of the original sponsors of this resolution—a bipartisan resolution that in my strong opinion represents the views of the great majority of the American public. This resolution was developed by a bipartisan group of concerned Americans in the House. Contrary to certain allegations, it was not developed as a result of White House participation or pressure.

I am proud that over 300 Members of the House have joined in sponsoring this resolution, the language of which should appeal to all who want peace with justice in Vietnam. This resolution calls for a peace that will enable the people of South Vietnam to choose their own Government by means of free elections open to all South Vietnamese and supervised by an impartial international body, a peace that will discourage so-called wars of liberation by the Communists so that the sons and younger brothers of those fighting in Vietnam will not 2, 3, or 4 years from now be called upon to fight against aggression in another "Vietnam" closer to home.

War is hell, as those of us know who have served in the Armed Forces during a time of armed conflict. It brings devastation to the cities and the countryside, civilians suffer and are victims of the tragedies of war, as has happened in all wars—World War I, World War II, and Korea. So, like other Members of the House, I hate war and I long for peace—a real peace. Let us not forget that there can be a real peace in Vietnam the minute the Communists decide to stop their aggression against the people of South Vietnam. There can be a real peace when the Soviet Union and Communist China decide to stop supplying arms and supplies to North Vietnam.

Yet, despite President Nixon's many concessions and his efforts to negotiate a just peace, we have had no meaningful response from Hanoi. Instead, from all too many sources here in our own country, we have had a call for more initiatives by the President—meaning more concessions to the Communists. Why should Hanoi negotiate if prominent people in our own country say we should make all the concessions? Why should Moscow put pressure on Hanoi to negotiate if they are told by a militant minority that if they just wait a little longer the American people will undercut their own President's efforts for peace?

This resolution, sponsored by an overwhelming majority of the House, makes clear to all the world that our great Nation does in fact support the President's efforts to obtain a just peace in Vietnam. The House, through its action today, should send the message loud and clear to Hanoi and Moscow that the time has come for a positive response to the President's efforts to negotiate a just peace—that the time has come for an end to Communist aggression and killing in Vietnam—that the time has come for a just peace. So that this message may go forth, I urge my colleagues to support the resolution when it comes to a vote.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAIR. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Chairman, I commend the gentleman for his work and for the contribution he has made toward an understanding by the Congress and the White House in this matter.

I would like to read three sentences to the gentleman from the debate on the Gulf of Tonkin resolution.

Those three sentences are simply this:

> Mr. Speaker, this resolution neither gives nor takes from the President any authority already delegated to him to act in an emergency or crisis.
> Neither is it to declare war and it is in the nature of an after-the-fact sense resolution endorsing an action already taken by the President.

That statement was made by the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. GROSS) during the Gulf of Tonkin debate.

I know what the words of this resolution are saying with the exception of one ambiguous phrase, "just peace." I would like to ask the gentleman in the well to make a specific definition of the term just peace, and further to assure the House that the words of the resolution mean no more than what they say, and that we will not have to look back 5 or 4 years from now, or less, and find out that a statement that this resolution does not authorize the escalation of the war proved not to be true; or that sometime this President or some other President in the future might use it as authority to escalate the war.

Mr. ADAIR. With respect to the gentleman's question as to what just peace might mean, of course, one cannot deal in specifics because one does not know what the circumstances will be at the time peace is reached. But certainly the term "just peace" and that also is very difficult to define in specific terms, gives us a clue that it must be a peace which is equitable to all of the parties involved. That must be a matter of judgment by the President and those negotiating the peace at that time.

With reference to the other question that the gentleman raised, the debate that took place at the time of the so-called Gulf of Tonkin resolution—in reviewing that recently, I find that there was at that time some concern expressed as to the exact meaning of that resolution. But it seems to me we are moving really, or attempting to move, at least in the case of this resolution, in diametrically opposite directions.

In that case we were saying, rather bluntly, that we were supporting the President in the efforts that he took to protect our naval vessels in the Gulf of Tonkin.

In this case we are saying in my opinion, that we are giving support to the President in his efforts to secure peace.

So to my mind, I would say to my friend, the gentleman from Indiana, that these resolutions move in opposite directions.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAIR. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JACOBS. Is it the gentleman's opinion that this resolution does not even deal with the question, let alone authorize the stationing of U.S. Armed Forces in South Vietnam until one of two events should occur?

First. The ability of the South Vietnamese regime, militarily, to be victorious in the South; or Second. The implementation of internationally supervised free elections for all parties in South Vietnam to participate in?

Does the resolution authorize the stationing of U.S. Armed Forces in Vietnam until one of those two events occurs?

Mr. ADAIR. The resolution does not deal with that subject at all. The matter of stationing Armed Forces, as has been pointed out by previous speakers, the whole idea of many of the cosponsors, possibly all of them, is that we can continue to reduce the number of American troops there. But the resolution is silent upon that point.

Mr. WAGGONNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAIR. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. WAGGONNER. The gentleman from Indiana (Mr. JACOBS) has asked for someone to tell him what a just peace is, or what sort of peace we envision to be just as we consider this resolution. I think we can take the President's own words and answer the question in a very satisfactory way. Certainly it satisfies me. On November 3, when the President addressed the Nation, he said:

> A nation cannot remain great if it betrays its Allies and lets down its friends. Our defeat and humiliation in South Vietnam without question would promote recklessness in the councils of those great powers who have not yet abandoned their goals of world conquest. It would not bring peace. It would bring more war.

I want, and I believe the President was saying that he wants a peace in which the United States will not betray our allies or let down our friends. I think the President was saying that a just peace could not come if we, the United States, were defeated and humiliated in South Vietnam. I think the President was saying a just peace was one which would not promote recklessness in the councils of those great powers that still look for conquest and have their goal of world conquest ever before them. And I think the President was saying a just peace was one which would truly bring peace and not more war.

To me that is a satisfactory explanation by the President himself of a just peace, and to me it is a sensible way out.

Mr. ADAIR. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAIR. I yield now to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope we do not forget that this is only a House resolution. It does not, and it cannot, give the President any power or authority, nor does it make any commitments. It does not have the force of law, as would a joint resolution. It requires neither the approval of the Senate nor the signature of the President. This, however, does not detract from its timely nature and major importance, because here, in 170 words, in one sentence, it affirms the support of the House of Representatives at a most critical period in the President's efforts to negotiate a just peace in South Vietnam.

Mr. ADAIR. The chairman of the committee certainly states the issue accurately.

Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAIR. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WOLFF. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

After listening to the definition of a just peace stated by the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. WAGGONNER), I am still somewhat confused. I wonder if the gentleman from Louisiana would say, after spending 40,000 lives and $100 billion, a just peace would be the result if the elections that are called for here brought about a takeover by the Communists in South Vietnam.

Mr. WAGGONNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAIR. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. WAGGONNER. Is the gentleman asking me that if the Communists took over South Vietnam that there would be a just peace?

Mr. WOLFF. Yes; that is, if the people held a free election and the Communists were victorious and took over South Vietnam, would we then have what we have been fighting for?

Mr. WAGGONNER. It seems to me the gentleman is asking a question about something that might happen after we get a just peace.

Mr. WOLFF. In the resolution we call for free elections and say that we will abide by the results of the elections. The resolution specifically states that the United States is willing to abide by the results of such elections.

Mr. WAGGONNER. Would you have us do otherwise?

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAIR. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. That is what the resolution says. If free elections indicated that the majority of the people of South Vietnam wanted a Communist government, we would abide by the decision, according to the terms of the resolution. I do not think that would be the outcome. One of the opponents of this resolution in a private conversation said he would not be for free elections because the Vietcong could not win them. Now, if you want us to stand up here and say we are going to rig an election so the Communists win, not at all.

The resolution is not ambiguous. It is as clear as a bell. We want free, supervised elections, not supervised by them, not supervised by us, and we will abide by the results. How much clearer could I make it?

Mr. WOLFF. We have been fighting there to prevent the intrusion of communism into the South.

I am just wondering whether or not we would, as the resolution says, consider that this is the just peace that we have been fighting for.

Mr. HAYS. If the people vote for that, we would; but don't worry, that would be like the Austrians, with about 5 percent voting for the Communists and the other 95 percent voting against them.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from California (Mr. WALDIE).

Mr. WALDIE. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding. I was going to ask the same question that was just answered by the gentleman from Ohio, and I presume the gentleman from Indiana would give the same answer, as an author of the resolution.

Mr. ADAIR. I do subscribe to that.

Mr. WALDIE. That if the Communist government is elected, this House will go on record as supporting that?

Mr. ADAIR. I want to make it clear that I do not think for an instant there is a probability of that, but if the people vote for that, we have said we would acquiesce.

Mr. WALDIE. But regardless of the unlikelihood of that occurrence, if that does occur, it is the sentiment of this House with the passage of this resolution that it is an acceptable resolution of the problem in South Vietnam.

Mr. ADAIR. We have said we would abide by the result of an election.

Mr. WALDIE. May I ask the gentleman a further question?

Just last week the South Vietnamese Government imprisoned a number of South Vietnamese because they have been collaborating with the Communists. Do I gather that those people who have been imprisoned by the present Government of South Vietnam for collaborating with the Communists will be permitted to vote in the elections that are proposed by this resolution?

Mr. ADAIR. That is a matter on which I would not want to comment. The qualifications of voters of any country ought to be determined by that country; we ought not to impose our determination of voter qualifications on others.

Mr. WALDIE. That is the core of this resolution. If I understand the wording of the resolution, and the discussion by a previous speaker who was quoting President Thieu, the NLF would be permitted to participate in those elections.

Those are people who are fighting for the Communists, with guns, shooting American men, and they would be permitted to vote in the elections under this resolution. Surely if they are permitted to vote in the elections called for in this resolution, that would mean that dedicated Communists shooting at American men—but not those who are in prison for collaborating with the Communists—would be permitted to participate.

Mr. ADAIR. We may assume that they are imprisoned for sufficient reasons, but in my opinion we cannot, at this distance, be sure about the validity of those reasons. I would be reluctant to impose my judgment upon the Government there.

Mr. WALDIE. May I address this question then to whomever will answer it?

Will the present NLF, who are at present Communists shooting at American men, be permitted to vote in the elections called for in this resolution?

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, If the gentleman will yield, it would be my assumption that if the ground rules were set up by an impartial neutral group, they would make this decision, and any citizen of South Vietnam who was not in jail would be allowed to vote regardless of whom he shot at or did not shoot at. But I do not want to split hairs about a half dozen people who are in jail, because nobody in the penitentiaries in this country gets to vote in elections in this country.

Mr. WALDIE. But the NLF are Communists shooting at American soldiers, and they will be permitted to vote in the election to determine who will run the country.

Mr. HAYS. Any citizen of South Vietnam, as I read the resolution, under the rules laid down by a neutral would be permitted to vote. We let Communists vote in this country, God only knows, and I do not know why we should not let them vote over there.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAIR. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I think it may have been largely missed by some of those who read the news, that President Thieu himself has declared a willingness to permit any of those members of the NLF, including those who have made war against the government of Saigon, to vote so long as those people agree to abide by the results of the elections in a peaceful way and renounce terror.

It seems to me any government would make that demand.

I am not in a position nor am I sure is the gentleman from Ohio or the gentleman from Indiana, both sponsors of the resolution, to dictate all the precise terms. I think we have said in the resolution what we believe in the House. I do not think any purpose is to be served by our anticipating all sorts of minutiae. However, I do believe that the principle involved of amnesty and of permission to all citizens of South Vietnam—and that by definition includes the Communists who may be citizens—to participate in free elections supervised by an impartial international agency is adequate.

I believe that is sufficient. I believe that is clear. I believe that is fair. I do not see how the gentleman could find fault with it.

Mr. WALDIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ADAIR. I am sorry, but I have consumed a considerable amount of time and I must conclude.

The House through its action on this resolution should send the message loud and clear to Hanoi and to Moscow that the time has come for a positive response to the President's efforts to negotiate a just peace, that the time has come for an end to Communist aggression and killing in Vietnam. So that this message may go forth, I urge my colleagues to support the resolution when it comes to a vote.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. ROSENTHAL).

Mr. ROSENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, this is not a stellar day in the history of the House of Representatives.

The distinguished gentleman from Indiana (Mr. ADAIR) said just moments ago that there should be a loud and clear signal from the House of Representatives to peoples around the world that we are united in our support of the President. At this very moment there are about 15 Members of his President's party on the floor listening to this exciting, scintillating debate. There are about 20 or 25 Members of my party on the floor. About 10 percent of the membership of the House of Representatives is listening to and participating in this debate at this moment. This debate will, I expect, culminate in the passage of a resolution, of which no one knows the meaning, and which shall become some kind of a distorted signal around the world that some 350 Members have varying views on a resolution but were perfectly willing to pass it.

During the debate on the rule the minority leader and others suggested that we passed other kinds of resolutions; unilaterally, unknowingly, with no hearings, no debate, by unanimous consent, or by any other kinds of quick action.

This will become known, I suspect, in history as the quick passage resolution. It has 4 hours of debate under a closed rule. And its consideration follows a period of careful preparation by the administration which I must cite.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Iowa rise?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York makes a good suggestion. I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently a quorum is not present. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. ALBERT) having assumed the chair, Mr. FLYNT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration House Resolution 613, and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called, when 311 Members responded to their names, a quorum, and he submitted herewith the names of the absentees to be spread upon the Journal.

The Committee resumed its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee rose, the gentleman from New York had consumed 1 minute of the 5 minutes yielded to him. The gentleman from New York has 4 minutes remaining.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. ROSENTHAL).

Mr. ROSENTHAL. Mr. Chairman, at the time the quorum call proceedings commenced, I noted that on this very urgent and important resolution we had only about 15 members of the President's own party on the floor. I believe, now that time has passed and we have had the benefit of a quorum call, we have about 18 or 19.

I want to review what has happened since November 3 so that we can judge better the meaning of today's debate.

Mr. Chairman, we have witnessed in the 4 weeks since the President's Vietnam speech, an amazing public relations barrage against the opponents of the war. I sometimes think back, with nostalgia, to those days not so long ago, when we were hardly noticed.

After the President spoke to the Nation on every major radio and television network, and with words reported in every major newspaper, the Vice President proceeded to attack these mass media for not supporting the President's plan thoroughly enough.

Then the Justice Department began and executed a systematic attack against those who long before had planned a peaceful demonstration against the war in Washington. Then the Postmaster General used all the prestige of his office to speak out on the war's opponents and their divisive role in America. Next came the Secretary of Transportation, who suggested Communist influence in the planning of the November 15 peace demonstrations.

Today, Members of the House of Representatives find quotations from the North Vietnamese delegation in Paris on their desks, circulated by one of the originators of the resolution we consider today. The quotations show that American opponents of the war—including Members of Congress—"are used to embarrass and harass our U.S. negotiators and to delay progress toward a settlement."

Presumably the answer to this situation is for everyone in Congress to say the same thing about Vietnam. Presumably the thing to be said is that we all support the President.

This concerted and direct attack against the war's opponents and—since the President is increasingly willing to accept the war as his own—against the President's war policy is a most serious development. In its attempt to quiet opposition to the war both on the streets and within the legislative branch, this policy is subversive of the process of democratic government. It attempts to equate quiescence with approval, and silence with harmony.

There is neither approval nor harmony within the country for our present role in Vietnam. And nothing could be more myopic than seeking unanimity where none exists, or should exist.

The President has asked the country—including Congress—to come along with him on Vietnam. If everything works out, he tells us, this is what will happen:

At some unspecified time in the future, American forces will leave Vietnam;

By the time our forces leave Vietnam, the South Vietnamese will be in full charge of their war effort, at least as far as manpower is concerned;

These events—departure of American troops and their replacement by South Vietnamese soldiers—will convince the Vietcong and their North Vietnamese allies that war does not pay and that elections and other democratic approaches to government should be pursued.

To implement this plan, the President tells us, we should start withdrawing our troops—the process being already underway—on a schedule which will depend on:

Progress in the Paris negotiations;

The level of enemy activity;

Progress of the South Vietnamese training program.

Two of these factors depend on actions of the Vietcong and the North Vietnamese. The third depends on the South Vietnamese. Collectively, these conditions make American policy a prisoner of Vietnamese events indefinitely.

In all military history, I can find no parallel for the President's prescription. Having announced a policy of withdrawal—which is fully justified—the President seeks to control that withdrawal to gain goals which arms could not deliver. What motivation have either the North or South Vietnamese for fulfilling the conditions imposed?

The North Vietnamese know, as every American knows, that this country is fed up to here, as the President might say, with this war. The South Vietnamese Government, propped up by our involvement, has even less incentive to seek an early departure of American troops.

These obvious shortcomings should provoke a vigorous and spirited debate throughout this land. The President, if he is to succeed in his role as a democratic leader, must initiate a thoughtful and constructive debate on Vietnam from which we could all emerge stronger and wiser. But instead his prescription suggests, and precedes, an authoritarian defense of policy which would be distasteful even if we had not already endured nearly 4 years of a similar approach under his predecessor.

If the President on November 3 had frankly and fully discussed our initial involvement in Vietnam, the country might be better prepared for a sensible prescription: Withdrawal of all American forces on a fixed and orderly schedule which is dependent on neither North nor South Vietnamese cooperation. But the President started his story in the middle so that no explanation and no policy based on such explanation, could make sense.

By starting modern Vietnamese history in 1954 with our first economic and military aid, the President ignored the war for independence which the Vietnamese had fought against the French from 1945. That war ended in military victory for the rebels and with the Geneva accord which called for a single country under one government chosen by election. The United States rejected that decision and instead sided with a South Vietnamese government which was the predecessor of the Thieu-Ky government which rules today.

We attempted to step in where the French had failed. It is of greatest regret that we sided with a government under conditions which make our present call for elections and self-determination seem hollow. We pursued this very serious error by supporting a separate South Vietnamese Government and by committing an increasing number of American advisers, troops, and resources.

Our total investment in Vietnam, as we end this decade, is over 45,000 American dead, several hundred thousand other casualties, and well over $100 billion in direct war costs. The damage to our true priorities at home and to our prestige abroad is beyond calculation.

Mr. Chairman, the President needs the guidance and interest of the Congress in what is now our established policy of withdrawal from Vietnam. But there is no way that the President or the legislative branch can make good what is not good. There is no way to make withdrawal seem like a victory.

But there is much merit in an honest analysis of our role in Vietnam so that we can prevent another misguided involvement. The best we in Congress can do toward this analysis is to contribute our political and moral sensibilities to understand both how we arrived in Vietnam and how we can leave most honorably. But we cannot either understand or leave until we admit we erred and until we recognize that no series of Presidential speeches and no number of supporting statements from the Cabinet or from colleagues here can remake history.

And no orchestrated support for the President's policy and no lock-step unity can end the need for constructive debate—on the Vietnam tragedy.

This is indeed a momentous occasion, and one during which I believe every Member of Congress in one way or another should show his view for the administration policy. Naturally, with the constitutional prerogatives we have, each Member shows his own feelings either by his vote or by participation in the debate.

Mr. WAGGONNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a comment?

Mr. ROSENTHAL. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. WAGGONNER. I believe it would be safe to assume that when the voting time comes the Members will be here and will speak loud enough for everybody to hear.

Mr. ROSENTHAL. That is precisely the point I want to make. Indeed they will vote.

They will vote without any hearings by the Foreign Affairs Committee.

They will vote without any opinions by the Secretary of State or any learned outside participants.

They will vote without hearing 90 percent of the debate in which the discussion of this was had.

The point I want to make, Mr. Chairman, is this: Some 300 plus Members of this House will vote for this resolution. I would suspect that if one asked each of them individually—without consultation with their colleagues—to please tell what this resolution means, one would get approximately 299 differences.

We might get three or four in agreement, those of the people who helped draft this resolution with the assistance of the White House.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a correction?

Mr. ROSENTHAL. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WRIGHT. The resolution was not drafted with the assistance of the White House.

Mr. ROSENTHAL. Was the White House consulted at any time in these proceedings?

Mr. WRIGHT. In answer to the gentleman, the White House was not consulted except that a copy of the resolution was sent to the White House after it was drafted. The White House made no request for any changes. Not one word in this resolution was suggested by any person at the White House initiative.

Does not the gentleman feel that the Members of this House, after all these many months of agonizing debate and consideration, pretty well know how they feel about this? Does the gentleman feel the Members of the House need any outside help?

Mr. ROSENTHAL. I decline to yield further.

The Members know how they will vote because either of personal convictions or political commitment or deep regard for the future of this country.

The point I want to make is this on this resolution: There will be 300 different interpretations as to what this resolution means. It seems to me the wording of the resolution in and of itself is not particularly offensive. It became offensive to me when it was tied in explicitly to support the President's speech, with which I have considerable differences.

If this were an expression of the House of Representatives after a prolonged discussion and debate in which each Member could satisfy his conscience that he had heard all the experts on the subject, that he had listened to the evidence, that he had weighed the arguments, I would be perfectly satisfied. Then this would be a proper memento in the history of the House of Representatives.

It seems to me a sacrilegious effort for us to vote on a resolution on which no two Members here tonight can tell us what it means. It seems to me beneath the dignity of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Does the gentleman mean to imply 318 Members who have introduced and who have cosponsored this resolution now under consideration do not know what they introduced? I think that the gentleman is blind to something and certainly questions the integrity and the intelligence of the membership.

Mr. ROSENTHAL. I want to say that our committee, which has had no action for 5 years on the question of American policy in Southeast Asia, really renders no service to the House if they do not present to the membership some relevant comment, some expert views and the dignity of full and measured consideration of a matter so important to both the country and to our role in the world.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

(Messrs. WOLD, BROTZMAN, DON H. CLAUSEN, CLEVELAND, and Mrs. MAY (at the request of Mr. ADAIR) were granted permission to extend their remarks as this point in the RECORD.)

Mr. WOLD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of House Resolution 613 because I feel the time is long past for the Congress to follow the lead of the Nation in supporting the President's policy in Vietnam.

We have heard compelling statements from every side—hawk and dove, moderate and radical—of the imperative need to end the war in Vietnam on an honorable basis as quickly as possible. What constitutes an honorable basis is argued but I believe the President's policies offer the best solution to the hope of a quick end to the death and bloodshed of Vietnam.

In my opinion, the dissenters, well-intentioned or not, only prolong the agony and frustration of Vietnam. Just how painful is the war is only now beginning to sink into the American consciousness. And whatever the final outcome of the Mylai investigation, it can only focus more sharply the Nation's consciousness of that war.

This then is the reason why it is imperative that the House give as great an expression of support as possible to the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam.

In his speech last month, the President outlined what steps he has taken to end the war. It is self-evident that the United States has bent every effort to come to an agreement with Hanoi for an end to the War.

There are many reasons for the intransigence of Hanoi but one of the most clear and compelling reasons for their unwillingness to negotiate is their belief that the United States is divided and that they can have victory simply by waiting for it to be handed them by a loud minority of Americans.

Swift and overwhelming passage of this resolution will make clear to Hanoi and to the world that our desire to end the war on a quick and honorable basis crosses party lines and geographic regions. If our will is clear I believe Hanoi will feel that meaningful negotiation is the only way out.

Over 300 Members of this body have cosponsored this resolution. They represent by far the vast majority of Americans. I would hope however, that this body would see fit to pass this resolution unanimously.

There could be no clearer indication of where America stands.

Mr. BROTZMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to rise in support of the peace with justice in Vietnam resolution. On November 4, 1969, I joined with a majority of the Members of the House in introducing this resolution which affirms our support for the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam.

The President's November 3 message on Vietnam was a candid, forthright statement to the American people on the situation in Southeast Asia. He stated the extent of our efforts to secure peace, and the cruel result which could be expected from a precipitate withdrawal—but he also gave us hope that there is now a plan to effect our withdrawal.

In addition to thoroughly informing the American people, the President had a special message for Hanoi, and I think that message was clear: the United States will continue to withdraw its troops as long as the tempo of the war continues to decline. This is the heart of the grid plan, which I have advocated since 1967, and which I am convinced will work if given sufficient public support.

If we are to expect Hanoi to take the President's message to heart; if we are to convince Hanoi that the best hope for peace lies in negotiation and not anticipation of a precipitate American withdrawal, I think it is important that we make clear our resolve to support the President in his efforts to secure peace with justice.

Mr. Chairman, this resolution is directed toward peace; it does nothing to broaden the warmaking powers of the President; and it could in no way be considered as another Gulf of Tonkin resolution. Cynics may claim that this resolution will do nothing toward securing peace in Vietnam, however it seems to me that the overwhelming passage of this resolution can help move the Paris negotiations off dead center.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Mr. Chairman, as one of the original sponsors of the resolution expressing our support of the President's efforts to achieve peace with justice in Vietnam. I paid tribute—pages 34082–34083 of the RECORD of November 13—to the leadership of the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT) and I repeat that tribute now. In a spirit of true Americanism, wholly bipartisan, this distinguished Democrat helped initiate and lead this soon to be successful effort to support a Republican President in his efforts to end a terrible war.

His efforts underscore once more that Americans unite and band together without regard to partisan politics when the whole Nation is gravely concerned. We will continue to work together for the general good of this Nation and to support our President who is working so tirelessly in the same bipartisan way for true peace with true justice.

Mrs. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in earnest support of House Resolution 613.

There has never been any doubt in my mind that the people of the United States are unified in desiring peace in Southeast Asia. There has never been any doubt in my mind that, with the exception of what might be termed a vociferous minority, the people of the United States are unified behind the President in his efforts to bring about a just peace through negotiations at the conference table.

I am a cosponsor of this resolution, toward peace with justice in Vietnam, because this is a way in which I can stand with my colleagues to demonstrate the basic unity of purpose in the United States. I further believe that the strong approval of this resolution by the House of Representatives should prove to Hanoi's leaders that their refusal to negotiate is prolonging the war and that any further lack of positive action on their part will gain them nothing.

I am both glad and proud to stand with my colleagues today and to make this declaration: We in the United States are not divided; we are united in support of the basic position expressed by President Nixon on Vietnam. I am hopeful that Hanoi is listening.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may use to the gentleman from New York (Mr. KOCH).

Mr. KOCH. Mr. Chairman, the last resolution passed by this House concerning Vietnam was the Tonkin Gulf resolution on August 7, 1964. The vote was 416 to 0. I was not a Member of the House at that time, but if I had been so privileged, the probabilities are that I, ilke those Members then here, would have voted in favor of the resolution too. The urgings were the same—rally around the President—trust him.

Very few foresaw the extent to which that resolution would be used by the executive branch to escalate U.S. involvement in Vietnam. Surely, we can agree that the congressional intent in August of 1964 was not to involve this country in a major land war in Asia—and that in support of a corrupt, undemocratic regime, itself involved in a civil war.

Now, 5 years later—after the death of more than 40,000 American men and the expenditure of more than 100 billion tax dollars—this House has another resolution concerning Vietnam.

This resolution, like the last, is intended to support the President. This resolution, like the last, has imprecise and inoffensive language that gives it the color of bipartisan support. This resolution, like the last, is hurriedly debated. We are denied the right to change a single word or add language which would reflect what some of us believe is the desire of millions of our fellow citizens, namely the immediate termination of the bloodletting with a call for a cease-fire. And this resolution, like the last, will undoubtedly be passed by overwhelming vote.

I, too, will wholeheartedly support any action of the President to end the killing in Vietnam and to withdraw American troops. But like the President, I was elected last November to use my best efforts and office in bringing an end to the war in Vietnam. I will not abdicate my legislative responsibility and defer to the President's secret plans and timetables. When, in my judgment, his actions deserve support, I will support them unhesitatingly; however, when in that same judgment, I do not agree, I will speak out in opposition to those actions or lack of action.

Whatever opinion one has now about our involvement in Vietnam and I believe we should never have become involved in that internecine slaughter—the precedent and consequences of the Tonkin Gulf resolution obviously calls into question the wisdom of passing this resolution. The passage of this resolution will only further polarize this Nation already so divided—and does nothing to further the cause of peace. It is action on the part of the President not resolutions of endorsement by this Congress that will end the war in Vietnam or at least terminate our involvment in that war.

The constitutional obligations of this House are to the American people and on the issues of war and peace that obligation will be best fulfilled by maintaining our independence and the right and indeed the duty to constructively criticize the actions of the Chief Executive and reserve ever to ourselves to determine what funds for the prosecution of this war should or should not be appropriated. Congress would be exercising its duty most effectively if it denied the Pentagon the billions it annually requires for the continued prosecution of this war.

Hindsight is 20/20. With that hindsight now available there are, I am certain, Members of this House who, had they to do it over, would never again vote for the Tonkin Gulf resolution and view their past action now with regret. I do not intend to view with similar regret my action today and I will therefore not vote the President a blank check to be filled in as he deems fit. For these reasons, I shall cast a nay vote on this resolution.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may use to the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. TAYLOR).

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of House Resolution 613. It was my privilege to be one of the 100 original sponsors of this resolution—50 Democrats and 50 Republicans—pledging support to the President as he seeks a just and honorable peace in Vietnam.

The purpose of the resolution is to strengthen the President's hand in Paris by showing strong unified support. It should serve to escalate the peace efforts and to hasten the war's end. The fact that 318 of the Members of the House have now joined in the resolution does show strong bipartisan and unified support.

We have all been disturbed by the war in Vietnam, with its heartbreaking casualty list. The American people want peace, not surrender, not defeat, because such would lay the groundwork for further Communist aggression and perhaps world war III. They want a just peace. They want a peace that will last and that will insure that future young Americans will not be called upon to fight a strengthened international Communist army closer to our own shores. It has been my thinking down through the years that this war should be turned over to the military authorities with instructions to take such action as necessary to win, short of the use of atomic weapons.

It is apparent now that these efforts are not being made and are not going to be made. This being the case, I believe that we should support the President in his program to gradually withdraw American troops and put the South Vietnamese Army in position to defend its homeland. We have only one President at a time, and he must be our leader. I gave similar assurances of support to President Johnson.

Millions of people today are looking to America for leadership sufficient to stop communism, preserve freedom, and secure world peace.

To achieve these objectives, we must promote the strongest possible program of national defense, we must work for peace, but from a position of strength. It is the irony of our times that the preservation of peace is dependent upon the preparation of war. I believe that our safest road to peace is to become and to remain so strong militarily that the Communists will know that they will lose any war, conventional or nuclear, that they start.

During the last half century we have learned in tragic fashion that men cannot afford to fight and then forget about new challenges to peace and freedom. Freedom is never permanently secure. Each generation must make its own contribution.

Before World War II we, the nations of the free world, stood by while Italy took Ethiopia and while Hitler took Austria and Czechoslovakia and Poland. We learned that appeasement and inaction in the face of aggression leads to a world war.

It was with this lesson in mind that President Harry Truman took a firm stand in Korea and that our country has stated that the Communists of North Vietnam shall not take South Vietnam by force.

(Mr. HANNA (at the request of Mr. HAYS) was granted permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.)

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Chairman, as a prolog to my remarks I should like to proclaim clearly, sincerely, and thoroughly I am for peace and against war. By training and instinct I have always entertained an aversion to violence and I earlier concluded that war is the least intelligent form and most destructive mode of violence. I never let my honest and sincere feelings of patriotism for my country include a romantic or heroic assessment of war. My own experience as a member of an evacuation squadron operating in the Pacific undergirded by experience my original aversions. Carrying wounded marines from the beaches of invasions of the Gilbert islands, the Marshalls, Saipan, and Iwo Jima, as well as in the assaults to recapture the Philippines gave a grim and realistic reading of the toll of arms and legs and lives that some of our finest young men gave in those conflicts. Not a pretty sight and not a pleasant memory. If the question is one simply of peace as against war put me on the side of peace.

Unfortunately, as much as that may be a part of the Vietnam question for some it is not the question for this body. The complex question we must examine is what to do given the existing circumstances about our involvement in Vietnam and our presence in the Pacific. This is not a question Members of Congress can approach abstractly. It is not one we can approach disregarding harsh realities impressed by the attitudes, the actions and the aims of others.

It strikes me that given the complexity of the question, a closed rule on the subject is a cruel hoax. Remember no less than four Presidents with all the powers their office could summon have agonized over this involvement. If it was a single matter would it not now be resolved? Analysis has been done by volumes and it affords a variety of views and approaches. The President, the press, and the peace demonstrators have each managed to reduce the Vietnam issue to its simplest and most emotional components. This in turn has generated an increasing polarization.

The President is for peace but he does not intend to preside over an American defeat. President Nixon announces he has his own time schedule for withdrawal of troops and Vietnamization of the war. He refers vaguely to international "realities" reminiscent of the Dulles stance in the early 1950's.

The demonstrators take a dogmatic adversary approach. Their answer is simply to withdraw at once all troops and effect instant disengagement. The media reflecting the debate reports to the people only a narrow band of alternatives and a very sparse development of the complexities that restrict our choices and dictate the unappetizing side effects of our choice.

If our long range interests in Southeast Asia are to be served the present dangerously divisive debate must be deescalated. I cannot say that the Nixon administration has shown in the statements of the Vice President, the Attorney General, or several other assorted spokesmen any impressive ability in this direction. Where there is heat, we should provide light. Commonsense rather than complicated logic would help. Let us see if we can unwrap this involved package one layer at a time.

The Vietnam conflict can best be described as a war within a war within a war. Look at the three-leveled monster one level at a time. First, in Southeast Asia as in Europe we have had a continuing confrontation between the contesting great powers, that is, the Chinese and Soviet powers of Communist East and the American power of the Western non-Communists. This confrontation predated Vietnam and will antedate it in all probability. In Vietnam we are reliving the unhappy experience of the Spanish Civil War where the confrontation between Fascist Germany and Communist Russia intervened and intensified and magnified the brutality of what would have been an internal agony between factions of Spanish citizens.

Events as they shaped up following the disruptions of World War II and the revolutionizing drive of communism dictated our "presence" in Southeast Asia for stability and for a balance of power. This provided the confrontation stance which was an easy translation from our European postwar experience. Second, the Hanoi centered North Vietnamese following an arduous and unnatural separation affected by an internationally determined stabilizing division of the country, opted to intervene in a smaller "civil war" in the south which pitted the Vietcong against the established government in Saigon. Now not only did Hanoi get involved but it cleverly involved the Chinese and Russian super powers on the plea, I am sure, that our State Department already had its fingerprints showing in Saigon. Third, the bottom layer, of course, was the originally rather limited conflict between the two weak elements within South Vietnam. Absent the involvement of China and Russia via Hanoi and the United States via Saigon this would have been resolved long ago or would have persisted at a level and in a climate which would have interested very few outside that unhappy domain. The super powers by their involvement have brutilized and extended this little conflict to unimaginable proportions.

Our problem then is this: Our interests are at stake in the confrontation in Southeast Asia. The present and future require our presence to work out constructive involvements without a power vacuum which would invite revolutionary exploitation by remaining powers without any regard for constructive involvement—U.S. interests in a Hanoi-Saigon confrontation is questionable if we could affect a disengagement of the other super powers. This question is appropriately one for the international body that determined the division in the first place. Finally, the United States should have no interest and pursue no involvement in the civil disputes arising between factions within a given country. History provides that ironic circumstance in Spain where the Facists supported the winning faction of Franco only to see Spain join the allies against Hitler in World War II. There is no profit in projecting one's self into a family dispute. This is a truism each of us could find example for in our own experience.

Now let us examine what the President appears to be saying about unwinding this three-leveled conflict. First he made clear that he believes the total confrontation in Vietnam is very much a part of our national interest. Since he does not distinguish the three levels of our involvement one is left to conclude he believes our interests extend equally at all three levels. Second, he has assured Saigon and the Theiu government that logistical troops and military assistance will be provided over an indefinite period of time. Third, a diplomatic solution will be deemphasized because Hanoi refuses to get down to our definition of serious negotiations. Finally, a difficult to predict Vietnamization of the war. All this appears to be a solution styled in a Dulles architectural model for Korea with a resultant indefinite period for x number of American military personnel to be kept in the country.

The President's outline raises some important questions. First, what is the best projection as to the number of troops that will indefinitely be stationed in Vietnam. Korea now has 50,000 U.S. fighting men and support personnel. Second, based on our experience in Korea what is the best estimate for continuing costs for Vietnam assuming a best obtainable level of Vietnamization. Third, is our military interest just in Vietnam or does it extend to all or other mini-states of the Indochina Peninsula? Fourth, will the troops remaining in South Vietnam and South Korea require a future massive intervention if their northern neighbors choose to wind up the level of conflict once more? If not, what is our proposed response stance to be? These questions point out that the United States is running the risk of placing its policy at risk to the mini-state diplomacy of the area. They point up as well that we desperately need some clearer articulation of intentions in terms of the political and economic stability of the area to which our country and its resources are committed.

I submit that an adversary stance predicated on anticommunism will not do. This puts us in jeopardy with the follies and foibles of any regime in these countries which will bargain their questionable allegiance for our involvement in a narrow power base interest. We should be in a grander role than that of the cat who pulls the monkey's chestnuts from the fire. Our requirements for "limited support" should rest on a demonstrated ability and an active commitment to solving the problems of the country and the people. The President should reconsider an alternative he has chosen to de-emphasize. I refer to the American presence which pursues what Eugene Black has called "programed development."

We need this new and constructive thrust in our policy for Southeast Asia and our disengagement from the adversary confrontation based on anticommunism must be phased with a positive movement for competitive and cooperative development in the area. Vietnam could be a cornerstone in this thrust. Within its borders lies a large portion of the Mekong River Valley and its rich delta. An area admirably suited to a program for development and much of the preliminary work is already accomplished. This policy should rest on three principles:

First, a shift from a current policy of "crisis management" and clumsy reactions to an adversary power to a new policy of development assistance in programed projects with provable problem solving potentials.

Second, this policy should invite, encourage, and induce multi-international participation and cooperative involvement by neighboring countries.

Third, increasingly important constructive roles particularly at present for Japan and ultimately for an emerging China.

Such a new emphasis is designed to serve our long-range goals rather than to ameliorate short-term expediencies. It can be developed in the language of economics which is far better understood and is less dangerously emotional than anticommunism. Our goals in Southeast Asia should include: military disengagement from all nations but a firm military stance in our own jurisdictions in the area; reduction of tensions; increase in economic growth; political stability resting ultimately on a satisfactory performance of the government rather than its military controls; increasingly important roles for Asian powers in the area and finally the United States in the role of a partner of Pacific development not the policeman for Asian confrontation.

The President has said we are getting out of Vietnam but he has not said how much or where else we are going in our continuing presence in that area. These are the matters we should fully discuss. It is not as simple as "Peace Versus War" or "Support the President" or "Unify America." Our task is tougher. Where are we now? Where should we be? How do we get there from here? This is what the American people are literally dying to know—and we are faced with a "closed rule."

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Utah (Mr. LLOYD).

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I consider it significant and reassuring that this House, created under a Constitution which encourages freedom of expression, should openly examine its conscience in the tortuous controversy surrounding our Nation's participation in efforts to insure freedom of choice for the people of South Vietnam. Significant because at a time when that freedom of expression is being exercised in the form of widespread demonstrations of dissent against our present policy, and at a time when these demonstrations, notably the mobilization of November 15, are fresh upon the minds of Americans and also upon the minds of untold millions throughout both the free choice and one choice worlds, we deliberately openly examine, rather than suppress, the merits of that dissent; and reassuring because this congressional examination, open to all the world, is testimony to the fact that a free people develop the moral fiber and stamina to be strong enough to continue to encourage those basic conditions which make dissent possible. Also reassuring because this action is evidence that there is existing, in the United States of America, a basic moral commitment to individual freedom and to the dignity and worth of the individual human spirit which makes it right for free men to offer their lives in defense of the honest efforts of a country so committed.

The resolution before us today supports this administration's policy in Vietnam, and efforts to achieve peace. It makes no reference to the circumstances which involved us in the first place. It makes no reference to the mechanics or mathematics of withdrawal yet current history is very clear that withdrawal is our goal. That being our goal, there are today, three principal alternatives which are advanced. Most publicized leaders of the mobilization on November 15 proposed immediate withdrawal consistent with logistical practicality. Others have proposed withdrawal tied to the specifics of an advertised timetable. The President has announced reduction of troops in Vietnam accompanied by Vietnamization of the war and withdrawal accompanied by agreement by North Vietnam to agree to free elections in the South under supervision of an international body with the proviso that all parties would agree to abide by such results. This resolution endorses this alternative proposed and adopted by the President, in preference to the other two.

There is little attraction to outright and immediate withdrawal, and to that alternative we are now in December 1969, really seriously turning our attention. The main source of strength for this proposal today is the report that the brutality and bestiality of war has resulted in American servicemen being guilty of the indiscriminate killing of women and children in Mylai. At this time we do not know what all the evidence will reveal. But this I believe. War is brutal. It is bestial. It may cause the individual aberrations now charged, but it will never become our Nation's policy. With Secretary Melvin Laird, I feel shocked and sickened at the reports. But this I also believe. This Nation is committed irrevocably to peace, and in the pursuit of that commitment we must face the realities of securing that peace by refusing to surrender to an aggressor so fully committed today to the doctrine of force rather than free choice.

There is, however, an attraction to the concept of withdrawal according to a timetable. It puts South Vietnam on clear notice. It presumably allows us to shift our gears and to plan ahead on a new schedule of priorities. It is meant to clear our conscience that we are not walking out on the job without giving our partner time to try to get his affairs in order. And we would make a handsome financial concession to take the edge off our going. These are obvious and attractive pluses. But to shift to another metaphor, we would be giving the opposing side our signals, and not only our signals but our entire game plan. Under such circumstances, not only would it be virtually impossible for us to make a score, it would be some sort of a miracle if we even made a first down.

My support of the position indorsed by the President does not rely too heavily on the concept of a continuing commitment. Based simply on a contractual commitment under the SEATO language, I as one individual think it could be said now in December 1969, that we have honored that commitment and would be justified in withdrawal. For more than 5 years we have paid dearly in blood and treasure and other parties to the contract have not performed in equal measure. Who is there, including the people of South Vietnam who could say we have not met our commitment to others? But now we also have a commitment to ourselves, to our own casualties, to our own investment and to our own dedication to help to make a better world where the flames of human freedom will not be smothered by aggression.

Pertinent to our decision in Vietnam is our experience in Korea. There are those who say our efforts in Korea ended in failure. I believe those of you who have been to Korea would not agree. The Republic of Korea is a rapidly developing society of free people, a strong ally of the United States and the conditions which helped make this possible were created by the sacrifices of the people of the United States. While I do not subscribe to a step by step, premeditated and planned domino theory, it is my belief that if we submit to surrender in South Vietnam, our successes in Korea will be exposed to new and withering attack as the free people of the Republic of Korea are pressed under accelerated aggression from the North.

What would then be true in Korea would be reflected throughout Southeast Asia and throughout the world.

It is said we cannot be policeman for the world, and I agree. Yet there are countless millions of freedom-loving people who need encouragement in being their own policeman against aggression, and in an age when men walk on the moon, we cannot, as a civilized Nation, be an island unto ourselves.

This resolution calls upon Hanoi to bargain in good faith. The negotiations in Paris have been fruitless, at least according to most surface indications. There has been no encouraging bargaining. There has been only the ultimatum from Hanoi that we must first withdraw from South Vietnam and leave the people of that country without support. The President has not submitted to that ultimatum and this resolution, an indication of the will of the people of the United States, supports his resolve.

Mr. Chairman, last week from the small city of Cedar City in my Second Utah Congressional District, I received on a roll of plain butcher paper the names of more than 3,000 citizens of that community, pledging support of our President following his address of November 3. This was no door-to-door solicitation. The citizens came voluntarily to a downtown location and in 3½ days, more than 70 percent of those of high school age and older came to sign this scroll which it was my honor to present at the White House. And so in declaring today not only my own support of the President's policy in Vietnam as evidenced by the resolution before us, I am certain that from my mail, from my meetings and conversations and from the voluntary outpouring of the citizens, I also speak the will of the clear majority of the citizens of my District, in urging support of this resolution.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI).

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I rise to urge prompt and overwhelming adoption of the resolution now before the House.

As is well known, this resolution is a strong bipartisan expression of support for President Nixon's policies for ending the war in Vietnam. Policies espoused by former Presidents Eisenhower, Kennedy, and Johnson. Their efforts included frequent and repeated diplomatic initiatives to bring the Vietnam war to a just and honorable conclusion.

It numbers among its sponsors and cosponsors, both Democrat and Republicans. It was supported in the House Foreign Affairs Committee by members of both parties.

Thus, this resolution is a continuation of the tradition of bipartisanship which has guided our Nation's foreign policy since the end of World War II.

We in Congress may have vastly differing views on matters of domestic policy, but—in general—differences stop at the water's edge. In the international conduct of our foreign policy, a united front has been our strength.

In a time of war, as this time is, the need for such unity is even greater. We have seen how the enemy in Vietnam has consistently tried to exploit the internal dissents which have arisen in our country over the conduct of the conflict.

The adoption of this resolution will show Hanoi that such tactics go only so far—and no further.

The essential consensus of the American people that the war in Vietnam must be ended honorably has not been fractured. Our people stand united against suggestions to "cut and run."

This belief of the American people is given expression in the words of the resolution before the House today.

It is a statement of solidarity to the enemy in Vietnam and to the world, of solidarity behind our Chief Executive as he seeks to forge a just and lasting peace in Southeast Asia.

The resolution, when adopted, will declare to our friends and foes alike that despite internal differences, despite differing points of view on specific issues in the Vietnam conflict, despite differences in party labels, we in the House of Representatives are firmly behind the moves toward peace being undertaken by President Nixon.

Critics have attacked this resolution as giving the President "a blank check" to work his will. It does not. In fact, the resolution is specific in its intent, "that the House of Representatives affirms its support for the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam."

It declares that the people of South Vietnam are entitled to choose their own Government by means of free elections of all South Vietnamese.

Are the critics opposed to free elections?

The resolution further declares that the elections should be supervised by an impartial international body, possibly the United Nations.

Are the critics quarreling about impartial supervision of the elections?

Further, the resolution expresses the willingness of the United States to abide by the results of free and supervised elections.

Are the critics implying that the United States would not—or should not—abide by the results of free elections?

Truly, Mr. Chairman, it is difficult to know what the concern and shouting about this resolution is all about. It says what it means and means what it says.

It gives no authority to the President to escalate the conflict by reintroducing numbers of troops or by resuming the bombing of North Vietnam.

No. It specifically declares that the issues in controversy be resolved peacefully, not through continued war and bloodshed.

We are clear in our desire for a peaceful solution in Vietnam. It is the other side which requires convincing.

It is North Vietnam and its leaders who have continued to infiltrate their troops into South Vietnam;

It is North Vietnam and its leaders who have continued the terror raids on cities and civilian populations;

It is North Vietnam which refuses to discuss peace terms with the United States and our allies at the Paris conference.

We know that, in some ways at least, the masters of Hanoi are conscious of and sensitive to American public opinion. By passing this resolution today, we give them strong indication that despite the street demonstrations, despite the campus unrest, despite the antics of a few hard-core dissidents like the Weathermen and the Yippies—despite them, the American center is holding firm to a just and honorable peace in Vietnam.

That is what this resolution today represents—and no more.

I am hopeful that Hanoi, seeing the unity which will be displayed on the floor of the House of Representatives today, will review their policies of obstruction and intransigence and begin to negotiate in earnest an end to the conflict.

As a first sign of their good faith, I fervently hope that they will make a humanitarian gesture with regard to the American prisoners of war now in their possession.

As you know, Mr. Chairman, the Subcommittee on National Security Policy and Scientific Developments, of which I am chairman, recently held hearings on resolutions introduced into the House calling on the North Vietnamese and the National Liberation Front to abide by the 1949 Geneva Convention on the treatment of prisoners—a treaty which Hanoi signed in 1957.

To date, the masters of Hanoi have flouted virtually every provision of that convention. The plight of our prisoners and of their loved ones here at home is indeed a heart-rending one.

I urge my colleagues to read the hearings and report on the POW resolution. Members of Congress, representatives of the executive branch, the Red Cross, and others have contributed ample evidence of Hanoi's refusal to abide by international law regarding prisoner treatment.

I am hopeful that the resolution on prisoners of war which was reported by the subcommittee will be approved by the House Foreign Affairs Committee and will be adopted by the House before the Christmas holidays.

Today, however, I urge North Vietnam and the National Liberation Front to act now in easing the burden of the families of those American servicemen missing in action by releasing a list of those men whom they have in their possession.

This is the very least which Hanoi can do to ameliorate the suffering which the current situation is inflicting on the innocent, on the wives and children and parents who daily wait word of their loved ones.

The continuing failure of North Vietnam and the National Liberation Front to make available such a list is a reminder to all of the attitude and lack of humane outlook of the enemy.

Hanoi is determined to remain utterly hostile and obdurate on every issue in this conflict, hoping that eventually the United States will precipitiously pull out and leave the whole of the Indo-China Peninsula to the Communists.

The resolution we are considering today makes it very clear that we stand united against hasty withdrawal and for a peaceful resolution of the conflict on a just and honorable basis. The next step is up to the other side.

Some sincere action on the part of Hanoi, long overdue, can indeed lead to an end of the conflict. Such action on the part of Hanoi, I submit, will be prompted by an overwhelming vote of support for this resolution.

(Mrs. GREEN of Oregon (at the request of Mr. HAYS) was granted permission to extend her remarks at this point in the RECORD.)

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, in rising to voice my support for the resolution voicing approval by this House "for the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam," I do so after long consideration of its importance to the Nation and of its significance to me.

The circumstances are markedly changed from that day in May of 1965 when I joined with six other colleagues in voting against a supplemental appropriations bill for the military which—the White House had let it be known—was a positive vote in support and would be accepted by the then Chief Executive as an endorsement of his escalatory policy in Vietnam which was then gaining its full momentum. This was referred to as a "Little Gulf of Tonkin Resolution," if you will, for approval by this House. It seemed to me then that the intent of that bill was clearly for widening the war. It seems to me that the intent of this resolution is to be an expression for de-escalating the violence as rapidly as possible, a sentiment that I am pleased to note is gathering more momentum day by day.

Just as I could not back in May of 1965 vote in good conscience for what had been requested, I cannot today in good conscience deny my warmest support to this resolution supporting peace efforts. The fact that the White House has let it be known that this resolution has found favor with the President makes me suspicious not at all. In its straightforward language espousing peace, the fact that the President of the United States gives his endorsement demands all the more my prompt response in kind, and I am pleased to give it willingly, and wholeheartedly.

If I must go outside the simple language of the resolution and read hidden motives and intent, my reading of the signs of the times coupled with the undeniable political astuteness of President Nixon convinces me that he recognizes the absolute necessity of winding up our tragic involvement in this pitiless war as soon as possible—or face certain defeat at the polls in 1972, and again I am pleased to dispense with merely partisan concerns and give my unhesitating support to this resolution.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. HOLIFIELD).

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of House Resolution 613, which would put the House of Representatives of the United States on record as affirming "support for the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam."

This resolution points toward a goal, not toward a personality. Let us be clear about that. This is not an endorsement of one particular President's policies, or the condemnation of another's. This is a plain, simple statement of what every American wants and what must be the preeminent task of our national leadership—a just peace in Vietnam.

Let us not get tangled up in the politics of the situation. Whether you like Mr. Nixon or not, whether you support or oppose his views on health, welfare, and employment, whether you vote for or against the measures he recommends, remember he is our President. He holds the office, and he holds the responsibility for bringing this war to an honorable end. In our political system there is only one President, and that is where, as Harry Truman used to say, "the buck stops."

This House of Congress, under the Constitution, has high and solemn responsibilities. In conjunction with the other body it raises the revenues, authorizes the programs, enacts the appropriations to carry out the necessary purposes of government. But this House, despite the eagerness and ambitions of some of its Members, cannot go out and negotiate a peace with North Vietnam. That is an executive function, that is the President's responsibility, and the least we can do is give the President our support and our prayers for the success of his efforts to achieve an honorable peace.

I say, give the President a chance. Give him your support. Do the right thing and the sensible thing. It takes two sides to negotiate. And if the other side refuses, we cannot simply surrender without risking massive slaughter of South Vietnamese citizens. Withdrawal must be carefully planned and timed to the changing war situation and the developing capabilities of the South Vietnamese forces to protect themselves against Communist slaughter.

There is time enough, and opportunity enough, if the President does not measure up to expectations, to register the attitude of this House. There will be authorization bills and appropriations bills and other legislation involving Vietnam. This resolution enacts no law, commits no funds, changes no basic policy, it is merely a statement of moral support toward a just peace. It stands for agreement on the end we seek, not necessarily on every particular means to achieve it.

The resolution is simple enough in its wording, but that does not diminish its importance.

The people are confused and divided. Shall we add to the confusion and widen the division by refusing to stand behind the President as he grapples with the momentous problems of orderly withdrawal and disengagement from Vietnam? Shall we be irresponsible? Or shall we let the Nation and the world know that our Government, at least, is united in this aim, dedicated to the pursuit of peace with honor and justice?

House Resolution 613 is a resolution of support for the President for "his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam," not for everything the President says or does on the domestic or international scene. With that goal there should be no quarrel. Now the resolution has some other expressions associated with the goal of a just peace. Let us look at them one by one.

It "expresses the earnest hope of the people of the United States for such a peace." Again, there should be no quarrel with that. The American people are for peace and a just peace.

It "calls attention to the numerous peaceful overtures which the United States has made in good faith toward the Government of North Vietnam." Surely these overtures have been made—by every President who was involved, by every means public and private. As President Johnson said in his historic address of March 31, 1968:

> For years, representatives of our Government and others have traveled the world—seeking to find a basis for peace talks.

The adversary challenges our good faith, but history will record that the United States sought long and earnestly to reach out to Hanoi, pleading for a meaningful response, working so that both sides could sit down together and come to a meeting of the minds.

The resolution "approves and supports the principles enunciated by the President that the people of South Vietnam are entitled to choose their own government by means of free elections open to all South Vietnamese and supervised by an impartial international body, and that the United States is willing to abide by the results of such elections." We can agree with that statement. It bespeaks confidence in the outcome of elections that are free. We will take our chance on fair ballots in place of hard bullets.

Finally, the resolution "supports the President in his call upon the Government of North Vietnam to announce its willingness to honor such elections and abide by such results and to allow the issues in controversy to be peacefully resolved in order that the war may be ended and peace may be restored in Southeast Asia." This statement is related to the preceding one. There would be no point in an election unless North Vietnam agreed to accept the results. We are willing to take our chances on the outcome of free elections, Saigon is pledged to the same, but what about Hanoi? Their faith is in force not in the free and peaceful exercise of the vote.

Today, the majority of people in South Vietnam do not want to be under a Communist regime. They are fighting against Communist domination, and we are helping them. It was always understood, and mutually declared by the two Governments, by President Thieu and Johnson at the Honolulu conference and elsewhere, that we would withdraw as the South Vietnamese gained enough strength to take over the job of defending their own country. The President has stated that the war has reached a stage where withdrawals can be affected. President Nixon is trying to carry out a policy of orderly withdrawal, as any responsible President would.

President Nixon is advocating the same principles which were followed by President Johnson. Those principles were:

First, continued formal negotiations and informal contacts with representatives of Hanoi to obtain an honorable peace;

Second, military activity based on a scale proportionate to the aggressive military action of the North Vietnamese against the South Vietnamese;

Third, training of South Vietnamese citizens for their own self-defense—the so-called Vietnamization program;

Fourth, deescalation of the war through cessation of bombing and prohibition against invasion of U.S. forces north of the DMZ line; and Fifth, free elections without coercion from any source within or without South Vietnam.

These principles are just and in accord with our goal for an honorable peace. Let us speak reason. Let us have understanding and sympathy. Let us enact House Resolution 613.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the gentleman on his very statesmanlike statement and I would like to associate myself with him.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I thank my colleague.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. OTTINGER. Does the gentleman interpret the resolution as supporting the President in whatever he may do in the name of peace?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I do not. I have given my interpretation of it in the words I have said.

I recognize that lawyers can quibble over the meaning of words, and I have already had some approach me and quibble with me on the meaning of the words. I have told what I believe this resolution means and the reason I am supporting it. I see nothing in this resolution that any person who will study it cannot support. If he does see something, then he should vote against it.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY).

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Chairman, can a Democratic Congressman tender his support for a Republican President of the United States without fear of invective? Can a Democratic Congressman back the foreign policies of the United States without fear of discrimination or retaliation? These questions seems to be at the crux of today's Vietnam debate.

I say a loyal, lifelong Democrat can offer support to his President. I say that the conduct of foreign policy, which falls principally in the domain of the President, has historically merited bipartisan support. History has proven it imprudent for Americans to try and legislate their foreign policy. This, in no way, represents a Democrat giving a Republican President a blank check, as some have charged. Nor does it frustrate those who would dissent from this view. For dissent is one of this Nation's most priceless values.

The confrontation, conflict and varying degrees of civil strife, evident in this country for some time over racial and economic issues, has today polarized around a single issue—Vietnam.

And this polarization, unfortunately, will continue so long as the war in that narrow, crescent-shaped strip of Southeast Asian land continues.

Everyone wants peace—the President, the Congress, the students, the parents, the teachers, the silent majority and the vocal minority—everyone, that is, except the Communists. Peace has been kicked around almost as much as the weather. Everyone talks about it, but.

A lot of people also talk about morality in war. They also jabber about why we are there and why we should get out—and when. Trillions of words have been spewed forth on both sides, until they fall at last on mute ears.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, the reasons have been overstated, pounded home by four Presidents. But with all this eloquence, the swords have yet to be turned into plowshares.

Were I to reiterate the reasons for our involvement, I would merely be playing an old saw. As I said earlier, actions of the past no longer fit present reality. In the new phraseology: It is a whole new ballgame. Where do we go from here?

How do we stop the killing of another American boy—your husband, your son? When will Asian boys fight Asian boy's wars?

Today I join 318 of my colleagues in the House of Representatives in signing this bipartisan resolution supporting the President of the United States "in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam."

The resolution expressed the earnest hope of the American people for such a peace, calls attention to the numerous peaceful overtures which the United States has made in good faith toward the Government of North Vietnam, and approves and supports the principles enunciated by the President that the people of South Vietnam are entitled to choose their own Government by means of free elections.

I firmly believe that the best interests of the United States require an early and honorable end to the war. I firmly believe that the most expeditious way to end that war is to support the President of the United States. I firmly believe that he is doing everything humanly possible to bring about a peace with justice. He can succeed with our support; without it, he cannot.

In an age of polarization by race, age, economic circumstances and political philosophy, Vietnam has become the catalyst, the big issue fetish. This polarization will continue and intensify so long as we permit the war to divide us. Solutions to any single issue will not be achieved unless there is unity in our quest for peace in Southeast Asia.

The United States is in Vietnam in the name of peace. A recent Presidential speech on the war used the word 39 times. So at least we have some seeds of unity there. And what the United States needs now is unity, not unanimity. We do not need peace at any price. Yet, how often have we heard that it takes two to make peace?

Repeatedly, in harsh, unyielding terms,

Hanoi has steadfastly repudiated every overture for peace—from bombing halts to Paris palaces. Ironically, some of these are the very overtures that were advocated by war protestors in this country—not the enemy—and which were adopted and tried by Presidents Johnson and Nixon.

Can there really be any serious debate about our desire to negotiate a just solution to a dirty, tough, mean guerrilla war? Dozens and dozens of suggestions have been made to Hanoi through all sorts of channels, with all sorts of formula, and Hanoi has categorically rejected all of them. We are all exhausted by rehashes of these efforts, so I will not review them here.

Neither will I rehash the more virulent attacks against the sincere desires for peace of some of the peace groups. But it is not relevant that on the day the latest demonstrations began last month, North Vietnam made plain that it is counting on growing protests in the United States to speed the end of the Vietnam war on Hanoi's terms. What could be plainer than the statement made by the North Vietnamese Ambassador as the Paris talkathon then rolled into its 43d week.

Can there be any doubt that these demonstrations stymie the President's moves in trying to achieve an honorable peace? Can there be any doubt that these demonstrations rekindle North Vietnam's aborted efforts to totally subjugate South Vietnam? Can there be any doubt that these demonstrations prolong a war that is costing the lives of your sons, your brothers, when all anyone—except the Communists—really wants is peace?

Can anyone in their right mind still parade the banner of peace when Hanoi has rejected categorically every overture for peace?

In Asia, communism still acts in the belief that there is more profit in war than peace. And passion in the peace movement at home has been allowed to boomerang.

Certainly, not all those who march are conscience-stricken over the war. Demonstrating in the streets is an outlet for other frustrations, real and imagined—a snake dance for easy riders and midnight cowboys.

There is an old adage: you do not cure a dog of fleas, by drowning the dog. It holds true for Vietnam. A pullout will not end the fighting in Southeast Asia. Instead it will insure the subjugation of the people of South Vietnam and further the cause of Chinese domination of that vital area of the world.

Whatever the mistakes of the past, we dare not allow the rights we defend in South Vietnam to go by default.

But we can look to the future—a future with no more Vietnam's. The President is working toward that end, and that is why he needs our support. The President has set broad outlines for the withdrawal of American forces from Vietnam. This is based, in part, on a new optimism among previous official skeptics that South Vietnam is at last ready to carry the ball alone. The timetable for U.S. disengagement has not, of course, been revealed. But is this not, in effect, the end we all seek?

We are not ourselves embarked upon an ideological campaign to destroy anybody who disagrees with us. Aggressors nominate themselves, we do not choose them. But when aggressors strike, then those who are genuinely interested in peace have a problem on their hands, and sometimes it gets tough, and sometimes we are tested, and we find out what kind of people we are.

I, for one, support the President of the United States in his quest for a just and honorable peace in Vietnam. I would advise some others that the right to dissent is sometimes the right not to dissent.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. I merely wish to compliment the gentleman for a very courageous and well-thought-out statement. I think it is one of the best statements that I have heard in this whole debate, and I compliment him very much on it.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WRIGHT. I, too, wish to say I am much impressed by the statement the gentleman from New York has made.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Chairman, I cannot vote for this resolution.

It is said that all the resolution does is to proclaim our support for the principle of free elections in Vietnam. Let us stipulate, once and for all, that all Members of this body favor the principle of free elections in Vietnam, as well as in the hundred other countries of the world that do not allow free elections—from the Soviet Union to Greece, from Poland to Brazil. Whether we want to send half a million troops, and bring all the horrors of war, to any area where free elections are denied is another matter—but that does not seem to be involved in the resolution.

If all the resolution does is to come out strong for free elections, why oppose it? The answer is a very simple one. The answer is that President Nixon in his Vietnam speech in the House repeatedly referred to the resolution as supporting his policies and proposals concerning Vietnam.

Those policies and proposals, so far as I can make them out, are to climb down the ladder of escalation about halfway—from our present half million troops to around half that many. Not having been able to achieve our objective with 500,000 troops, we will now try to do so with 250,000. Even this partial withdrawal is to have two conditions attached to it—that Hanoi does not step up the fighting, and that Saigon agrees that it is ready to take over.

These conditions assure that our policy will be made in Hanoi and Saigon, rather than in Washington.

These policies and proposals do not seem like a very apt way of extricating ourselves from Vietnam.

I have had some experiences in the past with voting blank check resolutions of approval. In 1957, I voted for a Middle East resolution affirming our support for countries attacked by Communist-dominated countries. The next year, we thrust 15,000 American troops into Lebanon, which was subject to an internal political upheaval but not to Communist aggression from without, with the State Department solemnly pointing to the blank check it said Congress had just given it. Back in 1964, I voted for the Tonkin Gulf resolution, sold as support for American naval vessels wantonly attacked on the high seas to fire back. Then I found the Tonkin Gulf resolution used as justification for dispatching half a million Americans to Vietnam.

Now, for a third time, I am asked to give the President a blank check. That is not what my constituents sent me here to do.

I do not lightly oppose President Nixon's Vietnam policies and proposals. I introduce no resolution condemning them.

But when I am asked to give my support for things seen and things unseen, my answer is simple: No.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to take this opportunity to announce my wholehearted support of House Resolution 613. I hope the House will overwhelmingly support this resolution which will demonstrate to the world our support of President Nixon's efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam.

The entire Nation, I am confident, fully supports the President in his goal to bring about a reasonable, acceptable, and sound solution to the problems of Vietnam.

I stand 100 percent behind President Nixon in his endeavors, and I fully support the principles that the President of the United States has enunciated concerning free elections in South Vietnam and our willingness to abide by the results. We are negotiating in good faith with the North Vietnamese—I only wish they were doing the same.

The free world must certainly be aware of our sincerity and our patience. It is unfortunate that the same sincerity which we have demonstrated over and over again in Paris, does not seem to be understood or reciprocated by the North Vietnamese.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I include at this point in the RECORD a telegram from Gen. Lucius D. Clay, former Commander in Chief of the U.S. forces in Europe, and a telegram from James B. Conant, the former president of Harvard University, former U.S. High Commissioner in Germany and former U.S. Ambassador to Germany:

I believe that your resolution will help the President in his efforts to secure an honorable peace in Vietnam and hope sincerely it receives a favorable vote.

LUCIUS D. CLAY,
Former Commander in Chief of U.S. forces in Europe.

NEW YORK, N.Y.

Congressman JAMES WRIGHT,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.:

I strongly support your Vietnam resolution and hope that it will be overwhelmingly approved.

JAMES B. CONANT,
Former president of Harvard, Former U.S. High Commissioner in Germany, and Former Ambassador to Germany.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. ALBERT) having resumed the chair, Mr. FLYNT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration House Resolution 613, toward peace with justice in Vietnam, had come to no resolution thereon.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks on House Resolution 613.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

NATION'S NO. 1 FOOTBALL TEAM—NORTH DAKOTA STATE UNIVERSITY

(Mr. ANDREWS of North Dakota asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ANDREWS of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of my colleagues to the record—the remarkable record of the Nation's No. 1 college division football team: North Dakota State University.

Here is a football team that has charted an exciting, rather fantastic course in its pursuit of excellence. The achievements over the past few seasons of the nationally rated Bison are legion. Let me cite some of the accomplishments of NDSU's thundering herd:

Coach Ron Erhardt's Bison 3 weeks ago completed their third consecutive unbeaten regular season. On November 10 they were invited to play in the Camellia Bowl football game December 13 in Sacramento, Calif. The Bison thus became the first college division team in the Nation, for the third straight season, to receive a postseason bid from the National Collegiate Athletic Association—NCAA.

Last week, both national wire services—Associated Press and United Press International—named North Dakota State University the 1969 college division national football champion. It is the 5th straight year the Bison have been ranked high in these polls, the third time they have been named AP national champion, and the second time UPI national champion.

North Dakota State University has won 19 straight football games, has won 28 straight on its home turf at Dacotah Field in Fargo, N. Dak., has won 18 in a row in the North Central Conference—one of the most respected leagues in the Nation, and one of the toughest—has won an unprecedented six straight conference championships, and has won 57 of its last 61 football games.

Coach Erhardt has a gaudy record of 36 wins and three losses and has an amazing 28 victories in his last 29 games. Ten of Coach Erhardt's 1969 players earned first-team berths on the all-conference team.

We North Dakotans are proud of NDSU's total program—both academic and athletic—and are elated with the challenges it has met and the success it has achieved in football. The Bison have represented the University, the city of Fargo, and the State of North Dakota in bowl competitions in Missouri and Texas and now we are certain they will continue to represent us in winning fashion against neighboring University of Montana in the December bowl battle in California.

Let those who would label this a "political football" produce similar credentials for their alma mater's grid team, and I shall personally request equal time and space for that lucky Representative. I am elated to be able to make these comments about my old school and to extend to its administration, faculty, student body, and alumni my best wishes and my confident prediction that it will retain ownership of that proud title—No. 1.

REPORT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF LABOR ON THE UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA

(Mr. HECHLER of West Virginia asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. HECHLER of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the analysis released by the U.S. Department of Labor on Friday clearly indicates that President W. A. Boyle of the United Mine Workers of America has been plundering and squandering union dues for the benefit of a few top officials and their "sisters and cousins and their aunts." This official report confirms the truth of what Ralph Nader, Joseph A. Yablonski, and several other individuals have been stating for several months.

Obviously, only the tip of the iceberg has been revealed in this report. It confirms the immediate need for a full-scale congressional investigation of the United Mine Workers of America. Such an investigation should also extend to the multimillion-dollar United Mine Workers welfare and retirement fund which has bilked thousands of retired miners and widows out of pension and medical benefits through arbitrary rules changes, gross mismanagement of funds, payments to noncoal miners, and other abuses.

I commend Secretary of Labor George Shultz for officially reporting on the financial mismanagement, nepotism, padded expense accounts, and other evidences of hanky-panky practiced by UMWA President W. A. Boyle. I hope that my colleagues in Congress will urge Secretary Shultz not to be deterred or intimidated by the charges of Mr. Boyle that these facts constitute "a smear job and open union busting." Mr. Boyle has not denied the factual basis of the Department of Labor report, but has only in the tradition of the ancients attacked the bearer of bad news. As a matter of fact, nothing would contribute more toward strengthening free trade unionism than a cleaning out of the very corruption which President Boyle has fostered and condoned and now tries to defend and perpetuate.

In calling for a congressional investigation of illegal practices, I urge that my colleagues re-read section 501(a) of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959, for which I voted and which now constitutes 29 U.S.C. 501(a):

> The officers, agents, shop stewards, and other representatives of a labor organization occupy positions of trust in relation to such organization and its members as a group. It is, therefore, the duty of each such person, taking into account the special problems and functions of a labor organization, to hold its money and property solely for the benefit of the organization and its members and to manage, invest, and expend the same in accordance with its constitution and bylaws and any resolution of the governing bodies adopted thereunder, to refrain from dealing with such organization as an adverse party or in behalf of an adverse party in any matter connected with his duties and from holding or acquiring any pecuniary or personal interest which conflicts with the interests of such organization, and to account to the organization for any profit received by him in whatever capacity in connection with transactions conducted by him or under his direction on behalf of the organization.

The analysis follows:

> MEMORANDUM OF U.S. DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, OFFICE OF LABOR-MANAGEMENT AND WELFARE-PENSION REPORTS, WASHINGTON, D.C., NOVEMBER 26, 1969

> Subject Summary Report of Financial Investigation United Mine Workers of America, Ind. LM–000063.

On March 4, 1969, the Labor Department's Office of Labor-Management and Welfare-Pension Reports, herein called the LMWP, opened an investigation of the financial affairs of the United Mine Workers of America, Ind., herein called UMWA.

The investigation was initiated pursuant to Section 601 of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act, herein called the Act, which authorizes the Secretary of Labor, when he believes it necessary in order to determine whether any person has violated or is about to violate any provision of the Act to make an investigation and furnish the results to interested persons or officials.

LMWP regularly conducts financial audits of national and international unions and other parent bodies, intermediate organizations and local unions.

The investigation of the UMWA disclosed the following:

The Constitution of the UMWA contains the following provisions: Article X, Section 1:

"The salary of the President shall be $50,000 per annum; Vice President, $40,000 per annum; Secretary-Treasurer, $40,000 per annum; International Executive Board Members, $1,000 per month; Tellers and Auditors, $25.00 per day when employed. Each of the above mentioned officers shall receive, in addition to their salaries, such additional sums for additional service rendered as may be authorized and approved by the President; together with all legitimate expenses when employed by the Organization away from their places of residence."

Article X, Section 2: "The salaries of other employees shall be fixed by the International Executive Board."

Article IX, Section 7: "He [the President] shall interpret the meaning of the International Constitution but his interpretation shall be subject to repeal by the International Executive Board. Between sessions of the International Executive Board he shall have full power to direct the workings of the Organization and shall report his acts to the International Executive Board for its approval."

Article IX, Section 12: "He [the President] shall devote all his time to the affairs of the Organization, executing the instructions of the International Executive Board and exercising general supervision over the field and office work of the International Union."

Article IX, Section 25: "The International Executive Board shall execute the instructions of International Conventions and between Conventions shall have full power to direct the workings of the Organization."

The investigation disclosed that the International President has raised salaries and made grants of additional salaries to employees other than the officials listed in Article X, Section 1. Not only have these increases and grants been made without prior approval or subsequent ratification by the International Executive Board, but also the minutes of the International Executive Board reflect that no reports of these actions were ever made to the International Executive Board for its approval.

There are no instructions issued by the International Union which can be documented to establish criteria to be used by officials or employees of the union as to what expenses they were entitled to claim as reimbursement, the basis for claiming reimbursement or the method of claiming reimbursement. Some officials have claimed reimbursement for hotel expenses during periods when they were at their places of residence, some have claimed expenses for hotels and travel for practically every day of the year, and some have claimed identical amounts for hotel expenses and automobile travel for every day spent in travel. An official, by his own admission has spent varying periods of time on vacation and claimed expenses of $20 a day for his entire vacation. Although the records were checked for only 1967 and 1968, the official said that this practice has been followed for many years.

The International Union does not require its officials or employees who travel to submit any receipts or any other evidence of the travel performed or money expended. Whatever vouchers are submitted are paid without question.

Another item disclosed by the investigation relates to an account described as the "Agency Fund". In 1960 the top officers of the union transferred $850,000 from the general funds of the union to establish a retirement fund to pay the three officers of the union their full salaries annually upon retirement after at least 10 years of service in office. At the present time this fund has approximately $1.5 million. This fund has never been adequately disclosed in the annual financial report submitted to the Department of Labor.

The annual financial reports filed with the Department of Labor for the years 1967 and 1968 show improper reporting of a Loan Receivable of $1.4 million from Lewmurken, Inc., a Delaware corporation wholly owned by the union. The major asset of Lewmurken consists of ownership of approximately 30% of the stock of Rocky Mountain Fuel Company, located in Denver, Colorado. The 1968 value of this 30% ownership was $146,906, based on the financial statement submitted by the company to the State of Colorado.

The records of the United Mine Workers for 1967 reflect the following payments to officials of the union and members of their families:

Name and address	Title	Annual salary	Expenses	Total	Relationship
W. A. Boyle, 4422 35th St. N.W, Washington.	International President	$50,000	$11,630.84	$61,630.84	Father.
R. J. Boyle, 3015 Lohof Dr., Billings, Mont.	President, District 27 international board member.	25,000	8,974.91	33,974.91	Brother.
Miss Antoinette Boyle, 1048 Ave. F, Billings, Mont.	Attorney	40,000	3,287.94	43,287.94	Daughter.
John Owens, 821 Clark St., Cambridge, Ohio.	International Secretary-Treasurer.	40,000	4,945.58	44,945.58	Father.
R. C. Owens, 2460 Southway Dr., Columbus, Ohio.	Secretary-Treasurer, District 6, Special International Representative.	25,000	3,110.98	28,110.98	Son.

A PLETHORA OF VIOLIN PLAYERS AND A DEARTH OF LEGISLATORS

(Mr. BRAY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. BRAY. Mr. Speaker, recently, the respected columnists, Roscoe and Goeffrey Drummond, commented on the activities of this Congress. They have discovered we have a plethora of violin players and a dearth of legislators.

I call attention to what some at least think of the performance of both:

CONGRESS FIDDLES: UNITED STATES BURNS

(By Roscoe and Geoffrey Drummond)

Congress has been fiddling for nine months while the nation burns. It is failing to do its job—failing badly. Not in this century—not even Truman's whipping-boy, "do-nothing" Congress of the 1948 campaign—has the Congress shown itself so sterile, so incompetent, so irresponsible as today. It is simply not transacting the public business. Its failure is little short of criminal because it comes at a time when such neglect of the crisis problems puts democracy itself in peril.

The record should dismay, infuriate and galvanize voters to see that something is done about it. Since this democratically controlled Congress convened last January, it has neglected nearly everything and produced almost nothing. This is no overstatement. Here are the facts which support it:

Fiscal Irresponsibility: the greatest power of Congress is giving or withholding money. The greatest weakness of this Congress is that it doesn't manage the appropriations bills carefully or competently. The government entered the new fiscal year last June 30 without a single appropriation being authorized and now, five months past that date, Congress has acted upon only a small part of the appropriations. This is Congress at its worst. It is heading to a point where the government may not be able to finance itself at all.

Stalled on Crime: Richard Nixon, Hubert Humphrey and George Wallace, as well as nearly every candidate for Congress who ran for election last year, pledged to deal with "crime in the streets." But Congress is failing to do so. The Democrats are presently refusing to enact the President's proposals, are not enacting their own and the outlook for anything at all is dim.

Stalled on the Draft: The President is pleading with Congress to approve a more just and more equitable military draft prior to the time when it can be ended. The merit of draft reform is hardly questioned at all. Passing it would do much to take the steam out of campus unrest and to deny the militants one of their favorite issues. Congress delays and dallies. Sen. Edward Kennedy has been dragging out his hearings and only when college presidents started to plead for action did the Democrats begin to show signs of approving limited reform.

Stalled on Other Urgent Issues: The argument that President Nixon hasn't given Congress anything to do is untrue. He has given Congress a good agenda of innovative proposals and Congress has just yawned and gone back to talking. A detailed blueprint for sweeping reform of the welfare system has been before Congress for weeks, plus proposals for wage supplements, revenue sharing, manpower reform, Social Security reform and grants-in-aid reform. Congress says maybe tomorrow, not now.

Stalled on Ethics: Congress likes to reform everybody but itself. The Christian Science Monitor does not put it too strongly when it reports that "this year the U.S. Congress has done a lot of shouting about ethics—for somebody else; when it comes to improving ethical standards for itself—silence." More than silence. It ignores its own conflicts of interest and it rejects mounting demands that its members make public annual disclosures of outside income. Congress demands that judges do so. It fairly criticizes Judge Clement Haynsworth for "ethical insensitivity" but usually looks the other way when anybody asks: What about you? Congress better start facing the mirror before it faces the voters next year.

(Mr. TIERNAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. TIERNAN. Mr. Speaker, I join today with the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BURKE) in objecting to unanimous consent for H.R. 14646. I do so because I am awaiting a report from the Governor of Rhode Island as to the possible long-range effect this compact could have on rail passenger service beyond New Haven. I do so because the compact leaves the long haul service to Rhode Island and Massachusetts with an uncertain future. I do so because it would seem that satisfactory short haul and long haul passenger needs must be met concurrently.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I feel that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce should be given the opportunity to have this unique proposal brought before it. If the Congress is going to deal successfully with our massive transportation problems, then it ought to so in a comprehensive way. Every aspect of this bill should be full known and every possible consequence be fully weighed before it is enacted into law. Hasty legislative action today without recourse to a full public airing could well give us problems of consequence in the future.

COMMODITY EXCHANGE ACT AMENDMENT

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALBERT). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. PRICE), is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. PRICE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce, for appropriate reference, a needed amendment to the Commodity Exchange Act. This amendment is the product of much thought and deliberation on the part of many individuals within and without the Federal Government.

The amendment I am proposing would exempt livestock and poultry producers from the speculative trading and position limits presently established under the Commodity Exchange Act. As a result, contract markets would better serve the needs of the Nation's larger livestock and poultry feeder concerns.

Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as my amendment is a technical one, I think the problems it is designed to remedy can be best understood in terms of a historical perspective.

Contract markets, more often called boards of trades or mercantile exchanges are not new in the United States. For more than a century, the Chicago Board of Trade has provided facilities whereby those storing grains and certain other products could avoid some portion of the uncertainty normally associated with doing business in futures markets.

The regulation of futures markets has varied through the years. Initially, transactions in the market were loosely governed by State law. This practice was the object of widespread criticism. The criticism reached a crescendo following World War I, when the bottom fell out of the agriculture price structure. In many quarters, the severe drop in prices was blamed on "gamblers," "speculators," and the Chicago Board of Trade.

In response to the hue and cry for reform, Congress, in the early twenties, began to regulate the futures market. In 1921, Congress enacted the ill-fated Futures Trading Act. In the following year, however, the act was declared partly unconstitutional. Its legislative successor was the Grain Futures Act of 1922, which laid the statutory foundation for Federal regulation of the futures market. In 1936 Congress enacted the Commodity Exchange Act, which with certain amendments added by the 90th Congress, provides the present regulatory framework of the futures market.

There is common agreement that the ordinary course of business in the futures market has been greatly facilitated by Federal regulation. Many questionable practices have been eliminated; including excessive speculation, use of fraudulent or misleading contracts, wash sales, cross trades, fictitious sales, and dealings by unregistered future commission merchants or unregistered brokers. In addition, the regulations have been expanded to include commodities other than grains. At present, 33 commodities including livestock and livestock products come under Federal regulation.

The fundamental purpose of Federal regulation in contract markets is to preserve the hedging and price-basing services of the commodity futures market. These services are widely used by farmers, merchandisers, and food processors. They also effect the retail food prices paid by the consumer. It is with regard to these services that my amendment is directed.

A real need for amending the Commodity Exchange Act has arisen due to the growth of the poultry and cattle-feeding industries. As the same economic problems are created for both industries by the present terms of the Commodity Exchange Act, I shall for illustrative purposes, limit my remarks to the cattle-feeding industry.

The cattle-feeding industry has experienced an astounding surge of growth in the last 5 years. This surge reflects the fact that we have become a Nation of beefeaters, demanding larger and larger quantities of high-quality red meat, and willing to pay generally higher prices. Before this boom in consumer demand, most feedlots were organized as individual proprietorships or partnerships, and were operated as small businesses in terms of the number of head handled. With rising demand levels, however, the incentive to industrialize has been increased. As a result, huge commercial feedlots have sprung up in the Great Plains, the Southwest, and other cattle producing areas of the country.

Commercial feedlots are big business in the finest sense of the word. Sophisticated commercial techniques and the economies of scale have been relied on heavily. Computers calculate feed rations and figure lowest cost alternatives. Teletypes funnel in market information from around the country. Buyers jet from one feeder source to another in search of replacements and best buys. Corps of health specialists and nutritionists are on call. As a direct result, some feedlots have up to a 100,000-head capacity.

Of late commercial feedlots have enjoyed substantial financial success, the formula for which has been a fundamental one; namely, start with a product that people like, improve the product, and then produce the product in volume at a cost which generates its own demand. Beef feeders have used this formula to great advantage. They have combined agriculture's two biggest "raw materials"—cattle and grain—"manufactured" them into the favorite food of the world—red meat—and produced it in such quantity that our daily national per capita consumption of beef averages 5 ounces.

Many commercial feedlots custom feed; that is, finish cattle for other owners. These "cattle hotels" may feed cattle for more than 50 customers during the year. In a typical custom contract, the cattle owner pays feed costs plus a daily yardage charge and veterinary fees.

In business organization, most of the big feeding operations are corporations, with the stock being held primarily by farmers and ranchers. A few feedlots have recently "gone public," and looking toward further expansion, others plan like moves.

The rapid physical expansion of the feedlot business has been built on a firm financial foundation. A recent survey of commercial banks—the primary source of feedlot operating capital—produced a consensus of a "good' to "excellent" rating. One basic reason for this rating is the ready availability of future markets for both feed and cattle. This means that cattle feeders can hedge against price fluctuations.

Astute commercial feedlot managers obtain, through the use of computers or other devices, precise information on operating costs. Armed with this knowledge, they attempt to assure a profit margin, even before the first steer is fed. They do so by trading in futures markets. At present, however, their ability to facilitate operations is retarded due to the 2 million bushel limit that the Commodity Exchange Act places on speculative trading and positions in grains.

In order for a commercial feedlot to operate at a profit, large amounts of feed grains must be purchased during the course of a year. The purchases must, however, fall within the 2-million-bushel limitation. Accordingly, the quantities of grains purchased vary as a function of both the price level and product availability. In addition to creating a storage problem, this ties up a large amount of capital. Furthermore, neither the lender nor the feedlot operator wishes to assume the additional risk of holding the large amounts of necessary feed grains on an unhedged basis.

The amendment I am proposing would remove the 2-million limitation for livestock and poultry producers. This exemption is not without precedent. The 1968 amendments make provisions for grain producers and processors to operate as hedgers; my amendment would merely afford the same allowance for the equally deserving livestock and poultry producers.

ESSENTIAL RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE ON THE NEW HAVEN DIVISION OF THE PENN CENTRAL RAILROAD

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. Speaker, New York State and my State of Connecticut have acted concurrently in adopting legislation to authorize cooperative and joint measures to provide continuation and improvement of essential rail passenger service on the New Haven Division of the Penn Central Railroad.

The other body has given consent to this Connecticut-New York Railroad Passenger Transportation Compact and I urge the House to take similar action.

Under this compact, Connecticut and

New York pledge bi-State operation of rail service over the former New Haven rail line which is now known as the West-end Division of the Penn Central.

New York and Connecticut have pledged $28.4 million for a modernization program to provide new equipment and upgrading of the railroad to provide safe, speedy, and efficient service. The Federal Government has pledged an additional $28.4 million to the program.

Over the years minimal maintenance by the bankrupt New Haven Railroad has resulted in deplorable conditions on this vital rail link between New England and the metropolitan New York area.

Equipment was strained to the point of maximum endurance. Railroad tracks, signals, and overhead electrical wires were neglected and taxed by continued service and wear. When the Penn Central took over the railroad earlier this year, it was estimated that if a crash maintenance program were not undertaken, the line would be forced to discontinue service within a 30-day period.

This is what the more than 20,000 commuters from my district face daily. The cars are dingy and dirty. In the rush hours, insufficient equipment causes crowding and further discomfort. Breakdowns are frequent, which is the rule rather than the exception. Trains run late or are canceled.

In this day and age when we can send men to the moon and bring them back to earth within 3 miles of a given target, we cannot get a train from Fairfield County, Conn. to New York without breakdowns and delays.

If any of my colleagues feel that this is an exaggeration, I invite you to read the thousands of letters I have received commenting on equipment and service on this major rail link.

By approving the Connecticut-New York Railroad Passenger Compact, the Congress will set the stage to eliminate these deplorable travel conditions and provide relief for the long-suffering commuters.

At the same time the Congress will show its concern for a mode of transportation that has been the stepchild of the industry in recent years.

The railroad is still the best means of transporting large numbers of people short distances with efficiency, speed, and safety. Yet despite these qualifications, State governments and the Federal Government have paid comparatively little attention to the plight and condition of our railroads as our national attention is transfixed on the highway and the airplane.

I am not advocating that we now revert our attention to the railroad and forget about these other modes of transportation. I feel that we need a balance in our thinking about our national transportation system.

Over the years, we have had thousands of transportation happenings, but we do not have transportation systems. We must have coordination of our modes of transportation so that each complements and supplements each other.

In the Northeast, we need immediate improvement and further development of rail service to supplement the vast highway network that pours cars, with all the traffic problems, into the urban centers. We need rail and urban mass transit links to airports to complement the highway network.

To do this, we must bring our rail transportation systems up to a standard so that they can fulfill their roles in a coordinated transit system. The Connecticut-New York Railroad passenger transportation compact sets the stage for this needed rail link improvement.

TAKE PRIDE IN AMERICA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. MILLER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, there were 1,749 daily newspapers in operation in the United States in 1967, more than twice the number as in any other nation. The U.S. daily newspapers had a combined circulation of 61,560,000 in 1967.

ADDRESS BY PATRICK CARDINAL O'BOYLE AT ANNUAL JOINT MEETING OF ROTARY CLUB OF WASHINGTON AND DOWNTOWN KIWANIS CLUB

(Mr. McCORMACK asked and was given permission to insert his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include an address by Patrick Cardinal O'Boyle.)

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, in my remarks, I include an address delivered by His Eminence, Patrick Cardinal O'Boyle, archbishop of Washington, at the annual joint meeting of Rotary Club of Washington and the Downtown Kiwanis Club, on November 26, 1969.

In his address, Archbishop O'Boyle spoke with logic, eloquence, effectiveness, and as he always does, with frankness, in expressing his views and discussing what His Eminence termed "one of the issues confronting the American Society today," and I might observe, a very important issue.

The address of Cardinal O'Boyle, based upon his lifetime of dedication to God, mankind, and country, is worthy of deep consideration:

Tomorrow, our nation will be celebrating a feast, Thanksgiving Day, the philosophy of which goes back to biblical times. In fact, so generally accepted has this wholesome practice become that it is hard to remember that it was not always so. In 1621, the Pilgrims set aside a day of Thanksgiving for the successful harvest of that year. It was not until 1630, however, that the Massachusetts Bay Colony followed suit. During the War for Independence the Continental Congress set aside one or two days each year to thank God for His blessings.

George Washington and James Madison issued similar proclamations during their terms of office, and recommended that the several States do likewise. Finally, in 1864, President Abraham Lincoln officially proclaimed the fourth Thursday of November as a day of Thanksgiving, and so recommended it to the States. And so it has been ever since.

I thought it might be helpful on this occasion to mention one of the issues confronting American Society today. If you are concerned about teenage crime (and who is not?), the rise in juvenile delinquency, the growth of a spirit of revolt among the young, drug addiction among children, the upswing in venereal disease rates among youth, and the breakdown in patriotism and morality among younger people, may I respectfully make these comments, which are applicable throughout our nation:

First, while all of these matters directly involve only a minority of our young people, they indirectly affect great numbers of our young people. These people are the coming body politic of the nation, and when a part of any body is ailing, the whole person is affected. I am not here to criticize the younger generation. Instead, I speak out of compassion for these, our children. Many people have pointed out that our younger people act as they do, because of the terrible state which older generations have left the world in. But the state of the world has always been bad. It was not any better a century ago when the nation had gutted itself with Civil War and was virtually sinking under financial and political crises. It was not any better when I was a young man and World War I was devouring millions of young lives in the most terrible slaughter of all times. It was not any better thirty years ago when Hitler began his campaigns of aggression. No—the problem of the young is not the state of the world, but the state of themselves as they face the world. For many, that is a state which I must describe as "rootless."

By this I mean that, in contrast with young people of former generations, great numbers of our present crop of teenagers and people in their twenties today no longer seem to have a grip on basic verities which, to a greater or lesser extent, it was the fortune of past generations to have had. Our young people talk about "rights," but many are not able to say what they think the ultimate source of "rights" to be. Since the vast majority of American children attend the public schools, it is important to realize that, over the long generations and up to relatively recent times, the public schools were able to give at least some kind of picture of the true source of "rights." In our public schools of an older day, it was possible to teach that God exists, and that God is the source of all rights. In the public schools of an older day, there used to be affirmative teaching based upon the great statement of our Founding Fathers in the Declaration of Independence:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness."

That was standard doctrine taught in the public schools for decades. It taught the child that he has a Creator, that people have rights, but that God (the Creator) is the source of all human rights. It taught that some rights are what the Founders called "unalienable"—rights that no man, no government, no dictator, no majority can take away. This teaching gave the child some "root" certainty. If he believed that teaching, he could never support any kind of wanton violence, any communist or fascist dictatorship movement and—if he really thought about it—any kind of discrimination against any human being on account of race or religion. This view of "rights" is very different from the mentality being produced in many of the schools today, in which belief in any ultimate value has been discouraged. Naturally, therefore, many young people today, having no fixed idea as to the source of human rights are easily moved by highly motivated adults who seek to win them to violent movements destructive of all human rights.

Far more basic, however, to the "rootlessness" of many of our young people is the fact that personal belief in God, traditional concepts of morality based upon the Ten Commandments, and the habit of prayer have been washed out of their lives. This has come about because decisions of our Supreme Court appear to have effectually barred the teaching of the reality of God, inculcation of the Ten Commandments, and outward prayer in the public schools. It is not my desire, in this address, to attempt any analysis or any criticism of these decisions. I desire merely to point out that they have caused the obliteration of what now increasingly appears to have been a very important and basic element in our society. I believe that we are going to find out—find out very painfully—the tremendous difference between the man who—even though he may not be a regular churchgoer—believes in God, the truths of the Ten Commandments, and has occasional recourse to prayer, and the man who is familiar with none of these things. We have all too easily assumed that the parents of great masses of our people would be able to impart these religious values to their children, even though we must have realized that children are with their schoolteachers for a greater part of the average day than they are with their parents. We have all too easily assumed that a general spirit of "good will," or "faith in democracy" or other such vague moral concepts would carry us along very nicely—without our having to get down to the brass tacks of teaching the young the reality of God, of teaching the young the Ten Commandments, of teaching the young to pray.

If we presently reap a world not unlike the world of Rome in the period of its decay—a luxurious, disorderly, cruel and disintegrating society—we should not be surprised. In spite of all the indignities which were heaped upon the Catholic immigrants who came to this country by the older Americans who feared them, may I say that it is a tragedy today that the Christian morality and outlook which characterized our traditionally Protestant-oriented public school is no longer with us. The old Protestant insistance which we found in the public schools of earlier times—teaching the reality of God, the importance of the Commandments and the importance of prayer—has given place to a vague secular humanism proving incapable of meeting the demands of a sound social order and—indeed—meeting the deep inner need of so many of our young people for basic roots.

What is to be done? You will pardon me if I say that I believe—more than ever today—that the parochial school is one answer. Believers, of many faiths, are more and more coming to appreciate the fact that it is possible for a child to get a good secular education at the same time he receives teaching of a religious nature, and that schools which provide both have been very successful and have in no way caused divisiveness in our pluralistic society. It is to be hoped that more people will come to see the value of such education, which can, in no sense weaken the general effort to support public education.

Now, let me say with all sincerity that parochial school education, with its emphasis on religious courses, does not guarantee that some of the pupils will not be numbered among those who are juvenile delinquents. However, they have less cause and less reason to become delinquents because they have been taught that there is a God and that they are responsible to Him for the violation of His laws and the laws of the land.

As to public education, which undoubtedly a large number of Americans will still desire as the schooling for their children, a good many people undoubtedly feel that an impasse has been reached. These people feel that it is not possible to give a full education in which all manner of knowledge is taught as being true but in which the teacher may not affirm that a man has a soul, may not teach that God exists, may not exhort children to follow the great truths of the Ten Commandments, and may not provide real opportunity for prayer. You can scarcely blame a child for thinking that all of these matters are unimportant—or for not thinking about them at all—where the central teacher in his life—namely, the school—regards them either as unimportant or forbidden. I understand that up in New Jersey the effort is being made to create the opportunity for silent prayer. But this, as you know, is already being fought by the pressure groups which have been largely responsible for getting religious observances thrown out of the public schools already. It seems to me that the Supreme Court of the United States, one of these days, is going to have to take another look at its decision on this subject. As our national social crisis deepens (and it appears indeed to be deepening), I predict that more of our people are going to be turning to God for guidance. As they do so, they are not going to permit their religious aspirations to be dammed up. Not only will they revive the practice of religion in their homes, but they will demand that the schools give at least minimal recognition to religion. It is very possible, then, that our Supreme Court will see fit to reverse its original ruling in the McCollum case which held that it was unconstitutional to have teachers of various religious faiths coming to public school premises to offer instruction to children of that faith, while excusing all other children. It is very possible that our Supreme Court will take a hard look at secularist teaching being carried on in public schools and rule that, if the schools cannot teach theistic religion, neither may they teach non-theistic religion to children. It is possible that our Court, looking at strongly revived religious aspirations of the people, will liberalize its views respecting religious worship and practices in the public schools, finding ways in which, without embarrassing children of a particular faith or who are non-believers, other children are given the opportunity to enjoy the rights of their religious heritage. It seems to me that, in any sensible and peaceable society, we should be able to work out compromises which give scope to the liberty of all parents and children—and by that I mean the children of believers as well as children of non-believers.

"God helps those who help themselves," said Ben Franklin almost two centuries ago. If we truly desire a future of peace and plenty and justice for our people, we who believe will work very hard to bring religion back to our education—and then we will find that God will not withhold His Grace from us in our efforts to do His Will.

In conclusion, may I wish you all a blessed and a happy Thanksgiving as we thank God for this beloved country of ours and for all the blessings He has given to each one of us.

SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFITS

(Mr. BYRNE of Pennsylvania asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.)

Mr. BYRNE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, on November 21, 1969, I was privileged to speak at the dedication of the Social Security Office, 7959 Bustleton Avenue, Philadelphia, Pa. I would like to include in my remarks the speech I delivered at that time:

REMARKS OF CONGRESSMAN JAMES A. BYRNE AT DEDICATION OF SOCIAL SECURITY OFFICE, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Mr. Chairman, Reverend Clergy, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen:

I am honored to have the opportunity of participating in an event of such importance in the life of a large segment of our population.

You know, it's become fashionable lately to attack our Social Security System. I know the reason for many of these attacks—and that reason is ignorance; ignorance of what Social Security really is and what it stands for. Social Security is not an annuity or an endowment insurance policy; nor is it a savings account where you put so much in and get out your money plus interest after a certain amount of time.

As you folks all know, this is not what Social Security was designed for and it is not the way Social Security works. The purposes of Social Security are, pure and simple: to insure that those eligible do not starve; to provide at least minimum and dignified assistance to the elderly, the disabled and the orphaned.

No one ever got rich on Social Security. But I would like some of these complainers about Social Security to sit in this office, or even my office, and meet some of the people who are benefitted by Social Security.

I'd like them to talk to the young widow and her two infant children, whose father was cut down in the prime of life. It is Social Security benefits which will permit this family to live in dignity—mind you, not luxury, but dignity—during their growing-up years.

Or they may talk to the man who is confined to a wheel chair by multiple sclerosis; completely disabled and unable to work, whose sole source of income is his Social Security benefits. The whole concept of Social Security, as I see it and expect you do too, is that those of us working today are making a modest contribution to a general fund to insure that those who cannot work or those who have reached a certain age will receive a minimum of comfort and subsistence.

And in this way, when those who are paying Social Security today no longer work, it will be the workers of their day who will be paying for them.

Let it not be misunderstood that I am perfectly satisfied with Social Security as it stands today. On the contrary, I am a loud and persistent complainer. But my complaint is: Not enough for Social Security recipients. I think there are many ways in which Social Security can and should be improved. Higher basic payments is one way. I honestly do not think in our day of inflationary prices that beneficiaries are getting enough. I don't think the proposed 7 percent increase is enough or even 10 percent. I'm fighting for a more realistic adjustment. I would likewise want to see Medicare benefits improved. I want to see broader Medicare coverage—especially coverage of those people under 65 who are now receiving disability payments. I would also like to see Medicare coverage for children whose subsistence depends upon Social Security survivorship benefits.

I would like to see prescription drugs completely covered by Medicare as well. As people get older, you know how much more their lives and health depend upon drugs—many of them expensive. Is this too much to ask? We pride ourselves in being the richest country in the world. Is it too much to ask that the richest country share its wealth with its own citizens who are old, who are disabled and who are without a head of the family?

I think not. I hope you agree.

Thank you.

PRETHANKSGIVING POSTSPLASHDOWN TRIBUTE TO APOLLO 12 ASTRONAUTS

(Mr. VANIK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.)

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, it was a great pleasure for Congressman GEORGE P. MILLER of California and I to cohost a pre-Thanksgiving post-splashdown tribute to our Apollo 12 astronauts on November 25 in the Rayburn Building. Stouffer Foods, a division of Litton Industries, which is in my congressional district, was chief contractor for the superb foods which are being served to our Apollo 12 astronauts while they are in the Lunar Receiving Laboratory in Houston.

Our whole community is proud of Stouffer Foods participation in this vital program.

The following are the remarks that were made during the luncheon by my distinguished colleague, Congressman GEORGE P. MILLER and by my constituent, Mr. James Bigger, president of Stouffer Foods. The remarks are as follows:

Congressman MILLER. It is one of the characteristics of the space program that its timing is fantastic.

The countdowns proceed into launches on the minute set, and the moon landing of Apollo 12 was not only precise as to time, but within 600 feet of the pre-selected landing area. And now, Apollo 12 has come back with its astronauts in time for them to join with us on earth in the traditional celebration of feast and Thanksgiving.

The feast is very appropriate as food is not un-important in space, even though we tend to think of space as the province of scientists, engineers and heroes. If it has been true in the past that the way to a man's heart is through his stomach, it is not less true that the way to the solar system lies in the same general direction.

In 1927 when Charles Lindbergh flew the Atlantic, he took on board the Spirit of St. Louis some cold sandwiches. Later, in the John Glenn orbital flight, he confessed to a great hunger for a supplemental ham sandwich. And in Apollo 12 we were treated to some interesting space debate on the subject of whether a can of tuna should be eaten or thrown away. Each of these reflected simply that man still orients himself on the next meal, and that he likes to have with him what he likes, no matter how adequately food arrangements have been made for him.

Now the Apollo 12 crew—as Apollo 11's trio before them—are enroute to the lunar receiving laboratory of the NASA's Manned Spacecraft Center in Houston. The adventure is behind them, and now the hard, or dull portion begins—isolation and quarantine. The reason for the quarantine is for them to be checked against the possibility that hostile organisms may have returned with them from the moon. But, in a way, it gives them a simulated taste of what long duration space flights, or occupation of space stations may require of future astronauts. Perhaps in such future events and explorations, the only thing astronauts will really have to look forward to will be the next meal. It will be the break with dullness and boredom, the only calendar or clock which means anything, and the most contributory factor to arrest the onset of a kind of cosmic cabin fever.

In wishing you all a Happy Thanksgiving, and in this atmosphere of special celebration for the achievements of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration to date, I ask you to look at this food before you today and eat it knowing what important and special meaning the field of food technology is now assuming as we reach for greater depths of space.

And now, back to my co-host, Congressman Vanik of Ohio:

Congressman VANIK. Thank you, Congressman Miller. I have just had a telegram from Dr. Charles Berry, who is called the astronauts doctor, and who is at the NASA Manned Spacecraft Center in Houston. It says: "Deeply sorry that the mission requirements including debriefing and quarantine preparations preclude my attendance at your post splashdown luncheon. These activities also preclude the attendance of Drs. Kemmerer, Rambaut, Smith, Mr. Mason, Miss Rapp whom you so kindly invited. We are proud of our inflight and post flight food program and the team, including the contractors, who have helped achieve the current standard of excellence. Food is very important as a morale factor for our flight crews. Please express our gratitude to those assembled and our regrets for being unable to celebrate with you."

Knowing how pressed they must now be in Houston, their absences . . . however regrettable . . . are understandable. From NASA headquarters here in Washington, we do have Dr. Homer Newell, George Lowe, and Robert Allnutt.

It's a matter of considerable pride to me as a northern Ohio Congressman that one of the major providers of menus for the NASA Manned Spacecraft Center's lunar receiving laboratory is a name which has long been and still is associated with good eating in my constituency. It has since ranged well beyond my district and is still going and growing. It is the Stouffer Foods Division of Litton Industries, and its president, James A. Biggar, lives in my district. He is here with us today with some members of his staff who worked on the actual Apollo menus. It was to this team that the NASA Manned Spacecraft Center turned for substantial assistance for this exotic institutional feeding program for the most unusual adventurers of this century. The Stouffer people met and surpassed every one of the rigid high standards for food selection . . . including the taste tests of the astronauts themselves. I'd like to have you meet James A. Biggar, president, Stouffer Foods Division of Litton Industries:

Mr. JAMES BIGGAR. I would like very much to have you all meet the ladies who really do all the work in preparation of the Stouffer Foods portion of the astronauts' menus. They are Mrs. Doris Centini, our manager of research and development, and her two able assistants, Sandra Hess and Julia Stewart. And they are not alone responsible for the astronauts, as they work on all the preparations which are available in all the stores which carry our products all over the country. When we suggest that all America "match menus with the astronauts", these girls have set the standards which make it possible for any family to do just that. Many thanks to you, Congressmen . . . Miller and Vanik, and I wish to say especially of Mr. Vanik that this has given me a grand opportunity to see my congressman in action. He represents us very well here in Washington.

Congressman VANIK. Many thanks to you all for coming, to Litton Industries, of California, and Stouffer Foods of Cleveland, for making this luncheon possible. Back to work, everybody.

STATEMENT BY THE STATE OF HAWAII BEFORE THE PRESIDENT'S CABINET TASK FORCE ON OIL IMPORT CONTROL

(Mrs. MINK asked and was given permission to revise and extend her remarks at this point in the RECORD, and to include extraneous material.)

Mrs. MINK. Mr. Speaker, the statement by the State of Hawaii on the mandatory oil import quota system, presented on November 24 by Mr. Myron B. Thompson, administrative director, Office of the Governor, contains abundant justification for removing Hawaii from this system. This was presented before the Cabinet Task Force on Oil Import Control.

As the statement points out, the punitive cost to consumers in Hawaii is at least $14 million a year, and Americans pay an estimated $3.4 billion annually. The system is especially unfair to Hawaii, the only State without land access to sources of oil, since it forces Hawaii to pay import prices for all of its fuel. This is a key factor in our excessively high cost of living.

As the State of Hawaii statement also shows, Hawaii is also penalized by being barred from shipping in crude from Alaska or other nations which could be refined for use in the State at lower cost. The statement by the State of Hawaii urges that the Jones Act be amended to correct this, as would be provided by my bill, H.R. 11038.

Justifying a change in the Jones Act, the State of Hawaii statement says:

We would also like to comment on the recent large discovery of crude oil in Alaska, a State that is part of District V. We feel that even if Alaskan crude may be competitive in price to foreign crude, Hawaii will not benefit from such price since we are required to use high cost U.S. Flag carriers under the Jones Act. Changes to the Jones Act should be made as it applies to noncontiguous States.

My bill would allow American firms using American labor on ships of American registry, built in other nations, to bring crude oil from Alaska for refinement in Hawaii. This would produce lower priced fuel, gasoline, and oil products for the people of Hawaii as well as increase employment. I am pleased to insert the State of Hawaii statement at this point in the RECORD.

STATEMENT OF THE STATE OF HAWAII ON THE MANDATORY OIL IMPORT QUOTA PROGRAM

It is a privilege to appear before this Committee on behalf of the State of Hawaii. The people of our State appreciate the opportunity this Task Force has provided to present their position on the Mandatory Oil Import Program.

It is the position of the State of Hawaii that alternatives to the present Mandatory Oil Import Quota Program, for the purpose of securing a petroleum supply in the interest of national defense and security, be considered seriously. (Answer to question #1 Governor Burns' statement dated July 10, 1969.) Crude oil is a natural resource which once diminished cannot be replaced. Emphasis should be placed on protecting and preserving crude oil for future use instead of setting artificial import barriers on the assumption that this will provide incentive for exploration of new sources of supply and encourage use of such sources of supply. The present Mandatory Oil Import Quota Program seems to unduly punish the citizens of this nation in the interest of national security. The use of higher priced domestic crude when cheap foreign crude is available is costing citizens of the United States an estimated $3.4 billion annually. (Sen. Proxmire estimate in March this year.) It is costing the citizens of Hawaii in excess of $14,000,000 annually. (Answer to question #38 statement of Governor Burns dated July 10, 1969, in Governor's rebuttal dated August 13, 1969.)

Should the Task Force decide to continue the Mandatory Oil Import Quota Program, it is the position of the State of Hawaii to request that it be removed from District V on grounds that the regulations imposed on District V cannot, in fairness, be imposed on Hawaii since conditions exist which do not apply to any other State. (Answers question #76 & 77, Governor's statement dated July 10, 1969.)

It is recommended that Hawaii be completely exempted from the Oil Import Quota Program because the rationale of national defense has no bearing on the State of Hawaii. Oil, whether it comes from foreign sources or from the continental United States must be transported over 2,200 miles of international waters, making it subject to attack in times of national emergency.

If total exemption is not possible, Hawaii should, at the minimum, be made a separate district in recognition of its unique circumstances in the same manner as Puerto Rico.

Presidential Proclamation No. 3279, as amended, which established the Mandatory Oil Import Quota Program, clearly recognizes differences between geographic areas of the country with respect to oil production and inter-area flow of oil.

District V included in addition to Hawaii, the states of Arizona, Nevada, California, Oregon, Washington and Alaska. These states are recognized oil deficient areas where limited imports of foreign oil are necessary to meet demand. Foreign imports to the district are, therefore, limited to an amount which, when added to domestic production and supply, would approximate total demand in the district. It should be noted that California and Alaska have some domestic production and all of them have access to overland supply of exempted oil produced in Canada or Mexico. (Covered in introductory statement by Governor, July 10, 1969.) Placement of Hawaii in this district is not appropriate. Hawaii lacks an indigenous source of fuel and therefore does not produce any oil on its own. Oil and its products are critical to our sustenance since we have no access to other soures of energy. Further, Hawaii cannot benefit from the exemption provided in the Import Quota Program for oil transported overland from Canada or Mexico.

At the same time, the Proclamation says of Puerto Rico:

"Whereas I find and declare that the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico largely depends upon imported crude oil, unfinished oils and finished products and that any system for the adjustment of imports of such commodities permit imports into Puerto Rico adequate for the purposes of local consumption . . ."

Hawaii and Puerto Rico similarily constitute non-contiguous areas which are critically dependent upon imported crude oil for economic development.

History has shown that areas lacking indigenous mineral resources, such as England, Japan, or Switzerland, and I include Hawaii, must use considerable ingenuity to overcome environmental deficiencies and survive economically.

Except for building materials sufficient only for local use, Hawaii's only mineral resources are soil and groundwater. Since 1778 our people have shown both skill and ingenuity in using these resources and the geography of the islands to participate in varying capacities in a changing world economy. From an initially way station trading economy we have passed through successive phases including emphasis on commerce, then agriculture, then defense mobilization and expanding into a service, largely tourist oriented economy.

The estimated resident population of Hawaii is in the neighborhood of 800,000. This represents an increase of over 40% since 1960. Our labor force is increasing at an annual rate of 4%. Population pressure will be heavy on the Hawaiian economy and it shows no sign of abatement. In order to maintain tolerable unemployment levels, present basic industries will have to be maintained or expended whenever possible and newer industries created.

Currently, Hawaii depends largely on military expenditures—amounting to $606 million last year, tourism—$460 million last year and sugar and pineapple—$328 million, for its economic well being.

They form a strong yet unpredictable base. Military expenditures are dependent on the world situation and public opinion. Tourism is subject to the influence of a variety of factors such as disposable income, competition from other areas and level of customer satisfaction. (Answer to question #77 in statement of Governor Burns dated July 10, 1969.) Sugar and pineapple, bulwarks of the past, have been steadily declining in relative importance. So it is that Hawaii must seek for ways to stabilize its economic base and make it less susceptible to fluctuation.

One of the ways to stabilize this base is to take advantage of Hawaii's mid-Pacific location and its unique natural assets to become a center for economic activity. Because of its geographic location and, to some extent, its unique ethnic composition, Hawaii is already playing an important role in bringing together buyers and sellers from East and West, assisting in their financial arrangements and providing them with display and exhibition facilities.

Manufacturing in Hawaii, hampered as it is by its inaccessibility to material and markets, currently plays a relatively minor role in the State's economic life, $310 million last year. A strong manufacturing industry would be more independent of external forces than either military expenditures or tourism. But to achieve that position of strength, the adverse effects of the vast distances between material and market must be overcome through reductions in cost.

The most critical item of cost affecting both manufacturing and East-West trade is the high cost of energy in Hawaii. It is vital and just that Hawaii be allowed access to material at the lowest possible cost to offset higher transportation costs. Fuels, petroleum in this case, are the foundation of any economy. Lower cost energy will reduce production costs and place Hawaii in a more competitive position thus increasing exports and encouraging new enterprises.

Hawaii presently suffers from one of the highest costs of living in the United States. In fact, many of our people in dire need are unable to benefit from federal programs because national poverty guidelines do not recognize the cost of living differential. The general consumer interest will be served by the lower energy costs which would result from Oil Import Quota elimination. We can anticipate a lower cost of electricity and other utilities and all goods and services which prices reflect the cost of energy, in addition to the lower gasoline and oil products.

The Mandatory Oil Import Quota has been extremely expensive for Hawaii's citizens. The state presently sustains one oil refinery which processes some 33,000 barrels of oil per day, of which 97% is foreign crude. Under the Oil Import Quota system, the Hawaiian refinery is granted a quota of only 1,500 barrels. The remaining portion of the foreign oil is received under "exchange agreements" with other quota licensees on a 1 to 1 ration, under Section 17(b)(3) of the OIA rules.

Therefore, the operator has stated that they must charge consumers of the State of Hawaii as if high priced domestic crude were used. The differential between domestic oil and foreign oil landed in Hawaii is approximately 70¢ to 95¢ per barrel. The resultant $14–20 million difference may not be a large amount for other states, but for Hawaii, it is a tremendous burden on its small population and economy. (See Exhibits A and B attached hereto.)

As another example of the effect of this program on our citizens is gasoline prices. We have been informed by one of the major oil companies that their tank wagon price to dealers in Honolulu is a stable 18.4¢ per gallon. They have indicated that in some areas such as Los Angeles, they have gone as low as 12.94¢ per gallon in response to competition. (See Exhibit C attached hereto.) (Governor's statement July 10, 1969, Introductory statement and answers to questions 1 and 28. Also rebuttal statement dated August 13, 1969.)

We would like to state in passing, that Hawaii has applied for a foreign trade subzone refinery that would process approximately 29,000 barrels per day. U.S. Customs statistics for 1968 show that 11 million barrels of jet fuel and fuel oil, having a total import value of $34 million, was brought into the State of Hawaii "in bond" from foreign sources. The proposed foreign trade sub-zone refinery would not endanger the import quota program but, in fact, would enhance the nation's security by enhancing our national balance of payments. Hawaii would like to displace in part the foreign "in bond" fuel by processing relatively low cost foreign crude oil in the sub-zone. (See answer to question #31 in Governor's statement July 10, 1969. Also rebuttal dated August 13, 1969.)

We would also like to comment on the recent large discovery of crude oil in Alaska, a state that is part of District V. We feel that even if Alaskan crude may be competitive in price to foreign crude, Hawaii will not benefit from such prices since we are required to use high cost U.S. flag carriers under the Jones Act. Changes to the Jones Act should be made as it applies to noncontiguous states. (Jones Act covered in Governor Burns' answer to question #27 in statement dated July 10, 1969.)

To summarize then, in light of the unique geographic position of Hawaii, the uncertain future of some basic industries; the fast growing population; plus the vast distances between material and markets—we hold that the present position of the State of Hawaii in the mandatory oil import program places undue burdens upon the people and economy of the State.

THE NIXON WAR: A GROWING DANGER

(Mrs. MINK asked and was given permission to revise and extend her remarks at this point in the RECORD, and to include extraneous material.)

Mrs. MINK. Mr. Speaker, the administration's blatant efforts to intimidate the press coupled with the current drive to smother congressional criticism by a call for patriotism and unity stand as direct threats to our constitutional liberties. This frenzied, unthinking attack on free speech and debate marks a turning point in an administration which promised to "bring us together" and which pledged to "lower our voices." Now the theme is that all who have different views are "liberal Communists," making them all traitors; and those who remain silent, agree with the President, and are the only true patriots. I shudder to think what else might be discussed at the breakfast table of our Attorney General. We had better hurry up and repeal title II of the Internal Security Act or the use of detention camps might again become the passion of the day as in World War II.

I call to the attention of my colleagues an editorial in the November 18 issue of the Honolulu Advertiser, titled "A Growing Danger," which reads as follows:

A GROWING DANGER

Moratorium II has come and gone, leaving the country just where it was on Vietnam.

Although a separate band of extremists did perpetrate some violence in Washington, the march activities in the capital did not bear out the Justice Department's apprehensions.

On the whole, the march was orderly, decorous, restrained.

President Nixon, meantime, went to elaborate lengths to publicize that the White House was operating "normally"—unmoved by the activity in the street outside.

The President is banking on the "silent majority" to support his approach to ending the Vietnam war, and there is evidence that the support is substantial.

As we have said earlier, the activists who demand immediate withdrawal would be well advised to take note of what appears to be growing sentiment behind the President.

That sentiment may be based in part on increasing impatience with the demands and demonstrations of the activists and their failure to show the slightest sympathy for the President's difficulties.

The country faces the danger of greater and greater polarization and, along with it, hostility. The activists are contributing to this—but so, unhappily, is the Administration.

The activists have a responsibility to try to reverse this trend. But so does the President, precisely because he is the President—one who entered office pledging to unify the nation.

It is natural and expected for any President to defend and advocate the policies he deems best for the country. And President Nixon is correct that foreign policy cannot be made in the streets.

American policy can and must be shaped by popular sentiment in its broad form—and this is certainly what has happened. The anti-war elements have long since won the argument; this country is going to get out of Vietnam as quickly as it can.

Where the activists err is that they now insist on dictating the details—in this case, immediate withdrawal—and the President rightly resists them.

It is not the President's attitude toward the peace demonstrations that disturbs us but the ways in which that attitude is being manifested by Administration spokesmen.

The hard-line statements from the Justice Department and the series of intemperate comments by Vice President Agnew are the most discouraging examples.

The inevitable consequence of such an approach is to solidify and further embitter the opposition—and to more deeply split the nation.

Despite the administration's strong-arm operation and cursory reports of national polls there is evidence that the silent majority is not backing a policy of maintaining semipermanent U.S. force in Vietnam as the President's program suggests. According to public opinion expert Louis Harris, in a speech made in Hawaii on November 17, 1969, 81 percent of the American people agree that the questions raised by the antiwar demonstrators ought to be discussed and answered—a public demand in direct opposition to the Nixon-Agnew approach of silencing the opposition with no debate or answer to their questions.

The Honolulu Advertiser on November 19 and the Honolulu Star-Bulletin on November 18 both reported Mr. Harris' speech which I commend to the attention of my colleagues and insert in the RECORD at this point:

[From the Honolulu Star-Bulletin, Nov. 18, 1969]

POLLSTER HARRIS SAYS AMERICANS WANT HONORABLE END TO THE WAR

America's people are "sorely troubled and taxed emotionally by a war they didn't ask for, but one they would like to see end on relatively honorable terms."

This is the conclusion of Louis Harris, who conducts the syndicated Harris Poll, and who has spent a lifetime as a reporter of public opinion and as a working journalist.

Harris, speaking yesterday to the National Wholesale Druggists' Association convention at the Hilton Hawaiian Village Hotel, painted a grim picture of life in America today.

He said the Vietnam war has deeply divided the country and "All but made a shambles of national unity."

Americans find it intolerable as a people, he said, to expend our blood or treasure in a war without end, a war that will likely end in a stalemate.

He said 81 percent of the American people agree that the antiwar demonstrators may not be entirely right, but the questions they raise ought to be discussed and answered.

He said a majority of the people feel uneasy that Hanoi finds comfort in antiwar demonstrations, but a majority also believes the President was wrong to see he would pay no attention to the protests.

President Nixon's plan for gradual troop withdrawal from Vietnam has the support of "a big majority," Harris said. But a majority of the people also have no faith the "Vietnamization" part of the Nixon plan will work.

"They would like the war to end on honorable terms—which means simply not a Communist takeover," Harris said.

"We are sharply and deeply divided as a nation," he warned.

Two new coalitions are shaping up, he said. One is for "no change," and it draws its chief strength from whites in the Deep South, conservatives, and lower middle income whites from the industrial North.

The coalition "for change" is made up of blacks, Spanish-speaking people, the young and the college-educated, he said.

He outlined the issues which are likely to be with us through the next decade.

Our role as a superpower in the world, and what the limits of that power should be—

The question of race.

The ability of society to cope with nonconformity in manners, styles and taste.

He said the coalition "for change" should be in the majority in 1976—but the question is not whether there are more people "for change" or more people "against change" in manners, morals and mores.

"The challenge . . . is how America can survive and how the quality of life in this country and throughout the world can be made better," he said.

He said we must learn how to control war—how to bring population growth and food into proper balance—how to share our wealth—how to bring justice and equality to black and Spanish-speaking people "who will soon be over one in every four Americans."

"A generation from now they will ask of all of us—where were you in this great turning period?" he concluded.

And he said the answer cannot be taken for granted, nor can the obligation of every man.

"Tomorrow may be too late."

[From the Honolulu Advertiser, Nov. 19, 1969]

PROTEST FOES HELD NOT NECESSARILY PROWAR

If you don't like demonstrations against the Vietnam war, does that make you part of a "silent majority" in support of the war?

Nothing of the sort, says the man who earned his reputation tapping the opinions of Americans.

"All of this might make headline rhetoric, but it is not likely to wash with the real majority of Americans," pollster Louis Harris told a meeting of the National Wholesale Druggists' Association at the Hilton Hawaiian Village Monday.

Harris made his remarks against the background of the antiwar moratoriam of Oct. 15 and the past weekend, and President Nixon's speech earlier this month appealing to the support of the "silent majority."

"An important distinction had best be made here and now," he said. "At a time when no more than 30 per cent of the public credited Lyndon Johnson with positive marks on his handling of the war, 84 per cent also wanted to see the anti-Vietnam protesters cracked down on by the government.

"How could this discrepancy exist? If people were so down on protesters, why weren't they in favor of the government's policy on that war?

"The fact is that after 20 years involvement in a Cold War that grew hot in Korea and again in Vietnam, the American people have become more sophisticated than much of the elected leadership of both political parties gives them credit for."

Harris said the Washington demonstrators had no right to expect people who feel the war is morally wrong to follow or support their "violent or irresponsible acts."

Also, the Nixon Administration will be "making a serious mistake if it equates opposition to the extremist protesters with support of its stand on Vietnam."

Harris said that a recent poll he took for Time magazine showed that 80 per cent of the "silent majority" said they were "fed up and tired of the war," and that over 60 per cent expected no early end to the American involvement in the war.

Moreover, Harris said, Americans by a 2 to 1 margin hold the view that the war is unlikely to end in a negotiated settlement, and that "pluralities of the public as well as the leadership of the country favor a unilateral ceasefire." They also believe Vietnam was headed for a Communist government no matter what the U.S. did, he said.

"Taken at their face value, these results hardly add up to a waiting and eager 'silent majority' ready to spring to support of a policy designed to continue American involvement in the fighting," Harris said.

Harris said that Nixon "won kind of a Scotch decision" by not shooting for a negotiated settlement. The majority of Americans never felt the war could be ended by negotiations, he said.

"He has abandoned a course people never did have much faith in," Harris said.

Referring to Nixon's recent policy speech, Harris said the withdrawal portion meets with approval of 73 per cent of Americans.

"Furthermore, two out of three people are happy to have a phased withdrawal, a 'winding down' of the war over a period of time, but not too long. Six in ten Americans now oppose a precipitate withdrawal," Harris said.

But the second major element of Nixon's speech—the "Vietnamization" of the war—guns against the grain of American opinion, he said.

"No more than 22 per cent of the American people have any real faith in the ability of the ARVN (government troops) to hold up their end as U.S. combat replacements. By 2 to 1 margin, a majority, largely silent up to now, believes that if the U.S. withdraws its fighting troops, the Communists will win the war."

Harris said that most Americans do not believe that the Thieu-Ky government is backed by popular support. They also doubt whether the Communists have that backing.

But a majority of Americans feel that the Communists are most likely to survive. Yet, in his Time-poll, Harris found that eight in 10 Americans would hold it against Nixon "if the Communists took over there.

"The people are, therefore, also opposed to a coalition with the Communists as a settlement, although the leadership group in the country is not," Harris said.

"So, on the Nixon plan to wind down American involvement in Vietnam, a big majority supports the withdrawal of U.S. troops, but a majority also has virtually no faith that the Vietnamization part of the bargain will really work.

"The plain truth is that the vast bulk of the American people would like to get out of Vietnam, but they would like the war to end on honorable terms—which means simply not a Communist takeover," Harris said.

Harris said that government decisions should lead, not follow, the views of the majority.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows to:

Mr. HANNA (at the request of Mr. ALBERT), for December 1 and December 2, on account of official business.

Mr. MONTGOMERY (at the request of Mr. JONES of Tennessee), for today, on account of official business.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED

Bills of the Senate of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

S. 19. An act to reimburse certain persons for amounts contributed to the Department of the Interior; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 497. An act for the relief of the estate of Capt. John N. Laycock, U.S. Navy (retired); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 1678. An act for the relief of Robert C. Szabo; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 3180. An act to adjust the salaries of judges in the government of the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. FRIEDEL, from the Committee on House Administration, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H.R. 9906. An act for the relief of J. Burdette Shaft and John S. and Betty Gingas; and

H.R. 14020. An act to amend the Second Liberty Bond Act to increase the maximum interest rates permitted on U.S. savings bonds.

BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. FRIEDEL, from the Committee on House Administration, reported that that committee did on this day present to the President, for his approval, bills of the House of the following titles:

H.R. 9906. An act for the relief of J. Burdette Shaft and John S. and Betty Gingas; and

H.R. 14020. An act to amend the Second Liberty Bond Act to increase the maximum interest rate permitted on U.S. savings bonds.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 5 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, December 2, 1969, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1363. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report of the examination of the financial statements of the Federal National Mortgage Association for fiscal year 1968, Department of Housing and Urban Development (H. Doc. No. 91-200); to the Committee on Government Operations and ordered to be printed.

1364. A letter from the Administrator of General Services, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to authorize the disposal of refractory grade chromite from the national stockpile and the supplemental stockpile; to the Committee on Armed Services.

1365. A letter from the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense (Installations and Housing), transmitting notification of the location, nature, and estimated cost of certain facilities projects proposed to be undertaken for the Air National Guard, together with notification that certain projects previously included in letters of notification have been cancelled, pursuant to the provisions of 10 U.S.C. 2233a(1); to the Committee on Armed Services.

1366. A letter from the Assistant Administrator for Program and Policy, Agency for International Development, Department of State, transmitting a quarterly report on the programing and obligation of contingency funds for the first quarter of fiscal year 1970, pursuant to the provisions of section 451(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

1367. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on the questionable need for overtime at selected installations of the Army, Navy, and Air Force; to the Committee on Government Operations.

1368. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report of a survey of the Nike-X antiballistic missile development program, indicating a need for management improvements, Department of the Army; to the Committee on Government Operations.

1369. A letter from the Commissioner, Immigration and Naturalization Service, U.S. Department of Justice, transmitting copies of orders entered in the cases of certain aliens found admissible to the United States under the provisions of section 212(a)(28)(I)(ii) of the Immigration and Nationality Act; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1370. A letter from the Chairman, John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts, transmitting the annual status and financial report on the Center for fiscal year 1969, pursuant to the provisions of Public Law 85-874; to the Committee on Public Works.

SENATE—Monday, December 1, 1969

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a.m. and was called to order by the Acting President pro tempore (Mr. METCALF).

"Not alone for mighty empire, stretching far o'er land and sea;
Not alone for bounteous harvests, lift
we up our hearts to Thee.
Standing in the living present, memory and hope between,
Lord, we would with deep thanksgiving, praise Thee most for things unseen."

—WILLIAM P. MERRILL.

As we praise Thee, Lord, for things unseen, we ask Thy presence with us in the daily duties which are seen. Make us apt and able for this day. When we are weak, make us strong. When we have fear, give us courage. When we are lonely, be our companion. And enable us so to work and live that we may be used by Thee for the making of a better Nation and the establishment of Thy kingdom among all men. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, November 26, 1969, be dispensed with.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Leonard, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Acting President pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

LIMITATION ON STATEMENTS DURING TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that statements in relation to the transaction of routine morning business be limited to 3 minutes.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

WAIVER OF CALL OF THE CALENDAR

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the call of the legislative calendar, under rule VIII, be dispensed with.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE MEETINGS DURING SENATE SESSION

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that all committees be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMERICAN INVOLVEMENT IN THE PHILIPPINES

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, Senator SYMINGTON's subcommittee recently completed a series of hearings concerning American involvement in the Philippines. Although substantial portions of those hearings were deleted by the Department of Defense for security purposes, there still is a tremendous amount of new information now being made public for the first time.

Ward Just, of the Washington Post, did a brief summary of some of the more interesting parts of the subcommittee hearings, and it was published in the Washington Post of Sunday, November 30.

I hope my colleagues will read this article and that it will encourage other members of the press to take a more careful look at the published hearings of the Symington subcommittee.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Ward Just article be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR AFFAIR WITH THE PHILIPPINES

(By Ward Just)

In the fall of 1966, to a certain amount of fanfare in the United States, the Philippines sent a detachment of 2,200 men to South Vietnam to fight the war. The unit was known as PHILCAG—Philippines Civic Action Group—and was cited by the Johnson administration as yet another example of the support the American position had from "the free world" on the rim of Asia. At the time, President Johnson expressed his "deep satisfaction" and that of the American people at the evidence of Filipino support. President Ferdinand Marcos, addressing a Joint Session of Congress in Washington, proposed an American defensive shield for non-Communist Asia. He told the Congress: "Our object must be to hold the line in Vietnam and at least to roll back Communist power behind the 17th parallel."

To anyone who looked closely at it (and there were a few who did), the Marcos position seemed a speck contradictory. If he felt so strongly about rolling back Communist power, why was he committing only 2,200 troops to South Vietnam, and noncombatants at that? Why were Americans not using Clark Air Base to fly bombing missions against South Vietnam?

Well, now we have some of the answers from Senator Symington's Subcommittee on United States Security Agreements and Commitments Abroad, whose report on the Philippines was made public last week (reports on Thailand, Taiwan, and Laos will follow). It is an extraordinary document, mined with wonderful ironies and absurdities all of which combine to throw the United States into a lover's embrace with a country whose people probably don't want us around at all, and a government whose principal preoccupation is cash. And PHILCAG? The short answer is that the Johnson administration bought it lock, stock and barrel for payments totaling about $38 million. But that is only the tip of the iceberg.

The testimony shows that the U.S. is bound to the Phillipines in a cat's cradle of alliance. Some of this is based on the SEATO treaty, some of it bilateral, related to (1) the maintenance of our own bases and (2) the supposed threat from China or the Soviet Union; other parts are based on the internal problems caused by the half-Communist, half-gangster apparatus of the Huks; still others appear to be obligations relating to PHILCAG. It is extremely difficult to sort out which threat relates to which commitment, and vice versa. Is the air base at Mactan (maintained at $4 million a year, it has six sorties a day by U.S. aircraft, but is used by Philippine commercial airlines) kept as an auxiliary in case of Communist attack, as a payoff for Clark and Subic Bay, as a quid pro quo for PHILCAG, or merely because it is there? Similarly, the Huks. There was this exchange between Senator Symington and Lt. Gen. Robert H. Warren, Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for military assistance and sales:

Warren: (The U.S. aid) is also to help the Filipino forces to physically protect American forces (in the Philippines).

Symington: From whom?

Warren: Internally, sir; to maintain internal security and stability and, thereby, make our own activities over there more secure.

Symington: In other words we are paying the Philippine government to protect us from the Philippine people who do not agree with the policies of the government or who do not like Americans?

Warren: To a degree, yes, sir.

That U.S. aid included payment for a battalion of Philippine troops whose casualties in pursuit of the dreaded Huks have been less than a dozen, and many of those in nonwar-related activities.

The Americans had supplied the Marcos government with a squadron of 22 F–5 fighter aircraft (cost: $15 million), and the rationale for that was that the Philippines would then be able to defend itself against attack. There was this exchange between Symington and Lt. Gen. Francis G. Gideon, commander of the American 13th Air Force at Clark Air Base:

Symington: . . . Who would attack the Philippines from the air?

Gideon: The current principal threats are the Chicom air force and the U.S.S.R.

Symington: Where would the Soviet planes come from . . . ?

Gideon: Well, there are five or six bases . . .

Symington: What type plane would they use? They would have to use Bears or Bisons (two types of Soviet long-range aircraft).

Gideon: Yes, sir.

Symington: That is a pretty theoretical danger. That plane is comparable to the old B–36. I imagine that danger scares you all pretty bad. What would you do as they went by places like Okinawa? Wave at them?

What emerges from this hearing is that the United States is paying the Philippines for the privilege of defending it against attack. Apart from the $38 million for PHILCAG, there is $22.5 million a year for military assistance, and beyond that the very considerable boost to the Philippine economy from the American bases—air force bases at Clark, Mactan, and John Hay, and naval bases at Subic, Sangley and San Miguel, among others. In all, there are 20 American military stations in the Philippines, which pump an estimated $150 million a year into the economy. This is what has resulted from a treaty in 1947 which said that the two countries would act to meet outside threats "in accordance with its constitutional processes." By 1964, the language had escalated to a point where an attack on the Philippines would be considered by the United States as an attack upon itself and, as such, "instantly repelled." The bases grew along with the language, each keeping pace with the other and none of it reviewed by the Congress—which should have.

That would seem to be the point of PHILCAG. As Senator Fulbright put it: "My own feeling is that all we did was go out and hire the soldiers in order to support our then-administration's view that so many people were in sympathy with our war in Vietnam, and we paid a very high price for it." What is not generally understood about the Symington hearings is that an extraordinary amount of spadework has been needed to pry out what facts there are about our commitment to the Philippines. As it is, there are about two dozen blank pages in the report with only the word [deleted] to indicate what they contain. In fact, they are investigative summaries of theft, assault, murder and homicide around the American bases.

The Philippine commitment acquired a momentum of its own, of a depth and variety out of all proportion to the need—as the military witnesses before the committee candidly conceded. State Department officials with a stake in past policy, military officials with their hardware to deploy—all of them collaborated in the lover's embrace which costs the taxpayer upwards of—what?—$30 million a year, $50 million?

And what of PHILCAG?

An American official with wide experience in South Vietnam was queried on the matter the other day, and replied, "Oh yes, PHILCAG. They operated in Tay Ninh Province. They, ah, built one Potemkin village, which was largely to impress VIPs. They were very active in the PX. I think they built some roads . . ."

The official might have added that in three years, the unit lost 8 killed and 17 wounded in an area considered hostile. Only recently, apparently anticipating the Symington Committee report, President Marcos announced that the unit was being withdrawn. He also said that there were no American payments for the maintenance of the unit in South Vietnam. Someone ought to look into that. Where did the $38 million go?

THE SONG MY INCIDENT

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, Miss Mary McGrory, one of the best commentators in Washington, has written two perceptive and sensitive articles about the massacres of Song My.

One article is entitled "Silence Greets Viet Massacres." The silence is, I believe, temporary, and is due to the revulsion, the horror, with which most Americans regard this ominous reversion to primitive savagery.

I am confident that the vast majority of our people are revolted by this occurrence and will use their influence to bring this tragic conflict to an early termination.

I ask unanimous consent to have the articles printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SILENCE GREETS VIET MASSACRES

The reaction to reports of mass murder in a Vietnam village by American GIs has been outrage in London, silence in Washington and dismissal in Saigon.

In Britain, the alleged atrocities have created a government crisis and Harold Wilson summoned Ambassador John Freeman home to help him avert a debate on U.S. Vietnam policy in the House of Commons.

The Army announced that Lt. William J. Calley Jr. will face court-martial on charges of killing "109 Oriental human beings, occupants of the village of My Lai." The South Vietnamese government repeated its contention that "no massacre occurred."

The President gave out three Medals of Honor, and chatted with the returned astronauts. The Senate debated the tax bill and the House of Representatives talked about a subway system for the District of Columbia.

Two requests have been made for investigations by military committees of Congress. The public, busy writing letters in support of Vice President Agnew's attack on the press, has not been heard from.

The grisly story is being told in bits and pieces, as GIs around the country stand up to tell what they know about an event that was kept secret by the Army for 20 months.

Last night, a former GI named Paul Meadlo told a CBS audience that he had shot "about 15 or 20 villagers—and babies" under specific orders from Lt. Calley. He felt it was the right thing at the time because he had lost "a damned good buddy, Bobby Wilson," but later felt, after he had stepped on a land mine that God had punished him. It has been on his conscience.

The country's conscience, so far, has not been touched, by these and other recitals. The indignation is all imported. It could be a case of "all passion spent." The last weeks have brought the President's speech, the peace demonstrations, the hardening of attitudes. Is the public resigned, callous or indifferent, to an incident that has been compared in the European press to the Nazi savagery at Lidice? Is it an inability or a refusal to believe that American GIs would kill women and children in cold blood?

Even the bare charges against Lt. Calley do some damage to the President's contention that our continued presence is imperative to avert a "bloodbath." Already the Sept. 26 boast that "we have reversed world public opinion" is eroded.

The Pentagon has withheld comment "to avoid prejudicing the lieutenant's case. But it withheld publication of the incident since March 1968. Its first investigation led to the current Saigon conclusion that it was artillery fire. Its second was precipitated by the personal inquiry of Richard Ridenhour, a Vietnam veteran now studying at California's Claremont College. Neither a participant nor a witness, Ridenhour interviewed other GIs who knew about "Pinkville" and reported his findings in letters to high government officials, including Defense Secretary Melvin R. Laird.

The story was broken by Seymour M. Hersh, a 32-year-old Washington free-lance writer, who was brought up in Chicago's "Front Page" school of newspapering. Hersh, a fast-talking, fast-moving former Pentagon reporter with the Associated Press, was briefly Sen. Eugene McCarthy's campaign press secretary, and is the author of a book about chemical and biological warfare.

Hersh is against the war, but resents a London newspaper's designation of him as a "left-wing nut." He first heard of "Pinkville" through the tip of an old friend in the Pentagon who told him early in October merely that "the Army has a man in court-martial at Fort Benning, and they have accused him of killing 75 Vietnamese civilians."

Hersh was "horrified," dropped work on a book about the Pentagon, "The Ultimate Corporation," and started out on the trail. He got the name of George W. Latimer, Calley's counsel, flew to Salt Lake City to talk to him.

He got no specifics from Latimer, only "a sense of the dimensions of the story." He applied for and got a $1,000 grant from the Philip M. Stern Foundation for investigative journalism and started flying around the country to find sources.

He went to Fort Benning and trudged around for two days before he found Lt. Calley, who in a lengthy talk told him, "I'm for the Army." He wrote his first account on Nov. 13. The next day, Ridenhour called the Los Angeles Times and told them he had much more information. Ridenhour had offered his story to Life and Newsweek which had turned it down. Hersh dashed to Los Angeles to talk to Ridenhour, who gave him the names of the GI's he had interviewed.

Meantime, Hersh also visited hawks on military committees on Capitol Hill—"doves are never told anything." They had heard of Pinkville and believed it, but advised him not to write anything because "it won't do much good for the Army."

Hersh had, from his Pentagon days, no trouble believing that the "Army could know about a case like this and was proceeding to do nothing about it."

"They were shipping nerve gas around like it was going out of style, running it through the countryside without telling people, at night, through cities. I thought it was an unspeakable act."

Hersh thinks that the country is suffering a delayed reaction to the horrors now unfolding, partly due to the official denials.

"But this is so clear," he says, "we're doing exactly the things we went into the war to stop."

WHERE OUR CONSCIENCE DIED

Song My has revealed the full devastation of the war. Song My has told us not only what Americans have done to Vietnam but what Vietnam has done to Americans. The country's conscience, apparently, died in that Asian village with the old men, the women and the children.

The reaction to the reports of mass murder by American soldiers has been not horror at what happened, but rage at the messengers who are bringing the news.

The South Vietnamese government, anxious to save the American presence, says it never happened. And, until today, the American government, anxious to save the war, had said nothing.

An administration which fulminated at length against even the prospect of violence on Pennsylvania Avenue during the recent peace march, seemed reluctant to comment about slaughter in Song My.

Before today, the one expression from an administration official was given behind closed doors. Secretary of Defense Melvin R. Laird, testifying in secret session before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said he was "shocked and sick" at the allegations, long suppressed by the Army.

In the Senate, two members rose up, one to inveigh against the Army for bringing charges against an officer for "a mistake in judgment . . . under pressure of combat"; the other to condemn the CBS's television network for bringing to the home screen a young ex-GI who said he thought he had shot 15 or 20 people under orders from his lieutenant.

The interviewer, Mike Wallace, was inundated by abusive phone calls. Of 110, all but two berated him for "giving that boy a hard time." The network received many messages, a typical one saying, "Agnew was right. Wallace is pimping for the protestors."

Americans, who once united to protest against the Nazis, do not want to hear about atrocities committed by Americans, who like themselves, have become moral casualties of the war.

The war first was presented to them by a previous administration as necessary to avert another Munich, by this one as a struggle for survival. The country has suffered three assassinations, countless riots. And now, it seems the moral standards of a small, fanatical, underdeveloped country have been adopted as our own.

After all, it is said, look what the Communists did at Hue. They destroyed 3,000 "Oriental human beings," to borrow from the terms of the indictment of Lt. Calley. The death toll at Song My is not known, but surely less and the blame reduced proportionately. The quantitative standard is almost certain to prevail in a war where the only known measure for progress, and oft-proclaimed, imminent success was the body count. They were "gooks" to the young soldier who helped shoot them, and Communist gooks besides, even the babies, presumably.

The President understands that Americans do not want to hear bad things about other Americans who are helping to save a gallant little nation from a savage invader. The day after the shame of Song My was proclaimed by the court-martial announcement, President Nixon held a levee for the press. America was abandoning germ warfare and would never strike first with lethal chemical weapons.

He not only told Americans what he had done but what they should think about it. "By the examples we set today, we hope to contribute to an atmosphere of peace and understanding between nations and among men," he said.

The image of a high-minded humanitarian nation was thus restored, by an action delayed 44 years, which the White House says is in no way related to the sick story of Song My.

Once before the administration overcame a report that laid bare the brutalization of Americans by the war. In September it was revealed that Marines had been tortured in the brig of Camp Pendleton, a Marine base that abuts the summer White House in San Clemente.

Four days later, Henry Cabot Lodge stood up and made a 49-minute speech about the inhumane treatment accorded American prisoners by their North Vietnamese captors, blanketing a simultaneous admission by the commandant of Pendleton that there had been mistreatment.

Since then, Americans have been conditioned to equate support of the war with patriotism and protest with president-breaking.

Song My cannot be so easily bypassed. It is here to stay, a reminder to America that it is really not different from any other country.

A distraught young Wilmington, Del., church worker called this newspaper to say that, after reading the transcript of the GI interview, he thought the only way he could register his revulsion, guilt and frustration was to renounce his citizenship.

"I read this sign on cars that say 'America, love it or leave it.' How can I love it when it does these things?"

SHIRER AND THE MUNICH SYNDROME

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, in the Saturday Review of November 8, 1969, appeared a most interesting and perceptive article by Mr. David Schoenbrun, entitled "Shirer and the Munich Syndrome." I believe that the Members of this body will be interested in what one of the best informed commentators in this country has to say about this subject. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SHIRER AND THE MUNICH SYNDROME

(By David Schoenbrun)

Once upon a time, in the golden summer of 1925, France reigned supreme in the world, supreme in arms and arts and joy of living. The nightmare of the German threat had receded, with Germany forbidden by the Versailles Treaty to build warplanes, tanks, heavy guns, submarines or battleships, and saddled with reparations. Britain, the island empire, saw her colonies clamoring for independence. Russia was still staggering from the shock of the Bolshevik Revolution and years of civil war. The United States, weak, unarmed, isolationist, had turned its back on the League of Nations. France was a great power on the continent of Europe and in the world, with an empire sprawling over four and one half million miles of Africa, the Near East, and Asia, containing a population of 100 million and vast wealth in raw materials.

France's military power was matched and surpassed by the brilliance of her culture, which radiated around the world like a beacon, drawing the most creative talents to Paris from all corners of the earth. In Tokyo Seritzawa wrote a best-seller entitled I Want to Die in Paris, while Nagai composed his modern Japanese classic, Tales of France. Chinese scholars and young revolutionaries came to study in Paris, capital of two masters of philosophy, Lu and Man—the Chinese pronunciation of the names Rousseau and Montesquieu. Picasso, a Spaniard, and Modigliani, an Italian, followed in the path of Van Gogh the Dutchman to make the Ecole de Paris the greatest since the Renaissance.

Above all, fleeing the arid régimes of Harding and Coolidge, Americans flocked to Paris. From the Right Bank haunts of Hemingway and Fitzgerald—the Ritz and Harry's New York Bar—to the Luxembourg Garden home of Gertrude Stein on the Left Bank and Isadora Duncan's Montparnasse studio with its all-night parties, one could orbit through an extraordinary galaxy of stars; James Joyce, John Dos Passos, John Steinbeck, E. E. Cummings, W. B. Yeats, Kay Boyle, Ezra Pound, Djuna Barnes, Glenway Wescott, and Eugene Jolas, editor of transition, which proclaimed "revolution of the word." Sinclair Lewis, Santayana, and Sherwood Anderson joined with Valéry, Claudel, and Gide to discuss the works of Marcel Proust, who had died in 1922 and whose novels, finished just before his death, were published posthumously, the last in 1951. Even funerals were inspiring events; one of the greatest cortèges in history was offered as a hero's tribute to Anatole France when he died in 1924.

Among the great, the near-great, and the to-be-great who lived, loved, and worked in that golden age of Paris was a quiet, sober, earnest young man who arrived, new diploma in hand, to seek a job on the Paris Herald. His name was William L. Shirer. He did more listening than talking, and painstakingly recorded everything he heard, saw, or read. Decades later his voluminous diaries would bring him fame and fortune and provide historians with invaluable source material, as Shirer himself developed from journalist to historian of twentieth-century Germany and France.

In The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich Shirer compiled a monumental history of the Nazi nightmare. He seemed to have been everywhere when anything important was happening. He deepened and broadened his eye-witness record by burrowing through mountains of archives, secret reports, and captured Nazi documents. Perhaps less brilliant and less creative than his contemporaries of the Twenties, Shirer offered total recall, dogged perseverance, and massive research in place of word-paintings and poetry.

But Shirer's contribution to an understanding of our time may yet prove no less valuable and enduring than the creative efforts of more gifted men. His reputation as a contemporary historian, launched by his study of the Third Reich, has now been solidly confirmed by an equally massive work on France, The Collapse of the Third Republic. Modestly subtitled "An Inquiry Into the Fall of France in 1940," it is in fact much more than an "inquiry." It is a typical Shirer monument of personal observation over more than thirty years, drawn from his inexhaustible diaries plus ten years of concentrated research in Paris. Shirer plowed through archives public and secret, conducted hundreds of interviews with the actors, principal and minor, in the rise and fall of the Third Republic of France, from the dazzling zenith of the 1920s to the degradation of the Thirties. Shirer describes in detail the almost unbelievable process of deterioration from June 1925 to the day in June 1940 when Hitler danced a jig on the Chaillot Heights overlooking the Eiffel Tower:

When, in 1925, fresh out of college, I had first come to live and work in Paris in the midst of a summer as lovely as the one just fifteen years later which would see its fall, France was the greatest power on the continent of Europe. Her hegemony, though frowned upon by her two principal allies, Great Britain and the United States, was acknowledged by all the nations. Her army, far superior to any other, stood watch on the Rhine . . . No other country on the Continent could challenge France's supremacy . . . Supreme in Europe, powerful in the world—such was the France in those days of the mid-Twenties. But that was not all. Paris again bloomed as the cultural capital of the world. . . . To all appearances France, despite her terrible blood-letting and the destruction of her richest départements in the north and northeast, had made a remarkable comeback. . . . Production, which had fallen in 1919 to 57 per cent of the 1913 level, had begun to mount. By 1923 it had risen to 88 per cent, surpassing the prewar level the next year and soaring to 126 per cent in 1926. The country was prosperous, the people relaxed, the Continent at last at peace . . . All of Europe relaxed in the new spirit of Locarno. Everywhere, and above all in France, there was a growing confidence in the League and even a feeling that its new member, Germany, was at last mending its ways, won over finally to the merits of democracy and a durable peace . . . A troublesome ultranationalist agitator in Bavaria, named Adolf Hitler, who had thundered that France, like Carthage, must be destroyed, had been imprisoned and then silenced by the government, and his party banned . . . From 1926, the year after I arrived, until the worldwide depression began to be seriously felt in 1931, there was a period of five years that later was remembered by French historians and memoirists as one of the happiest times of the Third Republic. Not since Napoleon, and before him Louis XIV, had France enjoyed such well-being. And in the last golden years of the 1920s the well-being was more equitably distributed than before. Even a young foreigner like myself felt he was living in as much of a paradise as coud be found on this imperfect earth. Civilization seemed to have reached a shining peak here.

Having painted the picture of a French Garden of Eden, Shirer goes on to look deeply beneath the surface bloom to find the snakes that would poison the political and economic health of France. The Bolshevik Revolution in Russia spawned the French Communist Party in 1920, so frightening the French upper and middle classes that the bourgeoisie began to regard French workers as more dangerous than the Germans. Political conflicts between Right and Left weakened the political structure, and Cabinets began to fall on an average of every ninety days. There was no French government in office when Hitler came to power, and none when the Nazis marched into the Rhineland. The political paralysis that was to freeze French action in all crises began in the golden decade.

France's wartime allies, Britain and America, opposed French demands for war reparations as excessive. Then the United States poured limitless loans into Germany while demanding the repayment of war debts by France, although the war had devastated France, not Germany. America, it seems, loves defeated enemies but cannot tolerate successful friends. The war had cost France 134 billion gold francs in goods and property, while one out of ten Frenchmen had been killed at the front. Shirer points out that "the youth, on whom the future of any nation depends, had been decimated most. Three out of ten of them between eighteen and twenty-eight had been snuffed out." Shirer enumerates the losses:

The intellectuals, so vital to the life of a country, had suffered the next heaviest casualties. Twenty-three out of every hundred men who had belonged to the liberal professions had perished in the trenches. Of 4,266,000 men wounded, a million and a half remained permanently maimed . . . Nearly a million and a half war dead, more than two million fewer births—this was the price of victory . . . France emerged from the conflict with a population of 39 millions. It faced a Germany with 63 million. And soon the Germans would be increasing in number at twice the rate of the French.

Shirer conducts an autopsy on the death of France with surgical precision, cutting through the beautiful body to expose the cancers within: the senility of the generals; the blind greed of the middle classes, who refused to pay taxes and sent their capital for investment abroad; the betrayal of France by the British, who negotiated with Hitler and Mussolini behind France's back and would not support any action to stop the Nazi aggressor. Perhaps the most important data in this exhaustive history is Shirer's description and analysis of the defeatism and appeasement that blinded and paralyzed the British and the French, who could have stopped Hitler in the Rhineland and later in the Sudetenland without even firing a shot. The story of Munich is well known, but Shirer brings to it a mass of new source materials and a gift for narrative that surmounts even the density of the documentation.

History can be a valuable guide to the present and the future, but it is not automatically reliable. Its lessons are no more enlightening than the wisdom of those who interpret them. History can be a trap as well as a guide, particularly the history of this period that has so marked the men who lived through it to become the leaders of the Western world in the Fifties and Sixties. They all suffer a deep-rooted Munich syndrome. It could be argued that the United States would never have become involved in Vietnam if men like Truman, Acheson, Dulles, Rusk, Johnson, and Nixon had not in their youth been so traumatized by the appeasement of Hitler that they vowed they would never make that mistake.

A generation of American historians, political scientists, and political leaders have remembered Munich and heeded the warning of Santayana that he who does not know history is condemned to relive it. This aphorism is true enough, but it is not an excuse for failing to distinguish between circumstances of the past and of the present. Another aphorism might be coined, the opposite of Santayana's, yet equally true: he who looks constantly backward will fall on his face.

That some leaders have been guilty of applying past lessons to a different set of present events is every day revealed. Rusk confused Ho Chi Minh, who sought national independence for a subject people in a small, weak country, with Hitler, head of a powerful nation seeking dominion over Europe. Even more recently we had a fresh and startling example of a man marked by the past, when Speaker of the House John W. McCormack urged Congress to vote for a huge military appropriations bill. McCormack said: "I wonder how many of you realize how close we came to losing World War II? I don't want to take a chance again."

The New York Times commented October 5 on McCormack's statement:

"Such references to the nation's tragic unpreparedness at the time of Pearl Harbor makes a strong, emotional appeal to those older Americans whose ideas on defense were formed—and fixed—by World War II experience. But they do not offer a rationale for judging security requirements in the 1970s. . . . In their common search for a more secure America in a peaceful world, ordinary citizens and their representatives in Congress have an obligation to cast off the simplistic illusions of a bygone era and come to grips with the complex realities of a more perilous age".

Shirer's history teaches us that isolationism is a defeatist policy and that dictators who seek vast dominion cannot be appeased out of their ambitions. But this does not mean that every adversary is Hitler, or that all revolutions are identical, or that the alternative to total isolationism is total interventionism. Surely there must be something in between—an enlightened internationalism, an understanding of common destinies and also of the limitations of national power that impose priorities even on the mightiest.

Shirer's studies of the rise and fall of the Third Republic and the Third Reich together give us new insights into one of the most tragic periods of man's history. These stories are interesting in and of themselves, but they are not sure charts to the future unless the future exactly replays the past—a very rare occurrence. Among the few constants in human affairs are man's capacity for self-destruction and the fallibility of experts. If there is any lesson to be drawn from the history of French decline from the peak to the pit in only fifteen years, it might be found in the contrasting rise in Germany and Japan, now that they have divested themselves of empires and the ambition for world dominion. The will to dominate has destroyed all great powers throughout history.

PUBLIC RELATIONS IN THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, last week, the Vice President gave us his critical view of a "small group of men" who—in Mr. AGNEW'S world—unbeknownst to most of us, help shape public opinion by deciding "what 40 to 50 million Americans will learn of the day's events in the Nation and in the world." Today, and for the next few days, I want to discuss another group of men who are working to shape public opinion. This group is perhaps not as small as that attacked by the Vice President—it is made up of approximately 2,800 men—but it is a group that is even lesser known to the public since its members are never seen or heard directly.

What is more important, however, is that this group of publicists is made up of Government employees and military men on active duty using Government equipment and facilities and all financed with taxpayers' money.

I am speaking of the vast apparatus that has quietly grown up over the past years to handle public relations and public information—and thus shape favorable public opinion toward the Department of Defense and the individual military services.

It is a group that obediently serves the administration aims and thus may not concern the Vice President, whose quest for objectivity appears to be directed at administration critics rather than supporters. But its existence should concern all those interested in preserving our democratic system and the traditions of the free press.

Ten years ago, Congress for the last time placed a limitation on the amount which the Department of Defense could spend on public relations and public information. The limit at that time was set at $2,755,000—a substantial sum nonetheless which could be used to promote what was then a $43 billion defense establishment.

In the years intervening between fiscal 1959 and this past fiscal year, the overall defense budget has almost doubled to more than $76 billion, including supplementals.

During that same time, the Defense Department public relations funds lacking any legislative restraint by limitation, had soared by last year to at least $27,953,000, according to figures supplied me by the Office of Secretary of Defense and the three military services. That represents a tenfold increase over 10 years ago and provides Defense with a fund of taxpayers' money that compares favorably to advertising budgets of large corporations in business to sell products to the public.

I would like to note that I believe the figures supplied me are conservative—they often leave out the cost of using military aircraft and many overhead costs to that activity; not only military aircraft but also aircraft carriers, destroyers, and many other extremely important investments of the Defense Department—and thus it would be fair to suggest the real total figure—if these other facilities were included—would be much larger.

It is one thing for the Defense Department to have employees available to provide—quickly and responsively—factual information both to the public and the press—upon request.

It is quite another when that Department and the individual military services use taxpayers' money to generate and promote public support for military weapons and military programs.

Some of us in the Senate who this year and in the past questioned one aspect or another of military spending have oftentimes been amazed at the rapidity with which the Pentagon can respond to get out its side of the story. And those of us sensitive to the feelings of constituents are frequently surprised at the widespread and sometimes adverse response from home that is quickly generated by something we have said that is critical of some weapons system or Pentagon policy.

In the past I have been satisfied to chalk these happenings up to promotional activities of the public relations men of defense-oriented corporations, the veterans groups, and what I thought until recently was a handful of Pentagon press men.

The disclosure during the recent ABM debate of the Starbird memorandum—drawn up by Pentagon officials—which depicted an ambitious, coordinated public relations program to promote that weapons system caused me to take a closer look at just what the Department of Defense was doing in this field.

The results of my inquiry convince me that the Senate and the public have little knowledge of the extent to which the Pentagon has been staffed and armed to promote itself through shaping public opinion using a varied arsenal of public relations weapons.

It also convinced me that an effort should be made to remove the public relations—as against public information—capability and reinstate the dollar limitation that was dropped ten years ago.

But before moving to take such a step on the upcoming Defense appropriations bill, I thought it only reasonable to lay before my colleagues and the public the facts I have been able to gather and thus stimulate public discussion well before the proposed legislation comes to the floor.

Vice President AGNEW's remarks only served to reconfirm my fears that an administration that actively desires to use the tremendous power and prestige of its high office to control the media in our free society can do great damage to our traditions. He spoke as part of an administration effort to stifle dissent. I am speaking of an administration program designed actively to promote support. And based on a recent book on the television aspects of last year's election, neither this President nor this administration can be considered unsophisticated in the use of the media.

Today I shall discuss the public relations activities of the Office of the Secretary of Defense. In the coming days I will deal with the individual services—each of which has its own substantial public relations program. Finally, I shall discuss what I hope to see done in this area—both through legislation and public discussion.

As of September 1, 1969, 200 military and civilian employees worked for the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Public Affairs or on OSD public affairs matters. Their activities cost $3,697,000 for fiscal 1969.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter which I received from Mr. Daniel Z. Henkin, Assistant Secretary of Defense, Public Affairs, and its attached memorandum dealing with public information principles, signed by the Secretary of Defense, Melvin R. Laird.

There being no objection, the letter and memorandum were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, D.C., September 3, 1969.

Hon. J. W. FULBRIGHT,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is in further reply to your letter of July 21 asking for information concerning the activities of my office.

The primary assigned responsibility of my office and the information offices of the Military Departments is to provide the American people with maximum information about the Department of Defense consistent with national security.

This primary responsibility was re-emphasized on March 4 in a memorandum from Secretary Laird, a copy of which is attached. The Secretary stated his intentions that the Department would conduct its activities in an open manner, that nothing would be classified solely to prevent criticism of the Department, and that propaganda has no place in DoD public information programs.

I wholeheartedly support the Secretary in these affirmations.

Another aspect of my responsibility involves the inter-relationships of the Office of the Secretary of Defense (OSD), Military Departments, the Joint Staff, and the Unified and Specified Commands, and, of course, close coordination is essential with the White House and State Department in national security public affairs matters. Some activities common to the Armed Forces are consolidated in my office; others are decentralized with broad policy guidance provided by my office. Our objective is to insure that public information efforts complement, but do not duplicate, each other to the maximum extent possible.

This office also is charged with the responsibility to provide public affairs policy guidance to the Unified and Specified Commands, to conduct seat-of-government coordination, and to perform public affairs functions for the JCS, which has no public affairs organization.

This office will continue to review its functions and organizational structure with the goal of enhancing our operational efficiency while achieving economies. I have effected a seven percent reduction in manpower spaces allocated to OASD(PA) since 1 July 1969. These reductions are reflected in the appropriate Tabs. Additional reductions are planned, such as the transfer of the Defense Industry Bulletin with three spaces to the Defense Supply Agency effective 1 October.

In direct response to your letter, the following paragraphs follow the sequence of the specific questions asked:

1. The approximate basic overall cost for FY 69, as provided by the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense (Administration), which is responsible for fiscal matters relating to my office and other OSD activities is as follows:

a. Civilian personnel	$1,340,900
b. Military personnel	2,091,000
c. Travel	83,800
d. Central service account	133,800
e. Printing defense industry bulletin	47,500
Total	3,697,000

2. Number of personnel (30 June 1969), (1 Sept 1969):

a. Military, officers	95	86
b. Military, enlisted	24	23
c. Civilian	95	91
Total	214	200

3. The answers to the questions in paragraph 3 of your letter are attached as Enclosure 1, tabbed to correspond to your subparagraphs.

I understand the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Manpower and Reserve Affairs has responded to your questions regarding the Office of Information for the Armed Forces, for which he is responsible.

I would be pleased to discuss with you or members of your staff any particular matters related to my responsibilities. If I can be of further assistance, please let me know.

Sincerely,

DANIEL Z. HENKIN.

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, D.C., March 4, 1969.

Memorandum for Secretaries of the Military Departments, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Director of Defense Research and Engineering, Assistant Secretaries of Defense, Assistants to the Secretary of Defense, Directors of the Defense Agencies.

Subject: Public Information Principles.

To assure that the American people are fully informed about matters of national defense, I intend that the Department of Defense shall conduct its activities in an open manner, consistent with the need for security. This means that unclassified information, other than that exempted by the Freedom of Information Act, must be readily accessible to the public and the press. Because of the importance I attach to this matter, I want to state certain principles which I expect to be followed in the conduct of public affairs activities of this Department.

1. Our first concern must be the security of the United States and the safety of our Armed Forces. Therefore, information which would adversely affect the security of our country or endanger our men should not be disclosed.

2. The provisions of the Freedom of Information Act (5 USC 552) will be supported in both letter and spirit.

3. No information will be classified solely because disclosure might result in criticism of the Department of Defense. To avoid abuse of classified procedures, we must adhere strictly to the criteria set forth in Executive Order 10–501.

4. Our obligation to provide the public with accurate, timely information on major Department of Defense programs will require, in some instances, detailed public information planning and coordination within the Department and with other government agencies. However, I want to emphasize that the sole purpose of such planning and coordination will be to expedite the flow of information to the public. Propaganda has no place in Department of Defense public information programs.

Therefore, I direct that each addressee review all pertinent directives, policies and public information plans to insure prompt and complete compliance with these principles. Those which do not meet the foregoing criteria will be revised or rescinded.

The Assistant Secretary of Defense (Public Affairs) is responsible for advising and assisting me in the fulfillment of these public information principles throughout the Department of Defense.

MELVIN R. LAIRD.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, in scope these public affairs activities range from:

First. A special office of seven persons responsible for coordinating Southeast Asian public affairs activity and briefing the Washington press and other groups on the Vietnam war;

Second. To another office which sponsored—with the State Department and USIA—tours of foreign journalists in the United States;

Third. To another which serves as a contact point for all media requests for film and videotape and, conversely, the distribution point for release of service-generated material to the media. On this point I would note that according to information supplied me, official film produced by the military departments and released last year to the media totaled 35,420 feet and was included in 284 separate news-film stories.

One Pentagon service intrigued me. According to information supplied, the Audio-Visual News Branch of the Office of Public Affairs produces something called Spotmaster, which is described as similar to Dial-the-Weather—and provides the latest Defense Department news release in audio form to anyone dialing Oxford 5–6201, a Pentagon number in Washington.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the brief summaries provided me on other activities carried on through the Office of Secretary of Defense.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TAB A TO ENCL 1 (SPECIAL ASSISTANT FOR SOUTHEAT ASIA)

As originally established, the Office of the Special Assistant for Southeast Asia is responsible for providing policy advice to the Assistant Secretary of Defense (Public Affairs) on public affairs matters concerning and related to Southeast Asia. In performing this function, it is essential for the members of the SEA staff to maintain expertise on all aspects of the Vietnam war and to establish close coordination with the Chief of Information at Headquarters Military Assistance Command, Vietnam to be fully aware of public affairs actions taken by that headquarters. In addition, close liaison is maintained with the State Department and White House to insure close coordination on public affairs matters concerning SEA. Each agency informs the others concerning public affairs aspects of activities properly in their particular area of responsibility.

In addition to the coordinating and policy considerations, the office also is responsible for providing briefings on the current Vietnam situation and historical aspects of the Vietnam war to press correspondents and to various groups qualified to receive DoD briefings on an unclassified basis. Background material is provided to the press on a continuing basis on request to permit them to adequately report and/or interpret the current situation in Vietnam.

As a result of a recent reorganization in the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense (Public Affairs), the Office of the Special Assistant for Southeast Asia was assigned full responsibility for replying to all press queries concerning SEA. This included responsibility for casualty reporting. This function was previously executed by the Director for Defense Information who coordinated all releases with the Special Assistant for Southeast Asia. The transfer of responsibilities not only improved coordination and consolidated related responsibilities but resulted in the elimination of three officer spaces and one enlisted space.

Personnel currently authorized for the Office of the Special Assistant for Southeast Asia are:

Civilian, 2—1 Secretary, 1 Clerk/Information Specialist, Casualty Section.

TAB B TO ENCL 1 (MEDIA ACCREDITATION AND TOURS STAFF)

On 1 August this staff was disbanded as a separate entity. Certain activities have been abolished, and others divided between the Directorates for Defense Information and Community Relations. The following is a description of the activities prior to the change.

Conducts, in coordination with the White House, State Department, and USIA, tours to the U.S. for members of foreign news media. DoD is withdrawing from this program after one more tour, which was already in the planning stage before the decision was made to withdraw.

Conducts military phase of programming for certain foreign visitors to the U.S. under sponsorship of State Department. Assists individual representatives of news media, foreign and domestic, in accomplishing sponsored or unsponsored travel to U.S. military installations or facilities world-wide. Approves travel in military carriers of news media representatives and other non-DoD personnel for public affairs purposes. Plans, implements and controls Joint Civilian Orientation Conference and high-level NATO conferences.

Detailed Reports on Tours conducted in past three years are attached:

Tab B1—Foreign Journalist Tours.

Tab B2—U.S.-based Foreign Journalists Tour.

Tab B3—NATO Television Tours.

Tab B4—Western European Union Parliamentarians' Tour.

Tab B5—Joint Civilian Orientation Conference.

TAB B1 (INTER-AGENCY FOREIGN JOURNALISTS PROGRAM)

DoD is withdrawing from this program after one more tour, which was already in the planning stage before the decision was made to withdraw.

The program was jointly sponsored by the White House, the Department of State, the Department of Defense and the United States Information Agency. Each tour involved twenty journalists who were invited for a 30-day program designed by the sponsoring agencies. In the past three years newsmen from three areas have participated: Europe, Africa and East Asia and the Pacific.

The purpose of this program was to increase mutual understanding between the people of the United States and the people of other countries. By combining the resources of four government agencies, the mutual information objectives of each was advanced at a cost considerably lower than that required for an equal number of international visitors sponsored in other ways.

Further details of the tours carried out in the past three years are included in the attached document. The name of each participant is included with his affiliation. The costs to DoD for each tour is also included. The costs were for commercial travel for the journalists from their homes to the U.S. and back, and per diem for the DoD escort. Travel within the U.S. was by military aircraft on MAC assigned missions.

TAB B2 (U.S.-BASED FOREIGN JOURNALISTS PROGRAM)

This program is jointly sponsored by the Department of Defense and the United States Information Agency. Foreign journalists who are stationed in Washington and New York are invited to participate in a ten-day program designed to familiarize them with significant aspects of the United States' Defense programs and operations that are not ordinarily available to them. Transportation and escorts are provided by Defense. All other expenses are paid by the journalists themselves. The program content is about 80 per cent military. In the past three years one of these projects was undertaken. Nine newsmen from New York and nine from Washington, representing press, radio and television services to 15 countries participated.

Selection of the journalists and the programming are administered jointly by Defense and USIA's Foreign Correspondents Centers in New York and Washington. The purpose of these tours is to promote a broader and more objective reporting of the United States.

19–28 AUGUST 1967—FOREIGN JOURNALISTS TOUR OF ALASKA

Cost to DoD: $500.00—Staff per diem only. Travel was by military aircraft on MAC assigned missions.

Participants: Peter Barnett—Australian Broadcasting Corporation—Australia.

Mehmet Biber—Aksam Gazetesi—Turkey.

Jeffrey Blyth—London Daily Mail—England.

Maarten Bolle—Het Vrije Volk—Netherlands and Het Volk—Belgium.

Eric Britter—London Times—England.

Dong-Won Cho—Donghwa News Agency—Korea.

Santiago Ferrari—La Nacion—Argentina.

Joaquin Frances—EFE News Agency—Spain.

Jean Paul Freyss—Agence France Presse—France.
Heiner Gautschy—Swiss Broadcasting—Switzerland.
Bjorn Heimar—Aftenposten—Norway.
Hans J. Hoefer—Deutsche Presse Agentur—Germany.
Hiroshi Ishizuka—Kyodo News Service—Japan.

NATO Television Tour

From October 1–16, 1966, a one-time North Atlantic Treaty Organization Television Tour was conducted under the joint sponsorship of the U.S. Department of Defense and NATO. Tour participants included 15 European network television correspondents and a five member NATO television film team, for a total of 20. The purpose of the tour was to allow the correspondents from NATO member countries to obtain greater understanding and documentation of the United States commitment to NATO, under the theme: "This is U.S.A.—Your NATO Partner." The tour included visits to four military installations and the Pentagon, as well as New York City and Cleveland.

The Department of Defense was responsible for programming the tour and for providing air transportation within the United States. Cost to DOD: $765.00.

North Atlantic Assembly (NATO Parliamentarians) Tours

The North Atlantic Assembly (formerly known as the NATO Parliamentarians) conducts a biennial tour of military installations in the United States. Tour members are also members of the legislative bodies of NATO member nations. At the request of Congress and in coordination with the Department of State, the Department of Defense provides support for these tours. Defense support consists of complete programming of the tours, military airlift for the tour, funding for a limited number of official receptions and dinners, and provision of a Department of Defense escort officer (the Department of State provides three escort officers and the North Atlantic Assembly Secretariat provides one).

WESTERN EUROPEAN UNION PARLIAMENTARIANS TOUR

Periodic tours of selected military installations in the U.S. are conducted for key members of the Western European Union (WEU) Assembly, representing the United Kingdom, France, Germany, Italy, Belgium, Luxembourg and the Netherlands. These tours are conducted in response to requests by the WEU, and are coordinated with and supported by the Department of State. Parliamentarians participating in the tours are equivalent in rank to U.S. Senators and Congressmen.

The last Western European Union Parliamentarians Tour was conducted from March 24 to April 7, 1968, in response to a request from the Space and Defense Committees of the WEU to inspect various modern equipment items of all services and to visit specific military installations. Cost to DOD: $1,117.50.

Participants: Frans J. Goedhart—Vice Chairman of the Committee on Defense Questions and Armaments—Netherlands.

TAB C TO ENCL 1 (SPECIAL PROJECT OFFICERS)

The "Special Projects Office" is composed of three senior civilian employees assigned to specific and diverse activities. They do not function as a single working unit on "projects," but are utilized on individual bases as special assistants on detailed assignments by the ASD(PA) and his two Deputies.

Basically, these men work in high levels in the Department on activities which the ASD(PA) and his deputies must give close cognizance but which, because of the many demands on their time, cannot always have their personal attention.

Some typical activities of these officers are:

Reviewing DoD-proposed legislation and providing information and assistance as requested to Congressional inquiries and Committees.

Monitoring public affairs activities relative to Federal involvement in civil disturbances.

Concluding arrangements with sponsors when the Secretary of Defense or Deputy Secretary of Defense accept official invitations.

Acting for the ASD(PA) in high level audio-visual matters to include obtaining prisoners of war visual materials, maintaining contact with senior personnel of the networks and wire services, and arranging audio requirements for events such as the Presidential Inaugural and the Eisenhower funeral.

TAB D TO ENCL 1 (DIRECTORATE FOR DEFENSE INFORMATION)

As of August 1, 1969, there were 57 military and civilian professional and clerical personnel assigned to the Directorate for Defense Information, OASD(PA). Included in this figure are four civilian information officers and one civilian information assistant assigned to the Defense News Branch and six military information officers and two civilian information assistants assigned to the Armed Forces News Branch.

In FY 1969 the Press Division issued 1,604 releases pertaining to the Military Departments and the Office of the Secretary of Defense and Defense Agencies and responded to some 10,000 formal queries and approximately 25,000 informal questions (or queries) from news media representatives and from Members of Congress.

In addition to the above, the Press Division handles approximately 200 interviews a year, processes and releases approximately 300 speeches, a considerable volume of testimony before the Congress and handles approximately 1800 coordination actions per year on releases for other government agencies as well as agencies within the Defense Department.

TAB E TO ENCL 1 (MAGAZINE AND BOOK BRANCH)

One of the changes mentioned in the covering letter was to delegate to the Military Departments most of the activities of the Magazine and Book Branch, along with the associated manpower spaces. This change was made as experience has proved that the majority of magazine articles and books are concerned with only one Service.

The mission of the Magazine and Book Branch is to help magazine and book media representatives and free lance writers obtain information about the Department of Defense in accordance with the provisions of the Freedom of Information Act (5 USC 552). Specifically this includes assisting media representatives in gathering historical data; arranging interviews with key Defense officials about plans, policies, programs and operations of the Department of Defense; arranging briefings on these same subjects; advising and arranging for access to classified files for scholarly research, and responding to inquiries. The branch also provides policy guidance to the Military Departments on magazine and book matters, coordinates those matters that involve more than one service and acts as initial point of contact at the seat of government with all national media representatives.

Attached is a list of some of the authors we assisted during the last three years, indicating name of book and the publishing house. The support provided falls into the following specific categories:

(a) When requested, providing any and all types of unclassified facts about military events that have or are presently occurring.

(b) At the request of media representatives arranging interviews with knowledgeable Defense officials who discuss "on going" policies, programs, and activities of the Department of Defense.

(c) As requested, arranging for access to both classified (Executive Order 10816 implemented by Paragraph X, B, DOD Directive 5200.1) and unclassified files by authors and researchers who are developing chronologies of official historical events.

(d) Providing publishers and editors of encyclopedias, almanacs and yearbooks factual data about the Department of Defense.

TAB F TO ENCL 1 (AUDIO-VISUAL DIVISION)

The Audio-Visual Division, in its present organizational structure, was authorized by Deputy Secretary of Defense Cyrus Vance on March 14, 1966. On May 1, this Division was formed and assumed all of the functions previously handled by the four Military Services in relation to working with the national media.

The Audio-Visual Division develops audio-visual public information policy to be followed by the Military Departments, and serves as the single contact point for all requests from the media and for the release of all Service-generated material to the media.

The Military Departments complement and support the Department of Defense by:

1. Providing guidance to and supervising the activities of subordinate elements.

2. Supervising and cordinating the acquisition of material for intra-departmental use.

3. Providing staff advice and assistance to the Service Secretary and Chief of Staff.

4. Reviewing, evaluating and recommending Service positions on projects and materials.

The 1966 consolidation improved the flow of information to the public by decreasing duplication, reducing costs and generally simplifying operations in this field.

Descriptions of the activities of the Technical Services Staff, Audio-Visual News Branch, Audio-Visual Motion Picture Production Branch, and the Television Production Branch are contained in Tab F1.

Costs of Audio-Visual operations in salaries are contained elsewhere in the Public Affairs report; however, Tab F2 lists those funds required for operation wherein services, equipment or expendable supplies are required.

Tab F3 lists completed films, newsfilms, video tapes, tapes and still photos either released to the public or cleared for public release.

TAB F1 (MOTION PICTURE PRODUCTIONS BRANCH)

The Motion Picture Productions Branch has two main activities. It receives and staffs requests for Department of Defense assistance when such requests are submitted by motion picture producers, and it is the action agency when the Military Departments requests that films and video tapes they have produced be approved for public release.

The Branch also is responsible for producing films for the Office of Public Affairs. During the period July 1968 through June 1969 no productions were undertaken.

A List of Selected Films is published by this Branch. A new one has been prepared and publication is pending. It is estimated that 5,000 copies of this catalogue will cost approximately $500. These funds come from the general DoD printing budget.

TAB F1 (RADIO-TELEVISION PRODUCTION BRANCH)

The Radio-Television Production Branch produces no materials for public release. Activities are limited to assistance to the commercial media in the production of documentary or entertainment television programs. Assistance involves authorization of and arrangements for (1) access to military facilities and/or personnel for research and photographic purposes, and (2) access to military film depositories for the selection and purchase of stock footage pertinent to the subject being covered. All photography is accomplished by commercial film crews at the company's expense, and all stock footage is purchased by the company at rates established by DOD Instruction 7230.7, "User Charges."

Details of assistance granted in the past were included in our earlier report to Senator Fulbright on July 9, 1969.

TAB F1 (AUDIO-VISUAL NEWS BRANCH)

Responsible for the preparation of all newsfilm and photo releases issued by the Department of Defense; provides assistance to radio, television and newsfilm representatives in arranging coverage of major news events; assists in arranging media interviews with key Defense officials.

Assistance provided varies in scope from providing military stock footage to the complex task for coordinating efforts involved with television news production. In addition, static facilities are provided for television, radio and motion picture media in the coverage of news conferences, speeches and special events. The Branch also prepares and distributes still photo releases issued by the Department of Defense in Washington; provides pictorial coverage of special events; researches archives for photographic illustrations; and assists commercial photographic agencies and services in covering news events.

Maintains a small photographic studio and laboratory, plus sound recording facilities to service internal requirements (DoD and other Government agencies) and non-government audio-visual agencies, as appropriate.

The photo laboratory, consisting of one civilian and one serviceman, performs a myriad of assignments. These two men document the activities of the Office of the Secretary of Defense, when such activities are not covered by the media, and operate a small laboratory to provide the photo material for release. In addition, these photographers cover special feature stories on military activities within the Washington area for release to the public.

In the pursuit of these efforts 740 assignments were accomplished during the last fiscal year. These assignments produced 24,500 photo prints for distribution to various media.

TAB F2 (MISCELLANEOUS CONTRACTS)

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE NEWSFILM CONTRACT (V-SERIES)

A contract to process, screen, edit and distribute to national TV-news-film media military sound-on-film stories occurring in Southeast Asia. Cost for FY 69: $87,386.48.

These production costs cover only the Stateside expenditures necessary for transport of film, film processing, editing, release printing, and necessary management details to accomplish the foregoing.

The input of sync-sound newsfilm is generated by five Service-supported camera teams in Vietnam. These teams are under the direct supervision of MACV and indirectly of OASD(PA). These teams were approved by Deputy Secretary Vance on 12 November 1965 and established by April-June 1966. The purpose of these teams is to document, for release to national television, the feature aspects of the military participation in Southeast Asia often ignored or bypassed by national media film crews because of the pressure of hard news events. They are not in competition with the civilian media. Rather, they supplement the coverage by major networks. The high usage of the material produced by these teams is indicative of the effectiveness of their efforts.

MOTION PICTURE FILM PROCESSING

Motion picture news film exposed by DoD cameraman requiring urgent handling is processed under a contract arrangement with the Department of Agriculture. Cost for FY 69: $3,061.64.

ARMY PHOTOGRAPHIC AGENCY

This Agency provides multiple services which include tape coverage of network newscasts from which Defense Department excerpts can be extracted, reproduced and shown to interested Defense agencies. Extensive use is made of this facility. Cost for FY 69: $43,265.40.

MAIL EARLY FOR CHRISTMAS PROJECT

This project produces a professional package of spot announcements, film clips and color slides sent to over 5,000 radio and 600 television stations urging the public to mail Christmas packages and cards to servicemen overseas in time for delivery prior to Christmas Day. The program is conducted in conjunction with the Post Office Department. Contract cost: $9,642.55. These funds do not come out of OASD(PA) budget. They are a part of the general printing fund maintained by OSD.

TAB H TO ENCL 1 (PROJECTS DIVISION)

1. AERIAL EVENTS

a. The Projects Division schedules and coordinates all appearances by the aerial demonstration teams: Thunderbirds (Air Force), Blue Angels (Navy), and Golden Knights (Army). This includes review of liability insurance policies required by the sponsor to protect the Government and insuring that sponsors pay associated costs such as per diem costs for team members. The teams performed a total of 289 times throughout the country during FY 1969.

b. All flyovers in the public domain are authorized by this office to insure compliance with policy. There were 217 of these during FY 1969.

c. This Division also authorized static display of aircraft in 102 air shows and fairs during FY 1969.

2. SURFACE EVENTS

This Division authorized military support (musical and troop) for approximately 4,800 events in the Washington area and approximately 1,400 national events elsewhere during FY 1969. While a complete listing of these would be difficult to compile, a list of some of the major events during this period is attached together with military participations authorized (Tab H 1).

3. DEFENSE INDUSTRY BULLETIN

This publication provides logistical information on Department of Defense for agencies of the Department as well as subscribers in industry upon request. Of the 25,000 copies printed each month, 15,309 are sent to outside subscribers with the remainder being distributed within the Department. The cost of the publication is approximately $47,500 annually and is budgeted with the overall Defense printing costs. A proposal to transfer this publication to the Defense Supply Agency is currently being staffed.

4. SPEAKERS BUREAU

The Projects Division received a total of 894 requests for DOD speakers during FY 1969 and provided 492.

a. These requests were filled by asking agencies within the Office of the Secretary of Defense, Office of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Defense Agencies, the Unified and Specified Commands, and the Military Services to fill specific requests.

b. An effort is made to fill speakers requests with speakers stationed nearby to minimize travel costs except for forums which are national in scope. It would be virtually impossible to estimate the cost of speakers' travel. In many cases the sponsor provides transportation, housing and meals. Where travel costs are paid by the government they are paid from travel funds available to the agency providing the speaker.

c. Attached are copies of schedules of major speaking engagements by DOD speakers during FY 1969 (Tab H 2).

Note: Except for speakers, all of the units committed to programs are assigned to one of the Services. Also, the Services provided many of the speakers to fill requests received by this Directorate.

TAB 1 TO ENCL 1 (ORGANIZATIONS DIVISION)

The Organizations Division performs that portion of the Directorate mission of maintaining liaison and serving as the single office of public information liaison between DoD components and national organizations and groups. The Division has contact with about 500 organizations ranging all the way from an action once a year to almost daily contact with defense oriented groups such as the major veterans organizations.

Much of the activity of this Division consists of responding to verbal and written queries for information from or on behalf of organizations. During FY 1969, 6,284 items of routine correspondence were handled. In addition 355 written queries from the White House and members of Congress on behalf of organizations were answered. This correspondence covered a wide range of defense subjects, examples of which are:

1. Requests for statements by the President or the Secretary of Defense for conventions, meetings, and commemoration of anniversaries and other special events.

2. Requests for the President or the Secretary of Defense to address or attend conventions and meetings.

3. Requests for information on obtaining ceremonial rifles and surplus uniforms by veterans organizations.

4. Requests from veterans and civic groups concerning procedure for obtaining surplus equipment for monumental purposes.

5. Queries from groups of all types on flag usage.

6. Requests for information on sending gifts and providing other support for our troops in Vietnam.

7. Requests for speakers, musical support and briefings for meetings of organizations and groups.

8. Requests for information from organizations and groups on DoD programs and activities of current interest, such as ROTC, all volunteer force and Project 100,000.

This Division mails Department of Defense material of interest to outside organizations to a total of 287 organizations which have indicated an interest in receipt of this material. These organizations are queried annually to determine if they desire to continue receiving such material. Material mailed consists of significant speeches by the Secretary of Defense and other high officials. It also includes items of current interest such as the annual Secretary of Defense posture statement, announcement of award of the Medal of Honor, casualty reports and fact sheets on support of our troops overseas. Mailing of material is done on a selective basis to those organizations having particular interest in specific material. For example a speech on ROTC would be mailed to veterans groups and other defense oriented organizations and to educational organizations.

The Division provides briefings and tours in the Pentagon on request from organizations. These briefings cover a wide variety of defense subjects as requested. During FY 1969 over 5,000 persons attended briefings arranged and coordinated by the Division.

Specific examples of assistance provided to organizations of various types during FY 1969 include the following:

1. Support for the Senate Youth Program sponsored jointly by the United States Senate and the William Randolph Hearst Foundation. This included providing military officers as escorts for the participants, providing a half day briefing at the Pentagon on the organization and functions of DoD, arranging visits to the Tomb of the Unknown Soldiers and the Kennedy Grave, and providing patriotic programs by military musical groups for banquets for the group.

2. Coordinating the visit of the new national commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars to the Pacific including Vietnam. Assistance included arranging military briefings as desired. All travel and accomodations were arranged by and paid for by the organization.

3. Providing Pentagon military briefings for a series of groups of business executives attending seminars sponsored by the Brookings Institution on Federal Government operations.

4. Providing a Pentagon briefing for the Voice of Democracy winners in the annual briefing sponsored by the Veterans of Foreign Wars.

5. Providing Pentagon briefings for the American Legion Boys Nation and the American Legion Auxiliary Girls Nation.

6. Providing convention support for the American Legion national convention. This included bands, marching units and color guards from the Services for the convention parade; providing General Westmoreland, Army Chief of Staff, as a convention speaker; coordinating Air Force briefings for the organization's National Security Commission (done on a rotational basis among the Services each year); and providing briefings for the National Security Commission as requested on other military subjects of particular interest at the time.

7. Arranged for a group from the Young Presidents Organization to attend Brass Strike exercise at Fort Bragg at their expense.

8. Arranged for the Secretary of Defense to address the National Security Industrial Association's annual dinner.

9. Provided DoD briefings for groups sponsored by the Presidential Classroom for Young Americans.

10. Assisted the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, United States Jaycees and Lions International in establishing a veterans assistance program.

11. Provided the DoD portion of the D.C. Urban Service Corps program, Widening Horizons, which is designed to provide summer orientation activities for school children of the District of Columbia. This consisted of a weekly visit to a military installation in the Washington area for an average of 300 children.

Note: As noted in the activities of the Projects Division there will undoubtedly be duplication in the reports submitted by the Services. In addition to troop and speaker support the Organizations Division queries the Service concerned to provide information concerning that Service to answer queries from organizations.

TAB J TO ENCL 1 (DIRECTORATE FOR PLANS AND PROGRAMS)

The Directorate for Plans and Programs is divided organizationally into three groups whose activities are described below:

1. Director's Group—Acts as the principal assistant and advisor to the ASD(PA) in the area of planning and programming worldwide public affairs activities. Proposes new or revised public affairs policies when required. Supervises and directs other members of the Directorate and monitors and controls all correspondence to and from the Directorate.

2. Programs and Studies Group—Formulates broad and continuing public affairs program and policy guidance applicable to DoD components and insures that such guidance is fully coordinated with other appropriate government agencies. Maintains liaison with appropriate elements of OSD, JCS, Military Departments, and other agencies of the government to develop information about planned activities with public affairs implimations and to determine—or formulate when none exists—government policy on public affairs matters involving DoD and the Military Services. Monitors currency of OSD public affairs issuances and prepares changes or new issuances as appropriate. Assists unified and specified command public affairs officers by keeping them informed of all seat-of-government matters that may affect public affairs in their areas. Assists unified and specified commanders on manning requirements in their public affairs offices. Arranges OSD conferences of unified and specified command public affairs officers in Washington, and monitors annual staff visits to the commands by OASD(PA) staff team.

3. Plans Group—Maintains liaison with public affairs offices in the unified and specified commands and monitors their implementation of policies and guidances issued by the ASD(PA). Reviews public affairs portions of contingence, field exercise, and operation plans of the unified and specified commands and formulates or approves guidance after securing complete and careful coordination with State and other interested government agencies. Stays abreast of developments within assigned command areas by reviewing all State and Defense message traffic referring to the area; identifies potential public affairs problems and develops and coordinates courses of action to solve them; insures that other OASD(PA) and Service information offices are provided copies of such traffic in a timely fashion. Participates in staff visits to unified and specified commands. Monitors the operation of the Defense Information School. Serves as point of contact for respective single-Service matters and develops ASD(PA) position on single-Service public affairs problems.

The planning function in this Directorate is not normally accomplished by the formal preparation of plans. It is more a matter of developing, in conjunction with other DoD elements and other agencies of the government, public affairs courses of action in connection with the situations—actual or potential—that may require some action to be taken. A large part of the activity consists of telephone and cable traffic and direct, personal liaison with State Department public affairs officers and officials of the USIA. Only two actual public affairs plans have been produced in the past year:

1. Civil Disturbance Public Affairs Plan, 31 October 1968.

2. Public Affairs Plan for NATO's 20th Anniversary Year, 4 April 1968.

DEFENSE CHIEFS CARRY MESSAGE TO CITIZENRY

(By Orr Kelly)

While President Nixon has been seeking support for his efforts to end the Vietnam war, high ranking Pentagon officers have been out giving the word to the "silent majority."

In an almost steady stream, they have been speaking to Rotary Clubs, to Reserve Officers meetings, at ship launchings and almost anywhere a responsive audience might be expected to gather.

Frequently they have taken a tough line—using language more forceful then that of the President and even outdoing Vice President Spiro T. Agnew on occasion according to a spot check of speeches delivered over the last two months.

Speaking to the Association of the U.S. Army here on Oct. 15, for example, General Earle G. Wheeler, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of staff, referred caustically to "groups of interminably vocal youngsters, strangers alike to soap and reason . . ."

GENERAL FATIGUED

"For my part, I must confess to a bit of fatigue on this score when new words are produced, most often by the 'academic-journalistic complex,' which describe vaccilation as being flexible and nervousness as being compassionate."

But the occasion which Wheeler spoke clearly implies a distinction between various forms of dissent. He was speaking in honor of Cyrus R. Vance, former U.S. negotiater in Paris and now a prominent critic of American policy in Vietnam.

By far the most prolific speechmaker is Gen. Lewis Walt, assistant commandant of the Marine Corps, who delivers a slightly modified version of the same basic speech and average of better then twice a week to such groups as the Rotary Club of Pensacola, Fla., (Oct. 21) and the Florida State convention of the American Red Cross (Oct. 10).

"In the past year, over 10,000 Americans have been killed in Vietnam," he told the Red Cross. "Those who dissent may not have fired the rifle or thrown the grenade. But they must bear a part of the responsibility for the losses of those gallant Americans.

'BACKBONE' HAILED

"Our young Americans in Vietnam may not be a part of our nation's loose tongue—but they certainly have proven themselves to be a vital part of our strong backbone."

In his Pensacola speech, he phrased it slightly differently:

"There is an old saying that 'talk is cheap.' Well, this past year over 10,000 Americans have been killed in Vietnam. That loss is the price of irresponsible talk and I can tell you that it isn't cheap."

On Nov. 6, speaking to the Annapolis Rotary Club, Walt, who commanded the Marines in Vietnam for two years, reflected the themes of the President's speech three days before—and added to it.

"Those who are in positions of authority know the potential cost of a premature pull-out," he said. "They know that the blood of millions of Vietnamese would be on their hands . . ."

"Our premature, withdrawal from Vietnam would become a major victory for the forces of international communism."

On Oct. 14, Gen. Leonard F. Chapman Jr., commandant of the Marine Corps, spoke to the Rotary Club of Memphis.

He drew a line between the "doves—gentle people who have never seen war, or terror," and the "anti-everything organizations who . . . have waved the flag of the enemy, burned our own flag, practiced violence, and preached their own war as a means to destroy our present society."

In general, the professional military men tend to see the threat of communism as somewhat more menacing than many political leaders.

Speaking at the launching of a destroyer named for his father, Adm. John S. McCain Jr., commander of the Pacific command, said Sept. 6 at the Philadelphia Navy Yard:

"What we do here today is related to a subject that should be of direct concern to every American. That topic is the threat of aggressive communism as it affects the peace of the world in American national security.

THREAT RAISED

"We must be aware of the continuing threat which our country faces from the ambitions, goals and activities of the Communist world. This is a real threat and a stark truth that we must recognize if there is to be peace."

The message that all the speeches have been trying to convey was probably summed up by Walt in his talk to the Annapolis Rotarians:

"The fact of the matter is that all is being done to bring the war to a just and honorable conclusion. A conclusion which will let the South Vietnamese decide their own future—a conclusion which will allow us to withdraw our troops—a conclusion which will bring home all our prisoners of war.

"We need your support in our effort. We need your patience. We need your perseverance. We need to hear your voices speak out on behalf of our President."

Mr. FULBRIGHT. There are three public relations programs which I believe deserve special concern.

The Defense Department has extraordinary resources that permit it with ease to transport and entertain visitors at various installations around the country. By going out into the community, picking local leadership personnel, flying them to military facilities and briefing them on specific, chosen activities, the Defense Department is able to propagandize, and influence attitudes toward their activities.

Each service has its own civilian tour program, but the most prestigious of them is the Joint Civilian Orientation Conference—an 8-day cross country tour for 70 civilians—run by the Office of Secretary of Defense.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the Department's description of this program; its recorded costs—although I note transportation charges for the past 2 years have been dropped since military transportation is used; and the list of participants during the last 3 years.

There being no objection, the description was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE JOINT CIVILIAN ORIENTATION CONFERENCE

The Joint Civilian Orientation Conference is an annual program of the Secretary of Defense which serves as a report to the nation on how the mission of the Department of Defense is being discharged, and responds to the desire and need of the American people to be informed about how the Department of Defense is operated. The Conference makes it possible for key professional men to study the accomplishments and problems of the Armed Forces, with the objectives of making as much information as possible available to Americans. Once a year, a group of approximately 70 business, industrial and professional men are invited to visit representative military installations during this eight-day travelling conference.

The participants are selected from all geographical areas of the country and from a broad spectrum of occupations. They are briefed, shown training demonstrations, and engage in discussions with men from all ranks of the Armed Forces. The Joint Civilian Orientation Conference accomplishes the following objectives: it opens the Department of Defense to public inspection; it responds to the desire of key Americans to maintain an interest in and understanding of their federal government; it provides members of the Armed Forces and private citizens an opportunity to know and understand each other better; it offers a medium for the exchange of ideas; and it helps to explain the disposition of the Defense dollar.

Cost tabulations and lists of participants, by conference, are attached. Participants pay all their own expenses, including food, lodging and entertainment.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. A good number of the conference members, from their job titles alone, would appear to be already familiar with Defense activities and no doubt assist in influencing the views of their fellow participants.

A second program which I believe needs to be singled out is the speakers, particularly military men, supplied by the Defense Department to public meetings. Again, because of the transportation facilities available to them, the military services can provide speakers easily if they so desire—and those speakers can have great influence in promoting a military point of view. At this point as an example I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a list of the extensive speaking tours made by Gen. William C. Westmoreland beginning August 7, 1968, and running through May of this year, which totaled 59 separate engagements. This is quite a schedule for a professional soldier whose mission was to act as Chief of Staff of the Army. I also would like to insert a recent story in the Washington Star which describes the organization and direction of this speechmaking.

There being no objection, the list and story were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. FULBRIGHT. In the same category as speechmaking, but handled in a slightly different form are the films produced by the various Defense agencies and made available to the public. These have a propaganda value of their own and are so used. A recent issue of the Armed Force Journal carried an item saying the Air Force has available for distribution a 30-minute film on the C–5A. For years they have been making available for public showing films on Vietnam and communism, which in order to support the administration or the Military Establishment's point of view at the time usually distort key facts. This is not something new with this administration. It is something that had been going on with a high degree of development prior to this administration. I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD at the end of this statement a list of Armed Forces films available to the public.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LIST OF AVAILABLE FILMS

AMERICA'S CRITICS ABROAD

A capsule look at the nations that form the Southeast Asia complex; their problems, their aspirations, and their hopes for the future. Supplemented by Film Information Guide, 1967.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, finally, I would like to discuss what I consider the most disturbing of the Office of Secretary of Defense's public affairs programs—the V-series newsfilms.

The Defense Department has had five service-supported camera crews in Vietnam since 1966 whose job—according to the Department—"is to document, for release to national television, the feature aspects of the military participation in Southeast Asia often ignored or bypassed by national media film crews because of the pressure of hard news events. They are not in competition with the civilian media. Rather, they supplement the coverage by major networks. The high usage of the material produced by these teams is indicative of the effectiveness of their efforts."

What justification or legal authority is there for the Defense Department to go into the business of putting out newsfilm on the "feature aspects of the military participation in Southeast Asia"?

Why should MACV have control over five military camera crews in Vietnam—a number I am told that equals that of at least one major network—to put out film stories for home consumption that "supplement the coverage by major networks?"

Just how much usage is "high usage?"

I ask these questions here and at the same time I have forwarded them by letter to the Secretary of Defense. Perhaps Vice President Agnew, who last week appealed to the networks to put on different commentators, has not felt the necessity to complann about the TV coverage from Vietnam because he knows that at least a portion of it was emanating directly from administration sources in Vietnam. In all fairness I should note that this program was begun under the previous administration. I bring it to the special attention of the public today, however, because it complements so well the thrust of the Vice President's recent remarks.

What sort of stories are being produced by Defense Department film crews in Vietnam that are "ignored or bypassed" by the network film crews? How accurately do they present the Vietnam story?

According to information I received, some 118 were turned out last year. I have summaries of three of these which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD. As I view them, all have a propaganda rather than a journalistic thrust.

There being no objection, the summaries were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THAI MEDICAL COMPANY TRAINS FOR VIETNAM DUTY

July 1, 1969

Footage: 129' 16mm Color Master

Time: 3:35

Since mid-April of this year, A Company of the Royal Thai Army Volunteer Force (RTAVF) Division Medical Battalion has been training to replace a sister company presently on operations with Thailand's "Black Panther" Division in the Republic of Vietnam.

During a field training exercise held June 4–6, 1969, the company supported an RTAVF infantry battalion engaged in simulated combat near Kanchanaburi, Thailand, approximately 125 miles northeast of Bangkok.

The medical unit's mission during the exercise was to provide emergency medical treatment to all types of simulated casualties.

Most of the 78 men of the medical company had little or no prior medical training before April. The non-commissioned officers, four doctors and American advisors are teaching the enlisted men to be medical assistants, operating room specialists, medical aidmen and litter bearers.

As the "casualties" are brought in from the battle area of the exercise, the medical personnel examine the patients and determine the extent of the wounds. Those who need immediate life-saving treatment receive it at the field installation. They are eventually transferred to a mobile or fixed field hospital further to the rear.

Medical Civic Action Program (MEDCAP) training is also undertaken by the unit.

In areas around Kanchanaburi, civilians needing or desiring medical attention look forward to the visit of the MEDCAP team.

The doctor with the team diagnoses and treats many illnesses and injuries during the short visit to the village.

Medicines are distributed by medical assistants who are part of the MEDCAP team.

This training, along with the combat preparedness the unit has undergone for the past few months, will qualify the men for Vietnam duty later this year.

U.S. ARMY'S 2ND BRIGADE, 9TH INFANTRY DIVISION, CONDUCTS OPERATION IN MEKONG DELTA OF SOUTH VIETNAM

June 25, 1969

It was recently announced that the U.S. Army's 2nd Brigade, 9th Infantry Division, would be one of the first American units to leave South Vietnam as a result of the 25,000-man troop redeployment ordered by President Nixon.

This film shows a unit of the 2nd Brigade conducting a typical operation last month in the Mekong Delta region south of Saigon.

The unit is part of the Mobile Riverine Force which operated aboard U.S. Navy river assault boats in the waterways of the delta. Sometimes, they utilize helicopters instead of boats during their rapid movements.

Once the 9th Division soldiers are put into an area, they patrol and search for any sign of the enemy.

During this operation, the patrol discovered a wounded Vietnamese man who turned out to be an executive officer of a Viet Cong battalion which was operating in the area.

The enemy soldier was treated for his wounds and was evacuated to a rear area for further medical attention and interrogation.

When the 9th Infantry Division's brigade is pulled out of the Mekong Delta in July, the ARVN (Army of the Republic of Vietnam) will assume the area of responsibility vacated by the American unit.

U.S. ARMY HOSPITAL IN SOUTH VIETNAM TREATS PRISONERS OF WAR

Time: 2:40

The U.S. Army's 74th Field Hospital at Long Binh, South Vietnam, has a unique group of patients. They are wounded or injured Viet Cong and North Vietnamese soldiers who have been captured or detained by the Allied Forces throughout the III and IV Corps Tactical Zones of South Vietnam.

The hospital, averaging approximately 200 patients per day, provides medical treatment for the many types of wounds the prisoners have sustained, such as gunshot, shrapnel, and burn injuries. These enemy prisoners of war are completely recovered before they are transferred to ARVN (Army of the Republic of Vietnam) prisoner of war compounds.

More than 200 major and 400 minor surgical operations have been performed by the hospital staff. Many of these were of a life-saving nature.

The patients, while convalescing, help the other prisoners in the hospital by giving haircuts and assisting in the serving of the food to the bed-ridden.

During their free time, the prisoners relax by playing games such as checkers or cards.

When they are completely recovered from their wounds or injuries, the prisoners are transferred to the control of the government of Vietnam at the III Corps ARVN Prisoner of War Camp at Bien Hoa.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, two in particular stress the medical attention being paid to prisoners we take among Vietcong. Another promotes the Thais. I am asking the Secretary for the release data on all the V-series films.

The cost for fiscal 1969 of the contract to process, screen, edit, and distribute to national TV newsfilm media sound and film stories was $87,386.48. I will seek to strike this entire program, including the money to support the five camera crews in Vietnam from the military appropriations budget.

There is enough administration propaganda on Vietnam being provided the American public through speeches and statements without providing this additional outlet in the guise of "objective" newsfilm stories.

This concludes my first statement on this subject. Tomorrow I will discuss the public relations activities of the Navy as each department has its own fully recognized public relations program.

AMENDMENT OF THE ATOMIC ENERGY ACT OF 1954, AS AMENDED

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 548, S. 3169.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McINTYRE in the chair). The bill will be stated by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 3169) to amend the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

S. 3169

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. Subsection 153h. of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"h. The provisions of this section shall apply to any patent the application for which shall have been filed before September 1, 1974."

SEC. 2. Section 222 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, is amended by striking out "imprisonment for not more than five years" and inserting in lieu thereof "imprisonment for not more than ten years".

SEC. 3. (a) Section 222 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, is amended by striking out "death or imprisonment for life (but the penalty of death or imprisonment for life may be imposed only upon recommendation of the jury), or by a fine of not more than $20,000 or by imprisonment for not more than twenty years, or both" and inserting in lieu thereof "imprisonment for life, or by imprisonment for any term of years or a fine of not more than $20,000 or both".

(b) Sections 224, 225, and 226 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, are each amended by striking out "death or imprisonment for life (but the penalty of death or imprisonment for life may be imposed only upon recommendation of the jury), or by a fine of not more than $20,000 or imprisonment for not more than twenty years, or both" and inserting in lieu thereof "imprisonment for life, or by imprisonment for any term of years or a fine of not more than $20,000 or both".

SEC. 4. Chapter 18 of the Atomic Energy

Act of 1954, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"a. Any person who (1) violates and licensing provision of section 53, 57, 62, 63, 81, 82, 101, 103, 104, 107, or 109 or any rule, regulation, or order issued thereunder, or any term, condition, or limitation of any license issued thereunder, or (2) commits any violation for which a license may be revoked under section 186, shall be subject to a civil penalty, to be imposed by the Commission, of not to exceed $5,000 for each such violation: Provided, That in no event shall the total penalty payable by any person exceed $25,000 for all violations by such person occurring within any period of thirty consecutive days. If any violation is a continuing one, each day of such violation shall constitute a separate violation for the purpose of computing the applicable civil penalty. The Commission shall have the power to compromise, mitigate, or remit such penalties.

"b. Whenever the Commission has reason to believe that a person has become subject to the imposition of a civil penalty under the provisions of this section, it shall notify such person in writing (1) setting forth the date, facts, and nature of each act or omission with which the person is charged, (2) specifically identifying the particular provision or provisions of the section, rule, regulation, order, or license involved in the violation, and (3) advising of each penalty which the Commission proposes to impose and its amount. Such written notice shall be sent by registered or certified mail by the Commission to the last known address of such person. The person so notified shall be granted an opportunity to show in writing, within such reasonable period as the Commission shall by regulation prescribe, why such penalty should not be imposed. The notice shall also advise such person that upon failure to pay the civil penalty subsequently determined by the Commission, if any, the penalty may be collected by civil action.

"c. On the request of the Commission, the Attorney General is authorized to institute a civil action to collect a penalty imposed pursuant to this section. The Attorney General shall have the exclusive power to compromise, mitigate, or remit such civil penalties as are referred to him for collection."

SEC. 5. Subsection 221 c. of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"c. No action shall be brought against any individual or person for any violation under this Act unless and until the Attorney General of the United States has advised the Commisison with respect to such action and no such action shall be commenced except by the Attorney General of the United States: Provided, however, That no action shall be brought under section 222, 223, 224, 225 or 226 except by the express direction of the Attorney General: And provided further, That nothing in this subsection shall be construed as applying to administrative action taken by the Commission."

SEC. 6. Section 223 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, is amended by adding the word "criminal" before the word "penalty".

SEC. 7. The amendments contained in sections 2 and 3 of this Act shall apply only to offenses under sections 222, 224, 225, and 226 which are committed on or after the date of enactment of this Act. Nothing in section 2 or 3 of this Act shall affect penalties authorized under existing law for offenses under section 222, 224, 225, or 226 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, committed prior to the date of enactment of this Act.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 91-553), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF THE BILL

Section 1 of the bill would amend section 153 h. of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, by extending for an additional 5 years the Atomic Energy Commission's authority to require the licensing of atomic energy patents. The amendment would extend the authority to September 1, 1974.

Section 2 of the bill would amend section 222 of the act to increase the maximum criminal penalties for unauthorized diversion of special nuclear material and related offenses to imprisonment for 10 years and a fine of $10,000, when the offense is committed without intent to injure the United States or secure an advantage to any foreign nation. The maximum penalty currently provided for such a violation is imprisonment for 5 years and a fine of $10,000.

Section 3 of the bill would amend sections 222, 224, 225, and 226 of the act by deleting authority to impose the death penalty and by further deleting the requirement for a recommendation by the jury for imposition of life imprisonment before such penalty could be imposed. Section 3 also would amend these sections of the act to eliminate any question as to possible limitations on the authority of the courts to impose a prison term for a fixed term of years less than life imprisonment.

Section 4 of the bill would add a new section 234 to the act to confer upon the Atomic Energy Commission statutory authority to levy civil monetary penalties on persons who violate certain licensing provisions of the act or any rule, regulation, order, or license issued thereunder.

Sections 5 and 6 of the bill are essentially technical amendments necessitated primarily by revisions in the act to be made by certain of the foregoing sections. Specifically, section 5 would amend section 221 c. of the act to make clear that "action" as stated in that section does not include administrative action initiated by the Commission, including such actions under the proposed new section 234. Section 6 would amend section 223 of the act by adding the word "criminal" before the word "penalty" to clarify that the penalties referred to in the latter section do not include civil monetary penalties imposed under proposed new section 234.

Section 7 of the bill is in the nature of a "saving" provision, and provides that the amendments in sections 2 and 3 of the bill apply only to offenses committed on or after the date of enactment of this bill; and further that the penalties authorized under sections 222, 224, 225, and 226 of the present law shall continue to apply to offenses committed before that date.

A more complete explanation of the provisions of this bill is contained in the portions of this report entitled "Committee Comments" and "Section-by-Section Analysis."

BACKGROUND

On January 10, 1969, the Atomic Energy Commission transmitted to the Congress proposed legislation to amend various sections of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, to delete the death penalty as potential punishment for certain offenses under the act and to remove the prerequisite of a jury recommendation for imposition of life imprisonment for such offenses. The proposed legislation further provided for an increase in the maximum punishment for unauthorized diversion of special nuclear materials and related offenses where such offenses are committed without the intent to injure the United States or to secure an advantage to any foreign nation. The proposed bill was introduced on March 27, 1969, by Chairman Chet Holifield (by request) as H.R. 9644 and on April 18, 1960, by Vice Chairman John O. Pastore (by request) as S. 1879.

On January 17, 1969, the AEC transmitted to the Congress proposed legislation to authorize the Commission to levy civil monetary penalties for violations of regulations, orders, and license conditions by licensees. The proposed legislation further proposed to clarify section 221 c. of the act by providing that this section does not require the approval of the Attorney General prior to the initiation of administrative actions by the Commission, not only with respect to the imposition of civil penalties but also for any other enforcement action the Commission is now authorized to take. The proposed bill was introduced on March 27, 1969, by Chairman Holifield (by request) as H.R. 9648 and on April 18, 1969, by Vice Chairman Pastore (by request) as S. 1882.

On April 18, 1969, Senator Pastore also introduced S. 1878, a bill identical to S. 3958 introduced by Senator Pastore in the 90th Congress on August 1, 1968, but on which no final action was taken by the Joint Committee during that Congress. The bill would amend sections 222, 224, 225, and 226 of the act to delete the capital punishment penalty and the requirement for a specific recommendation by the jury before the maximum penalty prescribed may be imposed on an offender (the life imprisonment penalty presently provided in these sections would be retained); amend section 222 to increase the criminal penalties which could be imposed for unauthorized diversion of special nuclear material and for certain related offenses in the absence of intent to injure the United States or to secure an advantage to any foreign nation; and amend the act to confer on the AEC authority to impose civil monetary penalties in addition to the AEC's present authority to modify, suspend, or revoke a license for violations of health and safety regulatory requirements.

On June 12, 1969, the AEC transmitted to the Congress proposed legislation to extend until September 1, 1974, the compulsory patent licensing authority of the Commission set forth in section 153 of the act. Presently section 153 covers patents the applications for which were filed prior to September 1, 1969. The proposed bill was introduced on July 9, 1969, by Chairman Holifield (by request), for himself and Representative Price of Illinois, as H.R. 12697.

Hearings concerning the foregoing legislative proposals were held by the full Joint Committee on September 12, 1969, as summarized in the next section of this report.

On September 12, the committee met in executive session to consider various aspects of the proposed legislation. On November 18, 1969, the committee convened again in executive session at which time it voted to incorporate the foregoing bills, with certain amendments, in "clean bills" which were introduced by November 20, 1969, by Chairman Holifield (for himself, Representative Price of Illinois, and Representative Hosmer) as H.R. 14925 and on November 21, 1969, by Vice Chairman Pastore as S. 3169. On November 24, 1969, the committee voted to approve the reporting of the "clean bills" favorably without amendment and adopted this committee report.

HEARINGS

The full committee held a hearing on the various measures referred to above on September 12, 1969. Joseph F. Hennessey, General Counsel of the Atomic Energy Commission, was the principal executive branch witness and provided the committee with the views of the Commission on the various provisions of the several bills before the committee.

The views of the Department of Justice on all of the bills under consideration dealing with criminal and civil penalties were received in writing and made a part of the hearing record. Written comments on certain of the bills also were received from the Washington office of the American Civil Liberties Union and from the Yankee Atomic Electric Co. of Boston, Mass. These two were included in the hearing record.

The foregoing hearings together with related background materials were published by the Joint Committee under the title "AEC Omnibus Legislation, 1969."

COMMITTEE COMMENTS

It has been the standard practice of the Atomic Energy Commission to recommend bills to the Congress from time to time in order to effectuate necessary clarifying or corrective amendments to the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 as well as to maintain a current statutory framework for a rapidly evolving program. In the interest of efficiency, such recommendations generally have been incorporated into "omnibus" bills for consolidated Joint Committee and congressional consideration. In this way, the Congress is able to assure that the legislative framework for the national energy program keeps pace with the times.

The committee believes that the amendments proposed in this bill are in keeping with the objectives set forth above, and accordingly recommends enactment of the bill in the form reported by the committee. Comments concerning the rationale as to each section of the bill are set forth below.

Section 1. Extension of compulsory patent licensing authority

Section 153 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, authorizes the Commission, after giving the patent owner an opportunity for a hearing, to declare any patent filed before September 1, 1969, to be affected with the public interest if, among other things, (1) the invention covered by the patent is of "primary importance" in the production or utilization of special nuclear material or atomic energy and (2) the licensing of such invention is of "primary importance" to effectuate the policies and purposes of the act. After such a determination has been made, the Commission may use the invention in performing any of its powers under the act. It may also issue a non-exclusive license to a particular applicant if it finds that his proposed use is of "primary importance to the conduct of an activity by such person authorized under this act." In either event the owner of the patent is entitled to a reasonable royalty fee for any use of his invention licensed pursuant to the act.

The authority to compel the licensing of certain patents was included in the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 because, in the words of then President Eisenhower, "considerations of fairness require some mechanism to assure that the limited number of companies which as Government contractors now have access to the program, cannot build a patent monopoly which would exclude others desiring to enter the field." The authority was initially limited to those patents for which applications were filed prior to September 1, 1959. However, in 1959, and again in 1964, section 153 was extended for additional 5-year periods by the Congress.

Although the Commission has not exercised this power to date, it believes that the reasons which justifies the extension of section 153 in 1959 and 1964 are still valid. The Joint Committee shares this view. Although the atomic energy industrial base is broader than it was in earlier years, it is still relatively limited. Moreover, certain fields of atomic energy appear to be concentrated in relatively few companies. In addition, important new developments in atomic energy—for example, those associated with the high priority national breeder reactor program—are only now emerging from the research phase. For these reasons, and for the additional reason that the mere existence of the authority may have a salutary effect, the committee recommends extension of this authority for an additional 5 years. The conditions and procedures surrounding the exercise of this authority are so restricted that it could only be used in comparatively rare and compelling cases. However, the committee believes that the availability of such authority for invocation in such rare cases affords a desirable degree of insurance for the growth of the industry unimpeded by restrictive or overly costly uses of fundamental technology.

As noted above, existing law provides for the applicability of the compulsory patent licensing authority to all patents the applications for which were filed prior to September 1, 1969. Due to a delay in receiving the new administration's views as to whether this authority should be extended for an additional 5 years, and due also to the press of other committee business in the time since such views were received, congressional extension of section 153 from September 1, 1969, to September 1, 1974, will not occur until after September 1, 1969. This initially raised a question in minds of the committee members as to whether enactment of extension legislation after, rather than before, September 1, 1969, would affect section 153's applicability to patent applications filed in the interim between September 1 and the enactment of the amendment recommended herewith. However, since the amendment provides that the compulsory patent licensing authority shall apply to any patent the application for which shall have been filed prior to September 1, 1974, it is clear that there will be no exception for patents for which applications may be filed between September 1, 1969, and the effective date of the extension amendment. The General Counsel of the Atomic Energy Commission has expressed a similar view in a legal opinion provided to the committee at its request (set forth in an appendix hereto).

Section 2. Increased criminal penalties for unauthorized diversion of special nuclear material

Section 222 of the Atomic Energy Act provides criminal sanctions for violations of section 57 (prohibiting possession of or dealing in special nuclear material without a general or specific license issued by the Commission), section 92 (prohibiting the unauthorized possession, manufacture, or transfer of an atomic weapon), and section 101 (requiring a Commission license for the possession, manufacture, or transfer of a production or utilization facility). Section 222 also provides criminal sanctions for anyone unlawfully interfering with the Commission's recapture of special nuclear material or entry into any plant or facility under section 108, which authorizes the Commission, when a state of war or national emergency exists, to order the recapture of special nuclear material or the operation of any licensed facility and to enter any plant or facility to carry out these orders. In the absence of intent to injure the United States or secure an advantage to any foreign nation, the maximum penalty for a violation of section 222 is imprisonment for 5 years and a fine of $10,000.

One of the most significant crimes punishable under section 222 is unauthorized diversion of special nuclear material, which, as noted above, is a violation of section 57. Special nuclear material, as defined in section 11aa. of the act, is the principal ingredient in nuclear and thermonuclear weapons. However, if a willful diversion of this material were committed by a person in this country under circumstances where the Government was unable to prove that the person charged specifically intended to injure the United States or to secure an advantage to any foreign nation, the maximum penalty which could be imposed under present section 222 would be a fine of $10,000 and imprisonment for 5 years. Thus, a thief, a terrorist, an insurrectionist, or a criminal group might commit such a diversion and, in the absence of proof of the requisite intent, would be subject to a maximum penalty under section 222 of imprisonment for 5 years and a $10,000 fine. For example, if the diversion were made for financially rewarding criminal purposes rather than out of political motivation, or if the unlawful sale were to the agent of an undisclosed principal and the unidentified principal was a foreign nation, the specific intent to injure the United States or secure an advantage to a foreign power might be found to be lacking.

Section 2 of the bill reported favorably herewith would amend section 222 to increase from 5 to 10 years the maximum imprisonment for such willful violations of the section. No increase in the maximum fine appears necessary. Because of the intrinsic value of special nuclear material, imprisonment would seem to be a more suitable deterrent than a fine.

The 1967 report of the Ad Hoc Advisory Panel on Safeguarding Special Nuclear Material appointed by the Atomic Energy Commission pointed up the weakness of the act in this regard and recommended that it be amended to increase the penalties for unauthorized diversion of such material. The Panel noted that the maximum penalties presently provided for "* * * may not be a sufficient deterrent to illicit transactions involving materials valued in excess of millions of dollars * * *" and observed, "The threat of detection and more severe criminal penalties should help deter organizations and individuals from attempting to divert materials to unauthorized uses."

The recommendations of this panel and of the executive branch for an increase in such penalties seem particularly cogent at this time because the growth of the nuclear industry, with all of its benefits to the public and the economy of the Nation, has necessarily resulted in an increase in the number of people knowledgeable in the field, the overall accessibility of special nuclear material, and the commercial market therefor. While most of the uranium moving in commerce generally is enriched only in the range of about 2 to 4 percent, and therefore is far below what is required for military purposes, and while all nuclear materials in the private segment of the economy having strategic importance are subject to comprehensive AEC safeguard sand accountability protection, the committee believes that the overall safeguards system can be further strengthened by increasing the penalty which would be available in the event of a conviction involving the diversion of special nuclear material. The increase in the maximum penalty for a violation of section 222 recommended herewith should serve to increase the deterrent effect on the potential diverter. The committee would also note in passing that increased maximum penalties for unauthorized diversion of these materials would make them more nearly comparable to those for crimes of similar gravity, such as theft of Government property (10 years' imprisonment and a $10,000 fine) and theft of property in interstate commerce (10 years' imprisonment and a $5,000 fine).

Section 3. Modification of criminal provisions relating to capital punishment and life imprisonment

The purpose of section 3 of the bill is to correct certain shortcomings in sections 222, 224a., 225, and 226 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 brought to light by the April 8, 1968, decision of the U.S. Supreme Court in United States v. Jackson, 390 U.S. 570. It was there held that the death penalty provision of the Federal Kidnaping Act is unconstitutional because in permitting imposition of the death penalty only upon defendants who assert their right to be tried by a jury, it discourages assertion of, and thereby imposes an impermissible burden upon the exercise of, a constitutional right. That decision was followed on June 17, 1968, in Pope v. United States, 392 U.S. 651, which held a similar provision of the Federal Bank Robbery Act unconstitutional.

These decisions would appear to hold significant implications for, and raise very substantial questions about, somewhat similar provisions in the sections of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 referenced above. The criminal offenses covered by section 222 are set forth in the immediately preceding section of this report. Sections 224a., 225, and 226 provide criminal penalties, respectively, for the unlawful communication of restricted data, the unlawful acquisition of restricted data, and removal or concealment of or tampering with restricted data. These sections provide that where there is a violation thereof with intent to injure the United States or to secure an advantage to a foreign nation, there may be imposed punishment by a fine or not more than $20,000 or imprisonment for not more than 20 years, or both, or, upon the recommendation of a jury, life imprisonment or death.

These penalty provisions of the Atomic Energy Act and the death penalty provision of the Federal Kidnaping Act operate in the same manner; therefore, the effect of the Jackson decision on the former would appear to be similar to its effect on the latter. Indeed, in certain respects the decision has more far-reaching effects on the Atomic Energy Act inasmuch as both the life imprisonment penalty and the death penalty provided for therein are contingent upon a jury recommendation, whereas only the death penalty provision of the Federal Kidnaping Act was affected by the Jackson decision. Both the Department of Justice and the Atomic Energy Commission have advised the Joint Committee that the provisions for death and life imprisonment in the Atomic Energy Act are very likely unconstitutional in their present form. This leaves as the maximum punishment for violations of these sections of the act, including transmitting highly sensitive restricted data to a foreign power, a fine of $20,000 or 20 years' imprisonment, or both.

H.R. 9644 and S. 1879, the legislation submitted to the Congress by the AEC, and S. 1878, the bill introduced by Senator Pastore, propose amendments to sections 222, 224a, 225, and 226 of the act which would have the effect of retaining the life imprisonment penalty in the affected sections, but delete the requirement for a specific recommendation by the jury before the maximum penalty prescribed may be imposed upon an offender. The bills would delete the capital punishment penalty presently provided for in these sections. In recommending abolition of the death penalty under the Atomic Energy Act, the AEC expressed the view that "a maximum penalty of life imprisonment is sufficiently severe, in view of the trend of opinion away from the use of capital punishment, doubt whether the death penalty serves as a substantial deterrent, the very small number of executions for any crimes in the United States during the past decade, and the views of some legal scholars and penologists that capital punishment has a harmful effect upon the administration of justice." Senator Pastore voiced substantially similar views when he originally introduced his measure in the 90th Congress.

The Department of Justice, in commenting on these bills, expressed no objection to deletion of the capital punishment provisions from the Atomic Energy Act. The Department did call the committee's attention to the fact that the National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws is currently performing an exhaustive study under its mandate "to make recommendations for revision and recodification of the criminal laws of the United States, including * * * changes in the penalty structure * * *," and on the basis of this development suggested that the committee might wish to defer final action on this legislation to await the report of that Commission.

However, the Joint Committee does not believe that necessary corrections to sections of the Atomic Energy Act dealing with penalties for offenses committed with intent to injure the United States or with intent to secure an advantage to a foreign nation should await the report of this Commission. The committee does not know with certainty when the Commission's study will be completed, and in any event cannot be sure what if any reforms in Federal criminal law will eventuate as a result of it. Nor does the committee believe that it should await the possible enactment of legislation presently pending before other appropriate committees of the Congress which would abolish the death penalty for Federal crimes generally. Final congressional action on such measures may itself be deferred pending completion of the aforementioned Commission study.

Moreover, the fact that an adequate penalty currently exists under section 794 of title 18, United States Code (a section of the Espionage and Sabotage Act of 1954) for certain serious crimes otherwise punishable under the relevant—and presently partially defective—sections of the Atomic Energy Act does not convince the committee that further delay in effecting corrections to these sections of the act is warranted. 18 U.S.C. section 794 prohibits the gathering or delivery of defense information to aid a foreign government, and carries substantial criminal sanctions for violation thereof. However, it is not at all clear to the committee that all of the various—and very serious—offense punishable under the sections of the Atomic Energy Act in question are covered under the Espionage and Sabotage Act. It would appear, therefore, that a hiatus in the more severe criminal sanctions against certain acts specifically intended to injure the United States or to aid a foreign power in an area vital to the national security would continue to exist if the relevant enforcement provisions of the Atomic Energy Act are not corrected at this time.

For these reasons, the committee has concluded that it should not delay in recommending necessary corrective amendments to the relevant sections of the Atomic Energy Act. To this end, the committee has included section 3 in the bill reported herewith. Section 3 of the bill would amend sections 222, 224, 225, and 226 of the act by striking out the provision authorizing the imposition of the death penalty for offenses committed with intent to injure the United States or to secure an advantage to a foreign nation. The bill would have the effect of substituting life imprisonment as the maximum penalty which may be imposed under these sections; however, the bill would delete from these sections the present requirement for a recommendation by the jury as a prerequisite to the imposition of the life imprisonment penalty (as well as the death penalty). The committee believes these recommended modifications in the law reflect both the changing mores of the Nation and recent interpretation of our constitutional law.

Statistics available for recent years evidence a decline in the number of executions carried out in the United States, notwithstanding the considerable number of persons inhabiting the "death rows" of the Nation's prisons. State chief executives are more frequently commuting death sentences to life imprisonment. A number of States have legislatively abolished the taking of human life as a price society may exact for violation of its tenets. Legislation which would abolish the death penalty for all Federal crimes is now pending before the Congress. A number of reasons explain this trend, most significant of which is the realization that the death penalty has been unsuccessful in its primary function: that of a deterrent to the commission of offenses for which it may be imposed.

The committee further recommends, in accordance with the recommendations of the AEC and the Department of Justice, that the sections in question be amended to provide the courts with greater flexibility in cases where they believe the facts warrant imposition of a sentence less than life imprisonment. Presently these sections authorize, as an alternative to imposition of the more extreme penalties, imposition of a fine of not more than $20,000 or imprisonment for not more than 20 years, or both. The committee bill proposes to delete the reference to imprisonment for 20 years and to substitute therefor authority to impose a sentence for any term of years; the authority to impose a fine of not more than $20,000 in lieu of or in addition to such prison term would be retained. The committee believes this change will afford the courts greater flexibility in sentencing and eliminate any question as to possible limitations on the authority to impose imprisonment for a fixed term of years.

Section 4. Civil monetary penalties

Section 4 of the bill reported herewith would amend the Atomic Energy Act by adding a new section 234 authorizing the Atomic Energy Commission to levy civil monetary penalties on persons who violate the licensing provisions of the act or any rule, regulation, order, or license issued thereunder. Substantially the same remedial authority has been conferred by statute upon other regulatory agencies, such as the Federal Communications Commission, the Federal Aviation Agency, and the Federal Trade Commission, to assist them in carrying out their regulatory functions. Such authority is civil only and would not bar criminal prosecution where appropriate.

Presently, the AEC in the exercise of its regulatory responsibilities has authority to suspend, modify, and revoke licenses and to issue "cease and desist" orders. The Commission also is empowered under section 232 of the act to enforce these orders and obtain any other appropriate relief by injunctions from Federal district courts if necessary. However, application of these enforcement remedies may not always be in the public interest. In some instances, for example, the revocation of a license or suspension thereof may be too harsh a penalty under the circumstances. Moreover, in certain cases suspension may penalize the licensee's employees through loss of income without having any significant impact on the licensee itself. At the present time, the AEC in such cases essentially must choose between issuing a revocation or suspension order, on the one hand, or, on the other, issuing a cease and desist order. The latter normally directs a licensee to refrain from specified objectionable conduct under threat of imposition of an authorized penalty, but does not itself impose any penalty. As noted, injunctions may also be sought in appropriate cases, but here again the enforcement action may be out of proportion to the infraction.

For these reasons the committee is of the view that the authority to impose civil penalties would materially assist the Commission in carrying out its program to protect public health and safety and assure the common defense and security. Conferring on the AEC the authority to impose civil monetary penalties, in addition to the Commission's existing authority to impose more severe sanctions either in lieu of or in addition to such monetary penalties, should afford the Commission ample flexibility to deal with infractions of varying severity.

Thus, for example, the Commission could, among other things, levy a civil monetary penalty where suspension or revocation of a license is not required, without depriving a licensee of his means of livelihood or without requiring cessation of an authorized activity which might be of material benefit to the public.

However, the committee would hasten to add that in recommending this legislation not the slightest suggestion is intended that serious violations of the Atomic Energy Act or of rules, regulations, orders, or licenses issued thereunder are to be penalized by a mere civil penalty. The committee particularly does not mean to suggest this where the violation is one that seriously threatens the health or safety of an employee or a member of the public. The measure is primarily intended for application in circumstances where utilization of the other and generally stronger regulatory tools available to the Commission would be tantamount to swatting a fly with a sledge hammer. The committee would note in this connection that the AEC has had relatively few cases involving violations of regulations or license conditions by AEC licensees which have been significant. As a matter of fact, the safety record established under the regulatory program of the AEC continues to be outstanding. In the nuclear reactor field, the AEC has licensed the operation of 114 reactors of all types since the beginning of the regulatory program in 1954. These 114 power, research, and testing reactors have accumulated a total of over 820 reactor years of operation without a radiation fatality or serious radiation exposure.

The record of safety in the handling of the various atomic energy materials has also been good. For example, in 1968 the Commission's Division of Compliance performed 2,016 inspection of materials licensees. Of the violations found in these inspections, it was necessary to issue notices of violation in only 40 cases and orders in only two. Of the latter, one ordered the licensee to cease and desist from further use of special nuclear material and to decontaminate its facilities. The second ordered a licensee to cease and desist operations which had not been authorized under the license in two areas of its plant. In all, AEC licensees in 1968 experienced a total of 20 radiation incidents of the four general types defined in part 20 of the Commission's regulations; only 12 of these involved exposure of personnel, all of whom were employees. It is apparent from this record that industry appreciates the need for careful compliance with the AEC's safety requirements.

During its consideration of this legislation the committee had before it two somewhat different legislative proposals on civil monetary penalties—that submitted by the AEC (H.R. 9648, S. 1882) and that introduced by Senator Pastore (S. 1878). The committee has drawn from what it considered to be the best features of both of these proposals in formulating the proposed new section 234 entitled "Civil Monetary Penalties for Violations of Licensing Requirements" reflected in section 4 of the bill reported favorably by the committee.

Specifically, this section would authorize the Commission to impose on any person civil penalties of not to exceed $5,000 for each single violation of any licensing provision of section 53, 57, 62, 63, 81, 82, 101, 103, 104, 107, or 109 of the Atomic Energy Act, as amended, or of any rule, regulation, order, or license issued under such sections. The section fixes a $25,000 limitation on the total monetary penalty which could be imposed on a person for violations occurring within any period of 30 consecutive days. The section further provides that if a violation is a continuing one, each day of such violation shall constitute a separate violation for the purpose of computing the applicable civil penalty. Procedural safeguards, including requirements that written notice be given by the AEC to the alleged violator of each act or omission with which he is charged and that an opportunity be provided for such person to show in writing why the proposed penalty should not be imposed, are specifically spelled out in the proposed legislation. In addition, basic authority provided in section 161 of the Atomic Energy Act and in the Administrative Procedure Act would permit the Commission to provide a full administrative hearing to any person charged with violation if such person so requested. The Commission assured the committee during public testimony that it would always provide such a full administrative hearing, if requested, prior to determining that a civil penalty should be imposed.

Should the Commission, following the completion of such procedures, determine that a penalty should be imposed, and should the violator fail to pay the amount assessed, the matter would be referred to the Attorney General. The Attorney General would be authorized, but not required, to institute a civil action in a court of competent jurisdiction to collect the penalty. While the bill would confer on the Commission the power of compromise, mitigation, and remission of penalties, such power would reside exclusively with the Attorney General under the bill with respect to such civil penalties as are referred by the AEC to him for collection.

Several points concerning the bill as reported are worthy of special note. For one thing, this new authority of the AEC to impose civil monetary penalties would not be confined to AEC licensees. Any person, whether or not an AEC licensee, would be subject to such a penalty if he committed a violation of the type covered by this legislation. ("Person" is defined by section 11 s. of the act to include virtually every individual or entity other than the AEC.) The committee believes that the authority to impose civil penalties on persons not possessing an AEC license, as well as on licensees, is necessary if the legislation is to achieve its full purpose. Otherwise it would be possible, for example, for a person who neglected to obtain a license, or who once had a license but allowed it to expire, to be immune to any penalty under the legislation. Of course, such person might be liable to criminal penalties authorized under the Atomic Energy Act, but in some circumstances those penalties might not be fully appropriate under all the relevant facts.

The committee also deemed it desirable to establish an overall maximum on the amount of the penalty which could be imposed for violations occurring within any 30-day timespan. While the legislation proposed by the AEC would have fixed a ceiling of not to exceed $10,000 for continuing violations occurring within any period of 30 consecutive days, no maximum was proposed on the penalties which could be imposed for a series of individual violations within such timespan. It occurred to the committee that in a particular case the continuing violation of one person could be considerably more serious than several violations by another person, yet the latter could be subject to a greater penalty than the former, since only the continuing violation would be subject to the proposed $10,000 maximum penalty. On the other hand, while S. 1878, Senator Pastore's bill, would have set an overall maximum of $7,500 on the amount of penalties which could be imposed, the committee agreed that in some cases—for example, involving an individual or firm with substantial financial resources—imposition of a penalty of this limited amount might have little significant impact on the violator.

For these reasons the committee has recommended a limitation on liability, but has fixed such limit at the more substantial sum of $25,000. Moreover, in recognition of the generally more serious nature of a continuing violation of licensing requirements, the bill as reported contains a provision providing that each day of such violation shall constitute a separate violation for the purpose of computing the applicable civil penalty.

The committee also has accepted the recommendation of the AEC and Justice Department that the legislation provide discretion to the Department, after the matter has been referred to it by the Commission, to determine whether a civil action should be instituted, since that Department would have basic responsibility for that action. S. 1878 proposed imposition of a duty on the Department in this regard.

As noted in the next section of the report, a related amendment to section 221 c. of the act is recommended in order to make it clear that approval of the Attorney General is not required prior to the initiation of administrative action by the Commission, not only with respect to the imposition of civil penalties, but also with respect to other regulatory enforcement action the Commission is presently authorized to bring.

Sections 5 and 6. Miscellaneous technical amendments

Sections 5 and 6 of the bill are essentially technical amendments to the Atomic Energy Act necessitated primarily by revisions in the act to be made by certain of the proposed amendments described above. Sections 5 and 6 would amend section 221 c. and 223 of the act, respectively, as indicated below.

Section 221 c. of the act presently provides:

"No action shall be brought against any individual or person for any violation under this Act unless and until the Attorney General of the United States has advised the Commission with respect to such action and no such action shall be commenced except by the Attorney General of the United States. * * *"

Section 5 of the bill would add a clarifying provision to section 221 c. to make it clear that the section does not require the approval of the Attorney General prior to the initiation of administrative action by the Commission. The proviso would apply not only to actions instituted under the new civil penalties authority contained in proposed section 234, but also to any other enforcement action the Commission is now authorized to take. The legislative history of the act indicates that "action" within the purview of section 221 c. means "court action" and does not apply to administrative action by the Commission. The proposed amendment to section 221 c. will prevent any possible misinterpretation of the scope of the Commission's authority to take appropriate administrative action. The AEC supports this amendment and the Justice Department voiced no objection to its enactment.

Section 6 of the bill would amend section 223 of the act by adding the word "criminal" before the word "penalty" to make it absolutely clear that the penalties referred to in the latter section do not include civil monetary penalties imposed under proposed new section 234. Section 223 of the act authorizes the imposition of penalties on persons who willfully violate, attempt to violate, or conspire to violate any provision of the act for which no penalty is specifically provided by the act, or any regulation or order prescribed or issued under certain specified sections of the act. Section 223 further provides that any person convicted thereunder shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 2 years, or both, except that whoever commits such an offense with intent to injure the United States or with intent to secure an advantage to any foreign nation shall be punished by a fine of not more than $20,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 20 years, or both.

Clearly the violations covered by section 223, and the penalties therefor prescribed by that section are punitive, i.e., criminal in nature. However, the section does not specifically characterize the penalties as "criminal"; the section simply refers to violations "for which no penalty is specifically provided. * * *" Heretofore there has been no need to distinguish between criminal and civil penalties under the act, because the only type of penalty that could be imposed was criminal in nature; utilization by the Commission of its authority to revoke, suspend, or modify a license is considered to be remedial in nature and not punitive. However, with conferral upon the AEC by section 4 of the bill of authority to impose civil monetary penalties, the need to make such a distinction arises. Insertion of the word "criminal" before the word "penalty" in section 223 will achieve this distinction and remove any possible suggestion that the penalties there referred to include civil penalties provided under the proposed new section 234.

Section 7. Effect of amendments to sections 222, 224, 225, and 226 on prior violations

Section 7 of the bill is in the nature of a "savings" provision, and specifically provides and emphasizes that the penalties presently provided under sections 222, 224, 225 and 226 of the act shall in no way be affected by the amendments thereto provided for in sections 2 and 3 of the bill insofar as offenses thereunder which occurred prior to the effective date of such amendments are concerned. The amended penalty provisions apply only to offenses committed on or after that date. The purpose of section 7 is twofold: first, it eliminates any suggestion that the revised criminal penalties in sections 222, 224, 225, and 226 are to have any retroactive effect upon offenses covered by those sections and committed prior to the effective date of the amendments but prosecuted thereafter; and second, it eliminates any possible suggestion that the existing penalties cannot be imposed, even after the effective date of the amendments thereto, for offenses committed prior to the effective date of such amendments. In the latter regard, it is the committee's intent that insofar as the various criminal penalties provided under existing sections 222, 224, 225, and 226 are free from constitutional or other defect, they shall be fully applicable in their present form to any person convicted of an offense for which those sections authorize penalties committed prior to the date of revision by the amendment reported herewith.

ORDER FOR SENATE TO CONVENE AT 10 A.M. TUESDAY THROUGH SATURDAY OF THIS WEEK

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate convene at 10 a.m. on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday of this week.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. SCOTT. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 20 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SENATE RESOLUTION 292—SUBMISSION OF A SENATE RESOLUTION RELATING TO SUBSTANTIAL REDUCTION OF U.S. FORCES PERMANENTLY STATIONED IN EUROPE

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, at this time this country has 429 major bases overseas and 2,297 lesser bases. These bases cover 4,000 square miles and are located in 30 countries. Stationed on these bases are 1,750,000 servicemen, families, and foreign employees, and the cost for maintaining these bases is approximately $4.8 billion a year.

Mr. President, I would like to discuss one area in which we have a large number of bases and an extraordinarily large number of troops, namely, Western Europe.

On January 19, 1967, I submitted Senate Resolution 49 which expressed the sense of the Senate that "a substantial resolution of U.S. forces permanently stationed in Europe can be made without adversely affecting either our resolve or ability to meet our commitment under the North Atlantic Treaty." I wish to introduce an identical resolution again today and ask unanimous consent that its text be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks and that the resolution be referred to both the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Armed Services Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Armed Services Committee; and, without objection, the resolution will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, we have had several hundred thousand men in uniform stationed in Europe since 1951 when President Truman, responding to the then existing situation and to a Senate sense resolution of that day, announced the first substantial post-World War II increase in U.S. forces there. When Senate Resolution 49 was introduced 2 years ago there were about 372,000 military personnel in Europe, including Turkey, Spain, and the 6th Fleet in the Mediterranean; this force was accompanied by some 240,000 dependents, a grand total of 612,000. There are now about 315,000 men—a good reduction—and they are accompanied by 235,000 dependents—not a good enough reduction—and 14,000 civilians employed by the U.S. Government. Thus, there are over 550,000 Americans in Europe today who are either in military service or associated with the military, and maintained wholly or largely by the Government of the United States.

We now have, overall, about 3.5 million men under arms. Of this total, about 1.2 million are stationed outside the United States, according to figures provided by the Department of Defense. In addition to those in Europe, there is a force of about 479,500 in Vietnam.

May I say, parenthetically, that as of last Thursday, this is 4,500 in excess of the 60,000 announced withdrawal by the President of the United States, a withdrawal which was to be met by December 15, 1969. Thus, I congratulate the President for going beyond the 60,000 mark. I hope that this is a continuation of a policy which, perhaps, may not be announced but which will be continued in effect, to the end that more and more troops can be withdrawn as appropriately as possible from Vietnam and all of Southeast Asia.

There are 129,000 in the fleets abroad, 58,000 in Korea, 45,000 in Thailand, 42,000 on Okinawa, another 40,000 in Japan, 28,000 in the Philippines, 24,000 in Latin America, 10,000 in North Africa and the Middle East, and another 10,000 in Canada, Greenland, and Iceland.

This commitment of men abroad obviously represents an enormous cost to the people of the United States. It is reflected in a military budget of some $80 billion and in the tax rates. It is also reflected in a balance-of-payments deficit which amounted to $1.3 billion in the first quarter of this year.

Our net foreign exchange gap with Germany alone is now running at about $965 million per annum. This is the highest figure to date. In 1968, the figure was $887.4 million. It had been between $700 and $800 million in the period 1963 through 1967, and under $700 million in the years before 1963.

In the past, part of this exchange gap has been covered through various agreements with the West German Government. In fiscal years 1962 through 1965 these so-called offset agreements consisted simply of commitments by the West German Government to procure military equipment in the United States. The agreement for fiscal years 1966 and 1967 provided for military procurement plus the prepayment of a West German debt. The fiscal year 1968 agreement provided for military procurement plus purchase of special medium-term U.S. Treasury securities by the West German Government. In fiscal year 1969 the agreement provided for military procurement plus the purchase of special U.S. Treasury securities by the West German Government, plus additional purchases of U.S. Treasury securities by West German banks plus an agreement by Lufthansa to finance purchases of aircraft.

I have had the Library of Congress draw up a table showing the terms of these so-called offset agreements between the United States and West Germany in fiscal years 1962 through 1969 and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, agreement was reached with the West German Government on July 9 covering fiscal years 1970 and 1971. The agreement provides for an inflow of foreign exchange in the amount of $1.52 billion over the next 2 years. In addition to military procurement in the United States, the agreement provides for a West German Government loan, plus retention in the United States for 2 years of interest earned by West Germany on U.S. Treasury deposits, plus the purchase by West Germany of U.S. Export-Import Bank and Marshall plan loans, plus West German civil procurement in the United States, plus payment to a fund in the United States for encouraging German investment plus advance transfers for debt repayment by the West German Government to the United States. A concessional interest rate of 3.5 percent will apply to the West German Government loan and to certain deposits in the U.S. Treasury for military procurement. I ask unanimous consent that the text of a press release issued by the Department of State on July 9, giving the terms of the agreement, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the press release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRESS STATEMENT

The U.S. and German delegations announced today the conclusion of a new agreement for offsetting foreign exchange costs of American forces in Germany for U.S. Fiscal Years 1970 and 1971. The delegations have been conferring in Washington this week on the third and concluding round of their talks.

The agreement provides for an inflow of foreign exchange to the U.S. in the amount of 1.52 billion dollars. These inflows will be achieved by $925 million of procurement of U.S. goods and services (61% of total agreement) and $595 million of financial measures (39% of total).

Details are as follows:

Military procurement in the United States	800.00
Federal Republic of Germany loan to the U.S. (repayable after ten years)	250.00
Purchase by Federal Republic of Germany of loans held in portfolio of Eximbank and of outstanding Marshall Plan loans	118.75
Civil procurement in the United States by Federal Republic of Germany	125.00
Creation of fund in U.S. by Federal Republic of Germany to encourage German investment in United States	150.00
Advance transfers by the Federal Republic of Germany for debt repayment to the United States	43.75
Retention in the United States of interest earned by the Federal Republic of Germany on U.S. Treasury deposits	32.50
Total	1,520.00

It was agreed that the interest rate which would apply to the inter-government loan and to certain Federal Republic of Germany deposits in the U.S. Treasury for procurement would be 3.5 percent.

The Export-Import Bank and Marshall Plan loans purchased by the Federal Republic of Germany would bear, on the average, a rate of interest at four percent with respect to certain loans and five percent with respect to others.

The U.S. delegation was led by Deputy Under Secretary of State Nathaniel Samuels; the German delegation was headed by State Secretary Guenther Harkort of the Foreign Office.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I would like to make several comments on the agreement. Before doing so, I should note that the Department of State apparently believes that this agreement represents a considerable improvement over previous agreements. To be sure, the amount of the military procurement is greater than last year, or the previous years. The borrowing by the United States is for a longer period than in the past and a concessional rate will apply to the West German Government's loan. The total amount is higher than ever before and the agreement is for 2 years instead of only one.

In those respects there has been "improvement." It would be well to bear in mind, however, that there is another side of the coin. While the amount of foreign exchange inflow involved is higher, so is the foreign exchange gap because it becomes more expensive every year to keep our forces in Germany. With the reevaluation of the Germany mark, moreover, this expense stated in dollars will increase again, and, possibly, more drastically than in the past. Furthermore, the agreement represents only about 80 percent of the foreign exchange outflow from the United States to Germany in the coming 2 fiscal years. And, while the West German Government loan to the United States will carry a concessional interest rate of 3.5 percent, nevertheless it represents an obligation of the United States which must be renewed or redeemed; the interest will result in some annual capital outflow and the capital of the loan itself must be regarded as, eventually, a large item of outflow. Finally, since the agreement is for a 2-year period, it may imply a commitment on our part to retain substantially the present level of U.S. forces in Germany for the next 2 years whether or not that should prove desirable or in accord with our national needs now or a year from now. In fact, the new West German Chancellor said in an interview in the November 14 issue of Time magazine that there was "an understanding on both sides," when agreement was reached on an offset arrangement for the next 2 years, that there would be no "substantial changes" in the level of U.S. forces during this period.

No matter how the current agreement is regarded, there is no escaping the fact that the assignment of U.S. military forces in Germany and Europe is a voracious consumer of U.S. resources, a source of inflation and, in present circumstances, a factor in the reduction in the international strength of the dollar.

It is a cliche to say that the United States is a rich and powerful country. After the long drain of Vietnam, however, it may be wise to take another look at that glib assertion. In terms of surplus for necessary national purposes at home and abroad, we are beginning to scrape the bottom of the barrel.

Other nations have come to realize that if they are to accomplish the essential tasks at home, it may be necessary to concentrate on only the essential tasks abroad. In my judgment, it is long past time for us to face the facts of our situation and reach the same conclusion. In this connection, I welcome the President's July 9 order to reduce the number of military men based abroad by 14,900—also his most recent order of a day or so ago in which approximately another 14,000, almost all in the Pacific area, will be reduced insofar as our Armed Forces are concerned—although in my judgment it is regrettable that the reduction is so limited and that the forces committed to NATO have been completely exempted from this cut in military forces overseas.

On April 15, I had printed in the RECORD the defense policy statement made by the Canadian Prime Minister on April 3. In that statement, Prime Minister Trudeau said:

NATO itself is continuously reassessing the role it plays in the light of changing world conditions. Perhaps the major development affecting NATO in Europe since the organization was founded is the magnificent recovery of the economic strength of Western Europe. There has been a very great change in the ability of European countries themselves to provide necessary conventional defense forces and armaments to be deployed by the alliance in Europe.

It was, therefore, in our view entirely appropriate for Canada to review and re-examine the necessity in present circumstances for maintaining Canadian forces in Western Europe. Canadian forces are now committed to NATO until the end of the present year. The Canadian force commitment for deployment with NATO in Europe beyond this period will be discussed with our allies at the Defense Planning Committee meeting in May. The Canadian Government intends, in consultation with Canada's allies, to take early steps to bring about a planned and phased reduction of the size of the Canadian forces in Europe.

According to press reports, which I understand to be accurate, the present plan is to reduce the number of the Canadian contingent of about 10,000 in Western Germany to about 4,000. This is a small reduction in numbers but a large reduction in percentage and would seem to represent, in effect, a change in the Canadian estimate of the situation in Europe, as well as a revision of policy on the part of the Canadian Government. I would hope this Nation would study the Canadian action most carefully. To me, it seems an adjustment which looks to the future instead of to the past.

Last year at this time, we, too, appeared to be on the verge of moving in the same direction. There was widespread support in the Senate for a proposal by the distinguished Senator from Missouri (Mr. SYMINGTON) which would have had the effect of lowering substantially the level of our forces in Europe. Most regrettably, there was the occupation of Czechoslovakia on August 20 by 400,000 Soviet and other Warsaw Pact forces. The time was one of extreme uncertainty, with various obscure troop movements in Eastern Europe. It was far from clear that the relatively bloodless coup in Czechoslovakia would mark the culmination of this activity. There was fear that the difficulties in Eastern Europe might spread throughout Europe.

As I stated at that time, a substantial reduction in U.S. Forces in Europe in those circumstances could have been subject to misinterpretation in the East, and brought grave uncertainty in the West. I added, however, that, in my judgment, it remained desirable to undertake a gradual reduction in U.S. forces if and when the situation in Eastern Europe offered reasonable assurance that developments there were not going to spill over into Western Europe. It seems to me that that time has now arrived. The Soviet Union faces serious problems in Czechoslovakia and elsewhere in Eastern Europe. If that were not enough, there is a difficult situation to the East on the Soviet-Chinese border. Soviet troops in Czechoslovakia, moreover, have been cut from several hundred thousand to about 70,000. While it is regrettable that the internal political life of that enlightened nation is again dictated by a foreign power, certain realities as they bear upon our military presence in Europe must be faced. What transpired in Czechoslovakia was not controllable in any fashion by NATO and bears no direct relationship to the question of the size of American forces assigned in Europe to that organization. Had there been only one or two divisions or, for that matter, seven or eight or 18 divisions of Americans in Western Germany, instead of four or five, would they have had any different effect on the situation as it developed in Czechoslovakia last year? I can find no basis for any such contention. Events within Eastern Europe are, as they have been since the Hungarian interlude made apparent for all to see more than a decade ago, beyond the direct reach of the North Atlantic Treaty and the military structure of NATO.

Nevertheless, it will be argued, as it is always argued, that the time is not right to make a substantial reduction of our forces in Europe. But it seems that the time is never right. I am aware of the recent press reports, for example, implying that NATO may be on the point of making a proposal to the Soviet Union and its Warsaw Pact allies for negotiations on reducing conventional forces in Europe. I would like to point out, however, that NATO has been studying the subject of balanced force reductions for years. My understanding is that there is still no agreed NATO proposal for balanced force reductions and it is not planned that there will be one until at least early in the summer. Even then, there is no reason to assume that discussions, much less full negotiations, will begin, for there has been no indication, direct or indirect, that the Soviet Union is interested in such discussions.

It will also be argued, as it is always argued, that bringing a substantial number of forces back from Europe will not affect our defense budget because we cannot reduce the number of men under arms. But it is also argued that it is not possible to reduce the number of men under arms because of the need to meet our NATO and other overseas commitments. This endless circle leading, in the end, to fiscal exhaustion can and must be broken.

I am not now advocating, and I have not in the past advocated, that all U.S. troops be removed from Europe. Our vital interest in what transpires in Europe remains and a U.S. presence should remain. In this day and age an armed attack on Western Europe will certainly involve us almost from the outset. It is to our interest, therefore, that we are present before the outset. That need can be met, in my judgment, and should be met with a much smaller military force.

At the same time, a substantial reduction of our forces in Europe would have certain immediately beneficial effects on this Nation. In the first place, the balance of payments should soon reflect a sharp decrease in outflow for military purposes, even as it becomes possible to bring about a reduction in the National military budget. In the second place, a reduction in U.S. forces in Western Europe might provide some impetus for Western Europeans to develop their own defense efforts in line with their needs and to work together more closely in doing so. Integrated defense is supposed to be what NATO is all about. To the extent that we have continued to overparticipate in the defense of Europe, it follows that there has been far less interest in bearing the burdens of that defense among the Europeans themselves.

Finally, a substantial reduction of American forces would help to correct what I regard as a distorted relationship between Europe and the United States. The Soviet Union maintains half a million soldiers in Eastern Europe. While the Russians may ascribe this presence to a threat from the West, the fact is that the Soviet presence is also a significant factor in maintaining communist governments in power, as Czechoslovakia has so clearly illustrated. The democracies have no need of U.S. forces in order to maintain themselves within the nations of Western Europe; yet, that most significant political fact is disguised by our military presence in such great magnitude.

In my judgment, it is not a desirable situation for a foreign power either in Eastern Europe or Western Europe to keep somewhere in the neighborhood of a million men in these two camps, a quarter of a century after the events which initially put them there. Both contingents are somewhat anachronistic, to say the least. Yet the continuing presence of the one has become the principal basis for the continuing presence of the other. The persistence of the anachronism leads not only to a distortion of political relationships, but to a distortion of economic relationships. Indeed, the annual offset negotiation with the West German Government is a case very much in point. West Germany is, in effect, becoming a major banker for this Nation in order that we may pay for the continued maintenance of U.S. forces in Germany at this Nation's expense.

In short, the presence of American forces in Europe in such large numbers, in my judgment, has vestiges, if not of empire in a 19th century sense, then of military occupation and of the costly cold war and of the one-time complete preeminence of the dollar in international finance. Yet the age of empire, the era of occupation, the period of the cold war and one-sided financial preeminence are of the past. The persistence of these vestiges in present policies involves, in my judgment, a wasteful and dangerous use of our available fiscal resources. It acts to debilitate this Nation's capacity, both at home and abroad, to deal with the urgent problems of the contemporary era.

Whereas the foreign policy and military strength of the United States are dedicated to the protection of our national security, the preservation of the liberties of the American people, and the maintenance of world peace; and

Whereas the United States, in implementing these principles, has maintained large contingents of American Armed Forces in Europe, together with air and naval units, for twenty years; and

Whereas the security of the United States and its citizens remains interwoven with the security of other nations signatory to the North Atlantic Treaty as it was when the treaty was signed, but the condition of our European allies, both economically and militarily, has appreciably improved since large contingents of forces were deployed; and

Whereas the means and capacity of all members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to provide forces to resist aggression has significantly improved since the original United States deployment; and

Whereas the commitment by all members of the North Atlantic Treaty is based upon the full cooperation of all treaty partners in contributing materials and men on a fair and equitable basis, but such contributions have not been forthcoming from all other members of the organization; and

Whereas relations between Eastern Europe and Western Europe were tense when the large contingents of United States forces were deployed in Europe but this situation has now undergone substantial change and relations between the two parts of Europe are now characterized by an increasing two-way flow of trade, people and other peaceful exchange; and

Whereas the present policy of maintaining large contingents of United States forces and their dependents on the European Continent also contributes further to the fiscal and monetary problems of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That—

(1) it is the sense of the Senate that, with changes and improvements in the techniques of modern warfare and because of the vast increase in capacity of the United States to wage war and to move military forces and equipment by air, a substantial reduction of United States forces permanently stationed in Europe can be made without adversely affecting either our resolve or ability to meet our commitment under the North Atlantic Treaty;

(2) S. Res. 99, adopted in the Senate April 4, 1951, is amended to contain the provisions of this resolution and, where the resolutions may conflict, the present resolution is controlling as to the sense of the Senate.

Terms of offset agreements between the United States and Western Germany, fiscal 1962–1969

Fiscal years and terms agreed by Western Germany:	Agreed target payments
1962–1963, Military procurement by West Germany from the United States	1,375
1964–1965, Military procurement by West Germany from the United States	1,375
1966–1967, Military procurement by West Germany from the United States plus prepayment of West German debt to the United States in the amount of $192 million	1,350
1968, Military procurement by West Germany from the United States	100
1968, Purchase by West Germany of special U.S. Treasury securities	500

Terms of offset agreements between the United States and Western Germany, fiscal 1962–1969—Continued

Fiscal years and terms agreed by Western Germany—Con.	Agreed target payments
1968, West Germany agreed that the Bundesbank would continue its practice of not converting dollars into gold.
1969, Military procurement by West Germany from the United States	100
1969, Purchase by West Germany of special U.S. Treasury securities	500
1969, Purchase of U.S. Treasury securities by West German banks	125
1969, Lufthansa agreed to finance $60 million purchase of aircraft in West Germany rather than U.S. market.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I think the speech which has just been delivered by the distinguished majority leader is of very great significance. I support it wholeheartedly. There is no question in my mind, from having given speeches similar to the one just given in my own State and elsewhere in this country, that there is overwhelming support for that position.

As I understand the argument of the distinguished majority leader, he is not asking that we withdraw entirely from Europe, or anything of the kind; he is asking that we withdraw some of our troops from Europe and recommending that some of the affluent countries there, which have enjoyed a tremendous increase in their standard of living and personal income, provide the necessary military manpower themselves.

When you look at the overall situation, and recognize that Western Europe has in fact, in the aggregate, more manpower than the Soviet Union, more skilled personnel, far greater production and economic resources, and far greater military resources, there is no reason why, a generation after World War II, as the Senator from Montana has stated so well, we should have to have our troops stationed there. Of course, we all recognize we are going to continue to provide a nuclear umbrella and naval and air support. But the Senator has stated well the answer to the argument we run into again and again by those who say that Europe is paying for these troops by buying obligations of the U.S. Treasury. As the Senator has stated, they shave the interest a little—3½ percent interest—but the U.S. taxpayer is still paying the cost and the interest. The German taxpayer is not paying it.

The President of the United States has announced some very modest troop reductions. However, they are so modest, when we recognize our enormous commitment in Europe, that I hope the distinguished majority leader's very logical and convincing position can be taken up by this body and, at long last, pressed to a reasonably early conclusion. As I have stated, a substantial majority of Senators have, in the past, supported the notion of our withdrawing troops from Europe. I hope that the speech given by the majority leader this morning is a real signal that we can move ahead and, within the next few months, act to begin a withdrawal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I ask unanimous consent to have 1 additional minute, to make one final point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I think the country is in general agreement that we should Vietnamize the Vietnam conflict, that it is time that we withdraw. Almost all of us agree with that. The only dispute is in the timing. At the same time, I think it is time that we provide for Europeanization of the defense of Europe. As I say, Europe has the manpower, the resources, and the ability to do it. Why should not Europe defend itself, with our assistance, but certainly without the commitment of 300,000 American troops and hundreds of thousands of additional personnel?

I thank the majority leader for a most significant statement.

Mr. GORE and Mr. SCOTT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, once again the majority leader has focused the attention of the Senate on an issue of grave importance to the well-being of the Nation. It is also characteristic of the thoughtful and considerate manner in which he functions that he has introduced his resolution in sufficient time to enable the Senate to give to the matter the careful and unhurried consideration it demands.

This time factor is important, perhaps critical. If I were confronted with the necessity of voting on this issue today, or within the next weeks, I would have to cast my vote in the negative. I fully share the concern of my esteemed colleague for the impact which the cost of maintaining our troops overseas has on our domestic programs and on our balance-of-payments position. I also understand that if the fabric of our national security is to be durable, it must be woven from a pattern which involves much more than the threads of U.S. forces deployed around the world. Because the issues involved are so complex, affecting not only our national security but in many important respects the well-being of the individual citizen, I believe it important that this body recognize at the outset that time will be required to consider this subject in its proper perspective and in all of its ramifications.

One obvious factor is the recently inaugurated negotiation with the U.S.S.R. in Helsinki. We do not know where those negotiations will lead but they could have an important impact on our security and that of our allies in Western Europe. Another factor of considerable importance is the psychological impact of the presence of our troops in Western Europe—and of a debate in this body on the reduction of such forces—on our allies as well as on the Soviets. Twenty-five years after World War II this body is moved to discuss whether the danger of aggression in Europe has not substantially receded; 25 years after World War I the world was engaged in World War II. The mind immediately jumps to the question as to how significant is the role of American troops in this contrast. Again, the significance must be measured in terms of the individual well-being of our citizens as well as in broader terms of national security.

One last thought. No one in this Chamber, nor I, would trust in the Nation at large, will think for one moment that either the distinguished majority leader or I are influenced by partisan considerations in this matter. I think that it is important to mention that in conducting his election campaign the President placed much emphasis on the importance he attaches to negotiating with the Soviets with a view to reducing the tensions that beset the world and in some measure are the cause of U.S. troop deployments abroad. It is logical and fair to assume that in electing President Nixon the people were in some measure motivated by the conviction that he is the right man to conduct those negotiations. The negotiations, or what we hope are the preliminaries to negotiations are underway. This is not the time for this body, with its very considerable responsibilities in the field of foreign relations, to send its own signals abroad or to take other steps which hinder or complicate the task of the President in this crucial role.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. SCOTT. I am happy to yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I am delighted that the distinguished Republican leader not only had the opportunity to listen to my remarks, such as they were, but also to spend some time reading the speech which had been prepared. I compliment him on the temperate tone which he has used and the understanding which he has indicated.

He is correct when he says this is not a partisan matter. He is correct when he says that the present President, Mr. Nixon, has placed a great deal of emphasis on our relations with Western Europe. But I think we ought also to point out that the man who was the first commander of NATO, and who was the last Republican President prior to Mr. Nixon, General Eisenhower, was one of those who advocated, even while he was in office, and certainly most emphatically after he left office voluntarily, that there should be a substantial reduction of U.S. forces in Europe. He felt that we had too many divisions there, and too many dependents, that it was too much of a strain on our resources, and that it conveyed the wrong impression and the wrong image as far as we were concerned.

I would point out to my distinguished friend across the aisle that it was a sense of the Senate resolution which sent four additional U.S. divisions to Europe in 1951. What I have introduced today on my own behalf—though I hope some other Senators will join with me—is another sense of the Senate resolution, indicating just how the Senate now feels about this matter. If a sense of the Senate resolution was good enough to get them in, I think it is good enough to get them out. A sense of the Senate resolution places on the President the responsibility for defining just what "a substantial reduction" means. This gives him a great deal of flexibility which he does not possess at the present time, and which, I think, would place him in a stronger bargaining position with our allies, so that he may get them to do what they have promised to do time and time again, but which none of them—not a single one; not a single ally other than Canada—has done in living up to the commitments which they promised to undertake.

There is Western Europe, on the front line. Why should they not take the primary responsibility in their own area to look after their own defense? Most of those countries are better off economically and financially than we are. They can afford it. We are paying the West Germans to allow us to maintain our forces in West Germany, and we are doing it through the sale of bonds at a special concessional rate of 3.5 percent. They should be paying us for what we are doing over there. This is one of the basic reasons why we have such difficulties in the balance of payments and in the gold outflow, both of which have had a deleterious effect on the economic affairs of this Nation.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 additional minutes.

I thank the distinguished majority leader. I think we both want to make clear that this is not a discussion in which one Senator proposes that troops be withdrawn from Europe, and another Senator opposes it. This is a resolution to consider the desirability of withdrawal of some troops, to which my reply is simply a statement that I hope we will, and I am glad that there is time in which we may, consider all of the arguments pro and con before we come to a conclusion. I state further that if I had to vote now, my vote would be negative. If I were able to vote later, and certain other developments had occurred, I would hope it could be an affirmative vote.

My reason for the comment I made is grounded primarily upon the talks in Helsinki. That is because I do not want it to appear to world opinion or to those people in Helsinki who are watching these SALT talks that we in the Senate are at this moment proposing action which might itself be the subject of negotiation. That is what I am getting at.

I agree with the distinguished majority leader that other nations ought to be doing more. We are paying heavily and through the nose for having kept our commitments and obligations and responsibilities in accordance with the very Senate resolution the majority leader refers to, which pertains to the sending of four divisions to Europe.

I wish it were possible for other nations to see their responsibilities in the same light. I suppose they feel relatively safe and entirely smug in allowing the United States to carry a major part of the burden. This is not true of all the nations. However, I am pleading for the Senate to consider the matter in such an atmosphere of time and reasoned deliberation as not to interfere with the negotiations in Helsinki.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I certainly have no desire, and never have had any desire, to interfere with the negotiations in Helsinki—negotiations that are at long last underway.

I do not see any connection at all between balanced force reductions and what is going on in Helsinki.

It is a little difficult for me to comprehend the situation which affects our relations with Germany vis-a-vis our five divisions stationed there.

I intended to submit the resolution some months ago. I did not do so because of the West German elections. Then I thought that with the change in government, the new government ought to have an opportunity to get its feet wet, so to speak, in administering affairs in West Germany.

Then there was the meeting of the NATO Deputy Foreign Ministers. I held back again on account of that. Then, after I had released the facts in the press, I found there was going to be a meeting of the NATO Foreign Defense and Finance Ministers. It seems to me that there is something going on in NATO every other week or so but not a great deal is being accomplished in bringing about the integration of forces, or balanced force reductions or any other similar achievement.

I commend the Republican leader for the stand he has taken. I understand it perfectly.

The distinguished Senator is correct in stating that the matter should be given serious consideration. And it will be given serious consideration by the two committees most concerned.

However, when I talk about the gold outflow and our balance of payments, what I am really getting at—and it is sometimes difficult for people to think that a politician is concerned with this—is a matter of principle when we get right down to it.

Over 500,000 military personnel and dependents, over a quarter of century after the war is over, are still in Western Europe. They were sent there to help these countries recover and to help them against a possible invasion from the east. These countries now tell us that they are getting along well with the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe.

West Germany is carrying on contracts with the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe and as far away as China. However, when someone raises the question of a reduction in forces, they create a straw man, a bogeyman, and tell us how difficult it is and how much they need us.

Canada is reducing its forces by 60 percent. French forces are out entirely. They told us 3 years ahead of time. We would not believe them.

Great Britain has done away with conscription. The Low Countries and other countries are reducing conscription.

We have not done away with conscription. We have not reduced our forces to any great extent. We have kept our commitments, our pledges, and our promises.

I think it is about time that our allies did the same.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the distinguished minority leader (Mr. SCOTT). The distinguished majority leader (Mr. MANSFIELD) has focused this morning upon a subject which is central to the security of the United States and, indeed, of the entire free world.

I join with the distinguished majority leader to the extent of welcoming a review of the question whether the level of United States forces in Europe should be reduced.

Along with the majority leader, I have had the opportunity to serve as a member of the Canadian-United States Interparliamentary Group, and to hear representatives of the Canadian Government explain their attitude and position with respect to troop levels in Europe.

It seems to me, as we approach this subject, that we must be very conscious of the fact that the level of our troop strength in particular is a vital element in maintaining a credible NATO deterrent.

While I can support the majority leader in his insistence upon an appropriate balance insofar as our troop commitments are concerned, I underscore the importance of making sure that we do not weaken NATO and that we do not take steps which would weaken our ability to negotiate with the Soviet Union.

I interpret and understand the remarks of the majority leader as indicating no intention on his part to cast doubt upon our commitment to the defense of NATO Europe or that the review contemplated by his resolution would do so.

As I understand it, the concern of the distinguished majority leader relates to the appropriate level of U.S. forces in Europe, and is not directed at NATO itself or at the security system which has been so important in helping to provide two decades of relative peace in Europe.

I stress this point because as we enter an "era of negotiation," and particularly as we undertake very serious talks with the U.S.S.R. on strategic arms limitation, I believe it is essential to make clear that in this day and age we recognize that the security of Western Europe is inseparable from the security of the United States.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I agree with the last statement made by the distinguished acting Republican leader, that our security is intermingled, that it is integrated. However, I point out that these countries should assume a good deal more of the share of the burden in defense of their own area.

I appreciate the remarks made by the acting Republican leader.

Mr. PROXMIRE subsequently said: Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement in support of the statement of the distinguished majority leader in connection with withdrawing some of our troops from Western Europe. I think we should recognize the enormous cost of having these troops in Europe. The cost is billions and billions of dollars a year, at a time when we are debating at great length cutting back on our educational expenditures, and spending to meet hunger and health needs. The administration is recommending cutbacks in these areas. Billions spent on our troops in Europe represents an area where we could save an immense amount of money and provide a salutary result. Once we withdraw our troops, Europe will know we mean business, and until that time they will not provide the troops they can and should provide.

Mr. DOMINICK subsequently said: Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Montana in connection with the withdrawal of our troops from Western Europe. I do not often find myself in agreement totally with these two Senators, but I am in agreement with them on this point. I have been making speeches on this matter for the past 4 or 5 years.

It seems to me incomprehensible that 25 years after World War II we have over 315,000 troops in Europe, while at the same time our allies fail to meet their obligation. We are doing this at the same time we are having trouble in our balance of payments.

Mr. PEARSON subsequently said: Mr. President, today, for the third time in as many years, a resolution has been introduced expressing the sense of the Senate that a substantial reduction in the size of the American military commitment to NATO is now justifiable and desirable. As on previous occasions, I join as a cosponsor of this resolution which Senator MANSFIELD has introduced and I want to associate myself with the remarks of the distinguished majority leader and to salute him for the leadership he has demonstrated on this issue.

This resolution would replace Senate Resolution 99 adopted in 1951, which expressed the sense of the Senate that given the conditions then prevailing it was necessary to substantially expand the size of the U.S. commitment to NATO. The resolution introduced today asserts the proposition that current conditions are so different from conditions of the early 1950's that such a large contingent is no longer necessary or desirable. The contrasts between the early 1950's and the late 1960's are considerable.

At that time the threat of a direct Soviet conventional force assault against Western Europe was a distinct possibility. Today this is highly unlikely.

At that time the possibility of internal communistic revolution was very real in several Western European countries but today such a prospect is most improbable.

At that time the economies of the Western European nations were weak and unstable and only just beginning to emerge from the chaos and destruction of World War II. Today, these economies are strong and expanding.

At that time there was a need for a large American presence to help ease the way for the emergence of the German Federal Republic as a stable, acceptable partner in the European community. Today, most of the difficulties and uncertainties associated with the West German role in Western Europe have been removed.

Mr. President, no one suggests that East-West relations have become so cordial that we need no longer give serious attention to the defense of Western Europe, but on the other hand few seriously believe that a large scale of conventional war in Western Europe is likely. Certainly there is little evidence that Western Europeans themselves hold such a view.

But if a large-scale conventional conflict in Europe is unlikely the prospects for local and limited skirmishes remain high. Thus the primary function of NATO conventional forces is to contain limited Soviet actions such as a new move against the communication lines of Berlin or a probing border incident. If NATO forces are not of a size and effectiveness to meet such contingencies then we will be trapped into the type of situation where our options will be so restricted that we will be forced to engage in nuclear brinksmanship. In other words, it is absolutely essential that the American nuclear defensive umbrella over Europe be supplemented by a credible conventional force, thus maintaining a symmetry of defensive power.

Given this function of NATO conventional forces, the key question then is whether or not an American force of the present size is necessary. I believe that the answer is definitely in the negative. We should remember that today's ground force level is substantially the same as that which was established in the early 1950's—at a time when major conventional warfare had to be considered a distinct possibility and at a time when Western European countries were not economically strong enough to maintain a credible conventional deterrent.

When we built up the American contingent in the early 1950's political leadership on both sides of the Atlantic assumed that this would be temporary. For a number of years now the real question has been when and how a reduction should take place rather than whether or not a reduction should occur.

Unfortunately, we never seem to get beyond this general proposition. Whenever it is suggested that a phased reduction should be initiated, advocates of the status quo always respond by saying this is not the time.

Each year we find some reason to delay the initiation of serious discussions designed to pave the way for a reduction. Today, the Czechoslovakian situation is cited as the reason why we cannot initiate such discussions. Certainly the invasion of Czechoslovakia last August is dramatic evidence of the determination of the present Soviet leadership to keep its Eastern European satellites in line. The Brezhnev doctrine, which says that the Soviet Union has the right to interfere with the internal affairs of the Eastern European countries, is not a mere paper construction but a harsh reality; the Soviet leadership is quite willing to use brute force to suffocate the faintest breath of independence.

However, the fact that the Warsaw Pact armies were ordered into Czechoslovakia does not signal an increased likelihood that the Kremlin leaders will order these same armies into Western Europe. It would not, of course, have been advisable for the United States to announce a troop reduction at the time of the invasion. However, when all things are considered, the Czech situation does not really alter the question of whether or not the American conventional force in Western Europe should be maintained at its present level.

Those who endorse the resolution introduced today do not suggest that we should immediately reduce the American force but we do believe that this Government should immediately notify the Western European capitals of our determination to bring about such a reduction at the earliest possible date. We must stop putting off the date for making such a declaration of intention hoping that next year or the year after or the year after that will somehow be more auspicious.

Actually there are a number of reasons why this aftermath period of the Czechoslovakian invasion is an appropriate time for the U.S. Senate to adopt this resolution. The Czech incident had the effect of jarring the Western European powers out of their complacency. Prior to last August most observers were talking about the decline of NATO and many were predicting its ultimate demise. Today, NATO has a new sense of purpose, a new unity, a renewed strength. Thus planned reductions in the manpower commitments by Belgium, the Netherlands, West Germany, and Britain have been canceled and other steps have been taken to add to NATO's military strength.

Thus, hopefully there is a new sense of responsibility and determination among the nations of Western Europe to more effectively provide for their own defense. It may well be then that this is precisely the time that we should begin to seriously plan for a reduction in our commitment.

Given the fact that the defense of Europe rests ultimately on the American nuclear deterrent and unless we were to have a situation where the West Europeans are to abdicate all their responsibility to NATO the difference between an American ground force of, say, two divisions and the present five- to six-division force is not of great military significance. However, it has taken on exaggerated psychological significance. In the minds of many, too many, a reduction of the American force would be seen as a wavering in our pledge to defend Western Europe and a sign of our desire to withdraw from the Atlantic community.

Mr. President, I reject the argument that these psychological-political factors are sufficient to require the maintenance of such a large U.S. force in Western Europe. If the credibility of our pledge to defend Western Europe and to participate fully in the Atlantic community is not yet established it never will be. In short, I suggest that America is being asked to pay too high a price to prove what should already be obvious.

Mr. President, one of the most troublesome burdens of our troop commitment to NATO is that it continues to be a major cause of our balance-of-payments deficit. During the 9-year period from fiscal 1961 through fiscal 1969—estimated—the net dollar drain associated with the maintenance of the American force in Western Europe totaled $6.7 billion. During this period our total worldwide balance of payments was $22.3 billion. Thus over the past 9 years our commitment to NATO has caused about 30 percent of our balance-of-payment deficit. And the net dollar drain associated with our Western European commitment has been increasing rather than decreasing. For example, for the 4 years from fiscal 1962 through fiscal 1965 the average net dollar drain was just over $500 million, but for the 4 years from fiscal 1966 through fiscal 1969 the yearly average was $800 million.

If the deficit were of no serious economic concern then this would be no problem. But, of course, this is not the case, for in recent years our balance-of-payments deficit has become a problem of pressing importance not only for us but for the West's entire international financial structure.

Mr. President, withdrawing American troops from Europe will not necessarily result in a saving to the U.S. taxpayer. This would occur only if the units in question were deactivated. And whether or not they, or their equivalents should be deactivated must be treated as a separate question. However, it is quite clear that so long as we maintain this large commitment to NATO we will find it extremely difficult to reduce our overall troop levels.

Mr. President. our defense effort costs us the equivalent of over $350 per capita per year. And defense expenditures run from 9 to 10 percent of our gross national product. In contrast, the defense expenditures of our NATO partners run less—in some cases considerably less—than 5 percent of the respective gross national products. On a per capita basis, our defense burden is 5 to 7 times as great as theirs.

I do not in any way suggest that they should be matching our expenditures proportionately. I do suggest that they are quite capable of providing effective replacements for the American forces which should be withdrawn.

In conclusion, I would assert once again that we must break out of that line of argument which equates discussion of troop reduction with a signal that the United States intends to turn its back on Europe; a line of argument which has given an aura of permanence to that which initially was to have been temporary. Considering our own needs and problems and in view of the economic capacity of the West Europeans to carry their rightful share of the burden for their own defense, I submit that the troop reduction must be reopened. We must reconsider the attitudes of the 1950's which, unfortunately, have become our blinders in the 1960's.

ALLEGED KILLING OF CIVILIANS IN VIETNAM

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, the alleged massacre of South Vietnamese civilians by our soldiers has only served to heighten our fears and our apprehensions about our involvement in a controversial war. The massacre, indeed if it did occur, is a sad commentary on our times. Today we are searching for world peace. But it is instances such as this which undermine the very faith and confidence of our own people—not to mention peoples of the rest of the world. The report is most untimely because it comes almost 2 years after the event is alleged to have occurred. The military is digging its own grave with this kind of coverup system.

I think it is time that General Westmoreland laid the cards on the table. What is the military policy on combat field operations? Do we send our soldiers out with orders to bring back no captives or with as many captives as possible? Do we take the word of the South Vietnamese Government and do they take ours without any questions asked? General Westmoreland should state succinctly our present policy and he should likewise say if and how that policy has changed during the years of our involvement in Vietnam.

I want to emphasize that I am not prejudging the individuals accused of committing these alleged atrocities. Under our system of law, they are innocent until proven guilty. But is this an isolated incident?

If there are other events where the facts may prove to be less than pleasant to the military, that is no reason to keep them from the American people. The American citizen, already tired of this war, is growing weary. Weary from a war where the policy is often misunderstood because of instances such as this.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE— ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Bartlett, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Acting President pro tempore:

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ERVIN:

S. 3188. A bill to provide for compliance with constitutional requirements in the trials of persons who are charged with having committed certain offenses while subject to trial by court-martial, who have not been tried for such offenses, and who are no longer subject to trial by court-martial; and

S. 3189. A bill to provide for compliance with constitutional requirements in the trials of persons who, while accompanying the Armed Forces outside the United States, commit certain offenses against the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(The remarks of Mr. ERVIN when he introduced the bills appear later in the RECORD under the appropriate heading.)

By Mr. DOMINICK:

S. 3190. A bill providing for the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, after consultation with the Surgeon General, to report annually to the Congress concerning the health consequences of using marihuana; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

(The remarks of Mr. DOMINICK when he introduced the bill appear later in the RECORD under the appropriate heading.)

By Mr. CRANSTON (for himself and Mr. MURPHY):

S. 3191. A bill to withdraw various lands in the counties of Mono and Inyo, Calif., from appropriations under the public land law, release certain lands in the counties of Mono and Inyo from withdrawal, acquire various lands owned by the city of Los Angeles, Calif., grant to the city of Los Angeles various land and water rights, modify the act of March 4, 1931, Executive Order No. 5843 (dated April 28, 1932) and Executive Order No. 6206 (dated July 19, 1933) and repeal the act of June 23, 1936, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

(The remarks of Mr. CRANSTON when he introduced the bill appear later in the RECORD under the appropriate heading.)

By Mr. MURPHY (for himself and Mr. CRANSTON):

S. 3192. A bill to designate the navigation lock on the Sacramento deepwater ship channel in the State of California as the William G. Stone navigation lock; to the Committee on Public Works.

(The remarks of Mr. MURPHY when he introduced the bill appear later in the RECORD under the appropriate heading.)

By Mr. BAYH:

S. 3193. A bill for the relief of Graeme Ronald Houghton; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 3188 AND S. 3189—INTRODUCTION OF BILLS RELATING TO THE TRIAL OF FORMER SERVICEMEN, U.S. EMPLOYEES STATIONED OVERSEAS, AND MILITARY DEPENDENTS

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President. Recent disclosures of the alleged killing of Vietnamese civilians by American forces in the village of My Lai have brought to public attention once more a serious problem of jurisdiction which has existed since 1955. At present, there is no apparent jurisdiction in any American court, either State, Federal, or military, to try offenses committed by former U.S. servicemen while they were in military status.

This gap in jurisdiction stems from the Supreme Court case of Toth v. Quarles, 350 U.S. 11, decided in 1955. In that case, the Supreme Court ruled that section 3(a) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice was unconstitutional because it gave court-martial jurisdiction over persons who were not at the time of trial subject to military jurisdiction.

This problem has concerned the Constitutional Rights Subcommittee for over a decade. My distinguished predecessor as chairman of the Constitutional Rights Subcommittee, the late Senator Thomas Hennings of Missouri, introduced a bill in 1957 designed to give jurisdiction to Federal district courts over these cases. In the years since then, I have in turn introduced similar legislation, most recently in the 90th Congress.

In the past the proposals have been referred to the Judiciary Committee, and to the Constitutional Rights Subcommittee. The Subcommittee has wrestled with this exceedingly difficult constitutional problem all these years without success. Together with the Department of Defense, the Department of Justice, and the Department of State, we have tried to fashion a satisfactory legislative solution. The problem was considered by the subcommittee in its hearings on military justice in 1962 and again in 1966. Because of the many unresolved problems inherent in this issue, and because there has not in past years been any pressing circumstance which might require enactment of the legislation, I did not reintroduce the proposed legislation in this Congress.

Now it is again apparent that the issue is very critical. The My Lai incident poses this problem in glaring terms. I have written the Department of Defense, and will today write to the Departments of Justice and State, to obtain their present thinking on the issue. In the meantime, I believe it is essential that the Congress have before it once again one proposed solution to this gap in jurisdiction. For that reason, I introduce for appropriate reference the two bills which have been before the Constitutional Rights Subcommittee in past years. These bills confer jurisdiction on Federal district courts over two classes of persons—former servicemen accused of offenses committed before they were released from service, and civilians who are dependents of servicemen, or who are defense employees, stationed with the military overseas. This proposal follows a suggestion made by Justice Black in his opinion in the Toth case. The bills are identical to those which were last introduced in the 90th Congress, with but one exception. I have omitted the limitation which made the legislation effective only as to offenses committed after the enactment of the bills. Whether the legislation, if enacted, should or properly could be made retroactive to cover prior offenses is only one of the many very difficult questions which must be resolved.

I hasten to state, as I have each time I introduced this legislation in the past, that I am not committed to them either in form or approach. This is a most difficult and controversial problem, as the subcommittee long ago discovered. The issue is made no easier by the disclosures of the past few days.

For the guidance of the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that the bills, plus explanatory matter relating to them, excerpted from the subcommittee's hearings in 1966, be printed in full in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bills will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bills and excerpt will be printed in the RECORD.

The bills (S. 3188) to provide for compliance with constitutional requirements in the trials of persons who are charged with having committed certain offenses while subject to trial by court-martial, who have not been tried for such offenses, and who are no longer subject to trial by court-martial; and (S. 3189) to provide for compliance with constitutional requirements in the trials of persons who, while accompanying the armed forces outside the United States, commit certain offenses against the United States, introduced by Mr. ERVIN, were received, read twice by their titles, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A bill to provide for compliance with constitutional requirements in the trials of persons who are charged with having committed certain offenses while subject to trial by court-martial, who have not been tried for such offenses, and who are no longer subject to trial by court-martial

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That subsection (a) of section 803 (article 3) of title 10, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"(a) Subject to section 843 of this title (article 43), any person not subject to trial by court-martial who is charged with having committed, while in a status in which he was subject to trial by court-martial, an offense against this chapter punishable by confinement for five years or more, and who, while in such status, was not tried for such offense may be tried upon indictment for such offense—

"(1) in the United States district court for any judicial district in which any act or omission constituting an element of such offense was committed, if such offense was committed in the United States, or

"(2) in the United States district court for the judicial district in which such person is found or into which he is first brought, if such offense was committed outside the United States or on the high seas. No person may be tried in any district court for any such offense if (1) the offense is one for which such person could not be tried by court-martial without his consent if he were in a status subject to trial by court-martial, or (2) such person has been previously tried in a State court for substantially the same offense. For the purpose of all proceedings for or ancillary to the trial of any person for any such offense in any district court of the United States, such offense shall be considered to be an offense prohibited by and punishable under the provisions of title 18, United States Code.

A bill to provide for compliance with constitutional requirements in the trials of persons who, while accompanying the armed forces outside the United States, commit certain offenses against the United States

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That title 10, United States Code, is amended by adding after chapter 47 a new chapter as follows:

"CHAPTER 48.—TRIAL OF CERTAIN PERSONS WHO ACCOMPANY THE ARMED FORCES OUTSIDE THE UNITED STATES

"Sec.

"951. Persons subject to trial; jurisdiction of United States district courts; offenses for which persons may be tried.

"952. Statute of limitations; maximum punishment; general provisions.

"§ 951. Persons subject to trial; jurisdiction of United States district courts; offenses for which persons may be tried

"(a) Any citizen, national, or other person owing allegiance to the United States who commits any offense referred to in subsection (b) of this section while serving with, employed by, or accompanying the armed forces outside the United States shall be guilty of an offense against the United States and shall be tried for such offense in the United States district court for the judicial district in which such person is found or into which he is first brought.

"(b) The offenses for which any person described in subsection (a) of this section may be tried in a United States district court are those offenses specified in—

"(1) sections 877 through 881 of this title (articles 77–81) insofar as such sections relate to offenses referred to in clauses (2) through (5) of this subsection;

"(2) section 882 of this title (article 82);

"(3) sections 907 through 911 of this title (articles 107–111);

"(4) sections 913, 914, and 916 of this title (articles 113, 114, and 116); and

"(5) section 934 of this title (article 134) to the extent of crimes and offenses not capital.

"§ 952. Statute of limitations; maximum punishment; general provisions

"(a) An indictment may be found at any time without limitation with respect to any offense referred to in section 951(b) of this title for which the death penalty may be imposed. Except as provided in section 843(f) of this title (article 43(f)), no person shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished under this chapter for any offense, not capital, unless the indictment is found or the information is instituted within three years next after such offense shall have been committed. No person may be tried under this chapter for any offense if such person has been tried for substantially the same offense in a foreign country pursuant to a treaty or agreement to which the United States is a party.

"(b) The maximum punishment which may be imposed in the case of any person tried for an offense pursuant to this chapter shall be the same as that applicable to persons subject to trial by courts-martial for the same offense, but the provisions of chapter 47 of this title relating to the forfeiture of pay and allowances shall not be applicable in the case of any person tried under authority of this chapter.

"(c) Any offense for which a person is indicted and tried under authority of this chapter shall, for the purpose of all proceedings for or ancillary to the trial of such person, be considered to be an offense prohibited by and punishable under the provisions of title 18, United States Code.

"(d) Nothing in this chapter shall be construed as depriving courts-martial, military commissions, provost courts, or other military tribunals of concurrent jurisdiction with respect to offenders or offenses that by statute or law of war may be tried by courts-martial, military commissions, provost courts, or military tribunals.

"(e) As used in this chapter, the term 'outside the United States' means outside the several States, Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Virgin Islands, Canal Zone, and the special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the United States."

SUMMARY OF BILLS

S. 761 would provide that persons who are charged with having committed certain offenses while subject to trial by courts-martial, but who were not tried for such offense by a court-martial and who are no longer subject to such jurisdiction, may be tried upon indictment in the U.S. district court into which he is first brought, if the offense was committed outside the United States, or in any U.S. district court in which an element of the offense was committed, if the offense was committed within the United States. This jurisdiction is authorized for crimes punishable by the uniform code of military justice by confinement for 5 years or more. Persons who have been tried for the offense in a State court, or whose consent would have been needed for trial by court-martial, are not subject to this bill.

Reason the bill is proposed

Prior to the enactment of the uniform code of military justice, there was no American forum for the trial of ex-servicemen who committed crimes while in uniform which were not discovered until after the serviceman had left the service. The uniform code, in article 3, closed this jurisdictional gap by granting courts-martial jurisdiction. However, in the case of Toth v. Quarles, 350 U.S. 11, the Supreme Court said that this provision was unconstitutional. Accordingly, there is no American tribunal available for such cases.

The Supreme Court, in the Toth case, did not preclude congressional authorization of jurisdiction to a Federal court. Accordingly, S. 761 gives such jurisdiction to the Federal district courts. At the present time, of course, various Status of Forces treaties give to foreign countries the right to try Americans for crimes committed while in military status, in certain instances. However, this might require extradition in the case of ex-servicemen, and would subject them to criminal procedure which might not contain adequate safeguards for their rights, and, in any case, which would be unfamiliar to them.

Departmental views

The Department states that it is opposed to S. 761 because the enactment of such legislation would create burdensome administrative problems. The Department recommends that action be delayed on this proposal pending further study by various concerned Executive offices.

[S. 761, 89TH CONG., 1ST SESS.]

A bill to provide for complaince with constitutional requirements in the trials of persons who are charged with having committed certain offenses while subject to trial by court-martial, who have not been tried for such offenses, and who are no longer subject to trial by court-martial

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That subsection (a) of section 803 (article 3) of title 10, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

(a) Subject to section 843 of this title (article 43), any person not subject to trial by court-martial who is charged with having committed, while in a status in which he was subject to trial by court-martial, an offense against this chapter punishable by confinement for five years or more, and who, while in such status, was not tried for such offense may be tried upon indictment for such offense—

"(1) in the United States district court for any judicial district in which any act or omission constituting an element of such offense was committed, if such offense was committed in the United States, or

"(2) in the United States district court for the judicial district in which such person is found or into which he is first brought, if such offense was committed outside the United States or on the high seas. No person may be tried in any district court for any such offense if (1) the offense is one for which such person could not be tried by court-martial without his consent if he were in a status subject to trial by court-martial, or (2) such person has been previously tried in a State court for substantially the same offense. For the purpose of all proceedings for or ancillary to the trial of any person for any such offense in any district court of the United States, such offense shall be considered to be an offense prohibited by and punishable under the provisions of title 18, United States Code."

SEC. 2. The amendments made by the first section of this Act shall be effective with respect to any offense committed on or after the date of enactment of this Act.

The memorandum accompanying Senate bill 761 is as follows:

Proposed bill to provide an American forum, subject to the U.S. Constitution, for trial of serious offenses by persons who have been separated from the armed services

Background memorandum: Under the articles of war no American forum existed to prosecute offenses against those articles by a serviceman who was discharged before charges had been preferred against him. As a result, World War II produced several incidents where persons who allegedly had committed serious crimes were immune from trial because they had been discharged and were no longer subject to trial by court-martial and also were not subject to trial in any American civil court. Congress attempted to close this jurisdictional loophole by enacting article 3 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice; but the Supreme Court, in the famous case of Toth v. Quarles, 350 U.S. 11, held this provision unconstitutional. In light of the Toth case, courts-martial lack jurisdiction to try a serviceman for predischarge violations of the Uniform Code, however serious they may be (unless the ex-serviceman later reenlists); and so frequently there is no American court which can try the accused for his crime. Of course, if the crime was committed overseas in a foreign country and if the accused either has remained there or can be extradited to that country, prosecution may still be possible; but in that event the ex-serviceman is brought to trial in a foreign court, which is not subject to the U.S. Constitution and may not furnish some of the procedural safeguards with which we are familiar.

In light of these circumstances and of the fact that the Supreme Court did not say in the Toth case that jurisdiction could not be granted to prosecute persons like Toth in a Federal civil court, the best solution would appear to be through amendment of article 3 to authorize trial in Federal district courts of ex-servicemen whose crimes were committed while they were in the Armed Forces and who would not otherwise be subject to trial for the offense in a State or Federal court. In this manner the jurisdictional hole can be plugged; but trial can take place in an American tribunal, where every constitutional safeguard will be present. Furthermore, in instances where the alleged crime occurred overseas, there will be considerably less occasion to deliver or extradite the ex-serviceman to a foreign court for trial, since an American court would also have the power to try for the same misconduct. On the other hand, under present laws trial by an American court is impossible; and therefore foreign prosecution is the only alternative to condoning the crime.

The armed services have been interested in the problem and legislation was studied after the Toth decision to help meet the problem created there. (See subcommittee hearings at 852, 910, 946.) However, somewhere along the line action apparently has bogged down.

To implement this proposal, it would seem desirable to:

SUMMARY OF BILL

S. 762 would provide that any person serving with, employed by or accompanying the Armed Forces outside the United States, who commits certain specified offenses, shall be tried in the U.S. district court where he is found or first brought. The statute of limitations for offenses not involving the death penalty shall be 3 years. The maximum appropriate sentence is that authorized by the Uniform Code of Military Justice for the same offense. The provisions of title 18, United States Code, shall apply with respect to the proceedings of such trial.

Reason the bill is proposed

With the end of World War II, the United States, for the first time, stationed large forces on the soil of foreign countries for an extended period of time. Accompanying these forces are large numbers of civilians, whether as employees or dependents of the armed forces. With minor exceptions, there is no American tribunal available to try offenses committed overseas by members of this large American civilian community. To provide such a forum, article 2(11) of the Uniform Code authorized trial by courts-martial offenses committed by these persons. However, the Supreme Court in a number of decisions, notably that of Kinsella v. Singleton, 361 U.S. 234, ruled that the forum for such trial cannot be a court-martial.

To close this jurisdictional gap, S. 762 confers jurisdiction upon Federal district courts for such trials. It incorporates the maximum punishments set forth in the Uniform Code, and the procedural rules generally applicable in Federal criminal trials.

Departmental views

The Department states that it is opposed to S. 762 because the enactment of this legislation would create burdensome administrative problems. The Department recommends that action be delayed on this proposal pending further study by various concerned Executive offices.

(SEC. 762, 89TH CONG., 1ST SESS.)

A bill to provide for compliance with constitutional requirements in the trials of persons who, while accompanying the armed forces outside the United States, commit certain offenses against the United States

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That title 10, United States Code, is amended by adding after chapter 47 a new chapter as follows:

"CHAPTER 48.—TRIAL OF CERTAIN PERSONS WHO ACCOMPANY THE ARMED FORCES OUTSIDE THE UNITED STATES

"Sec.

"951. Persons subject to trial; jurisdiction of United States district courts; offenses for which persons may be tried.

"952. Statute of limitations; maximum punishment; general provisions.

"§ 951. Persons subject to trial; jurisdiction of United States district courts; offenses for which persons may be tried.

"(a) Any citizen, national, or other person owing allegiance to the United States who commits any offense referred to in subsection (b) of this section while serving with, employed by, or accompanying the armed forces outside the United States shall be guilty of an offense against the United States and shall be tried for such offense in the United States district court for the judicial district in which such person is found or into which he is first brought.

"(b) The offenses for which any person described in subsection (a) of this section may be tried in a United States district court are those offenses specified in—

"(1) sections 877 through 881 of this title (articles 77–81) insofar as such sections relate to offenses referred to in clauses (2) through (5) of this subsection;

"(2) section 882 of this title (article 82);

"(3) sections 907 through 911 of this title (articles 107–111);

"(4) sections 913, 914, and 916 of this title (articles 113, 114, and 116); and

"(5) section 934 of this title (article 134) to the extent of crimes and offenses not capital.

"§ 952. Statute of limitations; maximum punishment; general provisions

"(a) An indictment may be found at any time without limitation with respect to any offense referred to in section 951(b) of this title for which the death penalty may be imposed. Except as provided in section 843(f) of this title (article 43(f)), no person shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished under this chapter for any offense, not capital, unless the indictment is found or the information is instituted within three years next after such offense shall have been committed. No person may be tried under this chapter for any offense if such person has been tried for substantially the same offense in a foreign country pursuant to a treaty or agreement to which the United States is a party.

"(b) The maximum punishment which may be imposed in the case of any person tried for an offense pursuant to this chapter shall be the same as that applicable to persons subject to trial by courts-martial for the same offense, but the provisions of chapter 47 of this title relating to the forfeiture of pay and allowances shall not be applicable in the case of any person tried under authority of this chapter.

"(c) Any offense for which a person is indicted and tried under authority of this chapter shall, for the purpose of all proceedings for or ancillary to the trial of such person, be considered to be an offense prohibited by and punishable under the provisions of title 18, United States Code.

"(d) Nothing in this chapter shall be construed as depriving court-martial, military commissions, provost courts, or other military tribunals of concurrent jurisdiction with respect to offenders or offenses that by statute or law of war may be tried by courts-martial, military commissions, provost courts, or military tribunals.

"(e) As used in this chapter, the term 'outside the United States' means outside the several States, Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Virgin Islands, Canal Zone, and the special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the United States."

SEC. 2. (a) The table of chapters at the beginning of title 10, United States Codes, is amended by inserting immediately below "47. Uniform Code of Military Justice-- 801" the following:

"48. Trial of Certain Persons Who Accompany the Armed Forces Outside the United States---------- 951"

(b) The table of chapters preceding chapter 31 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting immediately below. "47. Uniform Code of Military Justice-- 801" the following:

"48. Trial of Certain Persons Who Accompany the Armed Forces Outside the United States---------- 591"

The memorandum accompanying Senate Bill 762 is as follows:

Proposed bill to provide an American forum, with full constitutional safeguards, to try persons accompanying the Armed forces outside the United States.

Background memorandum: Until the present century, the United States had no large forces operating overseas, and so, with a few exceptions, American civil courts were available to try any crimes that might be committed by civilians who were employed by, serving with, or otherwise accompanying the Armed Forces. On the other hand, the United States now maintains large military contingents overseas, where no American civil courts are available to try American civilian dependents or employees who may commit serious crimes. In a few instances, provisions of the Federal Crimnial Code could be invoked as a basis for prosecuting the conduct of Americans outside the country; but, generally speaking, Federal criminal statutes were not intended to apply extraterritorially.

In order to provide an American forum for trial of civilian employees and dependents with our Armed Forces overseas, Congress enacted article 2(11) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice, which subjected to the code 'all persons serving with, employed by, or accompanying the Armed Forces without the continental limits of the United States and without certain territories.' Thus, civilian employees and dependents of the Armed Forces overseas were made subject to trial by court-martial. Ultimately, article 2 (11) was invalidated by the Supreme Court, with the result that, in most instances, there is now no American court, either military or civil, that has jurisdiction to try serious crimes committed by American civilian employees or dependents overseas. Therefore, the only courts which can prosecute those offenses are foreign courts, which are not subject to the U.S. Constitution and may not provide the safeguards available in American courts. There is no indication that the foreign courts are anxious in most instances to try crimes committed by American civilian employees or dependents overseas, but the only alternative is to let the crime go completely unpunished.

The relationship of the conduct of civilian employees and dependents to the maintenance of discipline and morale in the armed services is great enough to give considerable support to the argument made by several dissenters in the Supreme Court that article 2(11) was constitutional under Congress' power to 'make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces.' Because of this relationship it seems important to provide a forum for trial of crimes committed by civilian employees and dependents overseas. If this forum is a foreign court, the civilian accused loses the benefit of the safeguards provided by the U.S. Constitution. The Supreme Court has held that this forum cannot be a court-martial. Kinsella v. Singleton, 361 U.S. 234; Grisham v. Hogan, 361 U.S. 278; McElroy v. Guagliardo, 361 U.S. 281. Therefore, virtually by a process of elimination, the Federal district courts seem to be the proper forum for the trial of such misconduct.

Prior to its hearings in 1962, the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights was informed that the Department of Defense had prepared draft legislation to deal with this problem (hearings 848–51, 910, 946). However, this draft legislation has apparently bogged down somewhere between the Pentagon and the Department of Justice.

If jurisdiction is to be given the Federal district courts with respect to serious crimes committed overseas by civilian dependents and employees, it would seem desirable to apply the usual venue provisions governing Federal trials of offenses committed outside the United States or on the high seas. Also, since a serviceman cannot be prosecuted in a court-martial after trial by a foreign court in a country which is a party to the NATO Status of Forces Agreement, the civilian employee or dependent should receive the same protection and not be subject to trial in a Federal civil court after trial in a foreign court. Articles 107–132 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice prohibit certain acts which might be committed by a civilian employee or dependent and perhaps with disastrous consequences; in article 134 of the code there is a prohibition of 'crimes and offenses not capital' which serves to incorporate by reference the Federal Criminal Code. Accordingly, it would seem to suffice to make a civilian employee or dependent punishable in an American district court if he committed an act or is guilty of an omission for which a member of the Armed Forces, who did the same thing could be punished under articles 107–132 of the Uniform Code or under the 'crimes and offenses' provision of article 134.

To implement this proposal it seems necessary to:

(a) Amend article 2(11)—or enact a separate article—to provide that all persons serving with, employed by, or accompanying the Armed Forces without the United States, the Canal Zone, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands' shall be subject to trial by a Federal district court for all acts or omissions which, on the part of a member of the Armed Forces would constitute a violation of articles 107 through 132 or 'crimes and offences not capital' within the meaning of article 134.

(b) Provide that the statute of limitations which would apply to the prosecution of a member of the armed forces under article 43 shall apply to misconduct by a civilian prosecuted in a Federal district court under this article and the maximum punishment authorized shall be that which would be authorized for the same act or omission if committed at the same time by a member of the Armed Forces.

(c) Provide that venue shall be the same as for offenses committed outside the United States under the venue provisions of the Criminal Code (18 U.S.C. 8231–8243 and especially 18 U.S.C. 8238).

(d) Provide that it shall be a defense to prosecution if the defendant has been tried for the same act or omission by the courts of a foreign country and with respect to acts or omissions which allegedly took place within the boundaries of that foreign country.

S. 3190—INTRODUCTION OF MARIHUANA AND HEALTH REPORTING ACT

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. President, a total of $10.7 million in Federal money was marked primarily for marihuana research projects active during the 3 fiscal years 1968–70.

Nevertheless, whether we speak of it as pot, grass, weed, Mary Jane, hashish, Acapulco Gold, or by some other name, no drug is more at the focal point of controversy in the country—from a legal standpoint or from a health standpoint.

It is the latter issue—health effect—and related questions of rehabilitation and education which have been the subject of investigations by your Subcommittee on Alcoholism and Narcotics. The investigation is broad, covering alcoholism, narcotics, and all the dangerous drugs. It is not complete.

As regards marihuana, however, evidence to date resoundingly leads to one conclusion.

There is a great public need for an authoritative report on the health consequences of using marihuana. Substantial unknowns and potential health risks are evident, but depend on a number of variables.

Today, I am introducing the Marihuana and Health Reporting Act, legislation patterned after the law requiring annual reports on the health consequences of smoking cigarettes. My bill would require the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, after consultation with the Surgeon General, to report annually on recent research developments concerning the health consequences of using marihuana. Because I believe this is a matter of prime urgency, a preliminary report would be required by March 31, 1970.

My bill is limited to marihuana for two reasons: First, the phenomenal surge in usage as compared to other drugs, and second, unlike other drugs, marihuana has no known use in modern medicine.

Before turning to the results of our investigation thus far, I ask unanimous consent that the Marihuana and Health Reporting Act and a list of the 67 federally financed marihuana research projects be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and the list of projects will be printed in the RECORD.

EXTENT OF USE

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. President, estimates of the number of people in the United States who have used marihuana at least once range from a "conservative" figure of 5 million to as high as 20 million. Current information received from the Nixon administration is that 8 to 10 million have at least experimented with the drug.

The sheer numbers are surprising, but so is the age and social background of the users.

High school and college use was discussed by the Director of the National Institute of Mental Health as follows:

In recent years there is clear evidence that there has been a dramatic and continuing increase in the use of marihuana, particularly among urban and suburban middle-class youth. It is estimated that nationwide, 20 to 40 percent of high-school and college students have tried marihuana at least once. In the past year or two, use has begun to spread to junior high school and grade school students. It is believed that large numbers of middle-class adults are also involved in marihuana smoking.

Of all those who have tried marihuana, about 65 percent are experimenting, trying the drug from one to ten times, and then discontinuing its use. Some 25 percent are social users, smoking marihuana on occasion when it is available, usually in a group context. Ten percent can be considered chronic users who devote significant portions of their time to obtaining and using the drug.

One of the field hearings of our subcommittee this fall was in Colorado. The subcommittee was told by Stanley Johnson, district attorney for Boulder, home of the University of Colorado:

Narcotics traffic, particularly involving marihuana and hashish, is the single greatest criminal activity in the Boulder area. . . . It is believed that approximately 50% of the high school students in the County of Boulder have either used or experimented with marihuana, while approximately 60% of university students have done so.

Many have assumed marihuana is solely a problem with "those students" in high schools and colleges. Actually, it extends into the age spectrum in both directions.

A teacher at Gove Junior High School in Denver, Mrs. Nancy Raddatz, testified:

We found that our kids had a great deal of knowledge, much more than what the teacher and I had concerning this. Lots of the kids knew people who had taken LSD. Some of the kids themselves experimented with it. They certainly experimented with marihuana. This is junior high level.

Lt. Jerry Kennedy, director of the Prevention Bureau of the Delinquency Control Division at the Denver Police Department, reported:

Twelve and thirteen-year old boys and girls are reported to my Bureau every week as drug users. Sometimes their parents bring them in to us, along with the kid's hashish pipe or the pot he got in the mail.

Just days ago, Life magazine carried pictures of a group of middle-aged business and professional people in Boston "lighting up" after dinner, and a "garden pot party" at a fashionable location in New Orleans. A newspaper series this year by Cal Queal, of the Denver Post, contained comments from several people who had tried marihuana—among them, a lawyer, a clergyman, a housewife, a newspaperman.

Uninformed use or experimentation is, most unfortunately, permeating through our society.

MARIHUANA—PILLAR OF UNCERTAINTY

For a drug that has been with man for thousands of years, surprisingly little is known about its nature and effect.

The principal active ingredient consists of a number of compounds called tetrahydrocannabinols—THC. The pharmacologic potency of any mixture of marihuana—from mild forms to the purest and most concentrated extract called hashish—depends upon the amount of THC which it contains.

To listen to some of the public debate today, one would be inclined to believe there is just one form of marihuana passing from hand to hand in all its purity and simplicity.

View it as good fortune or ill, marihuana does not come labeled "Made in United States of America" with the THC content carefully marked across the bottom.

Look at some of the variables which affect potency:

Location where grown.

Growing conditions such as temperature, humidity, and soil composition.

Methods of cultivation.

Methods of preparation for use.

Methods of storage.

But there are also variables in reaction, dependent on the user. The Director of the National Institute of Mental Health reported after a survey of high school and college use that 50 percent of those who tried marihuana experienced no effects. His explanation:

This finding may be a function of at least four factors: (1) the agent may not have been potent, (2) frequently effects are seen only after repeated use, (3) the expectation of the user has a significant effect on what he experiences, (4) the social setting in which use takes place has an effect on the response.

The information submitted to our subcommittee by NIMH lists the following as one of the few proven facts about marihuana:

Individuals react very differently to this drug, which is why you hear stories of extreme reactions, and stories of no reactions.

Let me dwell for a moment on one particular factor, the location where marihuana is grown. Evidence before the subcommittee indicates marihuana grown within the United States is generally of the relatively mild type. But this homegrown pot is not the stuff being circulated for use.

President Nixon's Task Force on Narcotics, Marihuana, and Dangerous Drugs concluded in June 1969, that most of the marihuana sold and consumed in the United States is grown in Mexico. How much THC did it contain? We do not know, but we do know it is characterized as high potency.

This was amplified in our subcommittee hearings this fall when Wayland Speer, the regional director of the Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs for a 5-State area—Arizona, Colorado, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming—testified:

We have had a few large seizures from the Midwest, uncultivated marihuana harvested in Iowa and Nebraska. That is a small part of it. The main traffic, is 99% of the marihuana in this country, comes from Mexico.

A medical doctor, Gerald Starkey, Jr., medical coordinator, Denver Department of Health and Hospitals, put it this way:

Where the confusion lies is in the testing of different plants grown in different endemic areas with different soil and climate conditions . . .

Today, hashish, is plentiful in our metropolitan city and in potency ranges up to 40 times as potent as our locally grown marihuana. . . . Comparing a drug like hashish to locally grown marihuana is like comparing a firecracker to a stick of dynamite! Intoxicants as strong as hashish can and do cause panic reactions, acute anxiety states, and in those who have a borderline mental problem it can cause a frank psychosis. There are many questions unanswered about the drug we call marihuana.

Mr. President, as if there were not already enough variables facing the user, I must report there is another. Marihuana not only will vary in its own potency, it may be fixed in an unrecognizable fashion with even more dangerous drugs, as shown by this exchange:

Senator DOMINICK. Dr. Starkey, how does a young person who is being asked to experiment with drugs know what kind of marihuana is going to be given to him?

Dr. STARKEY. The young person doesn't know whether he is getting DMT (a dangerous hallucinogen) mixed with marihuana or is getting hashish or a local grass.

According to the American Medical Association:

The strength of marihuana sold in this country varies widely. It is almost always "cut" with tobacco or some other substance. Sometimes other more potent drugs are added. It is impossible to know exactly what is being sold under the name of marihuana; there is no quality control in the illegal drug business. This, plus uncertainty about one's own psychological reaction to it, makes marihuana experimentation risky.

In fact, there are so many variables affecting potency and reaction that marihuana research was severely hampered until synthetic THC was discovered in 1966. In other words, a consistent and precise quality of the natural drug was unavailable even to scientists.

I want to emphasize we have been listening in our hearings to people who have approached the drug problem from all sides, including users. We have visited Synanon in California, and listened to former users now in Cenikor, a nonprofit organization for rehabilitation of drugs abusers. The following exchange of Senator HUGHES with one user is representative of the responses we have had:

Senator HUGHES. What would you say to any young adult or young person who is tempted at this point to smoke their first marihuana cigarette?

Mr. LEVY. I would say, "Don't do it."

Personal experiences vary, but with odds like those noted above, one must ask whether the casual experimenter as well as the regular user, is taking an unnecessary and substantial health risk.

CONTRADICTIONS—OR ARE THEY?

Later in this statement, I will comment on what I call "the health unknowns" about marihuana. First, it is appropriate to review what we know about marihuana and health, and some of the conflicting statements that have been made.

What we know would not take long, for it is my considered judgment the "unknowns" far exceed the "knows."

As mentioned before, we know potency varies with THC content, and reaction varies with the user.

We know a small, low potency dose may produce a mild euphoria.

We know a relatively high potency dose may produce severe reactions, sometimes a psychotic-like one similar to those associated with LSD use.

Between these two extremes, there is a vast range of unknowns.

We know marihuana does not cause physical—as distinguished from psychological—dependence, nor does withdrawal cause physical sickness.

More information about known physical effects is set out in four excellent items produced by the National Institute of Mental Health, and I ask unanimous consent they be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks. They are as follows: First, a March 1969 pamphlet entitled "Marihuana—Some Questions and Answers"; second, a poster entitled "A Pot Primer for Parents"; third, a poster entitled "When Are They Going to Legalize Pot"; and fourth, a 60-second TV spot entitled "The Truth About Marihuana."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. President, marihuana is designated in medicine, but not in law, as a hallucinogen. Whether it is "mild" depends on the mix of all the factors I have described, and perhaps more.

When one is aware of these variables, but only then, is it more readily understood how seemingly contradictory "findings" are announced here and there around the country on the impact of marihuana use on health.

Unless the research took place since 1966 with synthetic THC, the researchers may well have been working on differing samples. On the other hand, their conclusions may be the result of an honest difference of opinion as to interpretation.

Three brief examples illustrate what I mean.

First, an Associated Press story carried in a Fort Collins, Colo., newspaper, June 6, 1969, was emblazoned with the headline "Science Foundation Reports Marihuana Not Harmful." The article then describes testimony of Dr. Phillip Handler, board chairman of the National Science Foundation, before a House appropriations subcommittee.

Contrast this to testimony we received in Los Angeles from Dr. Joel Fort, author of the widely distributed article "Pot—A Rational Approach." Dr. Fort is an effective advocate for a considerably different approach to marihuana than we have in present law, and he has been doing research on this drug for 13 years. Yet, even he stated:

> Now I would add that marihuana can sometimes produce an acute psychotic reaction. I have seen that myself. It is one of the reasons why I stress that no drug, including marihuana, is totally harmless.

Our subcommittee also received testimony from Dr. Henry Brill, chairman of the American Medical Association Committee on Alcoholism and Drug Dependence. That committee, along with AMA's Council on Mental Health and the Committee on Problems of Drug Dependence of the National Research Council, National Academy of Sciencies, reviewed available information and in 1968 concluded in a joint statement:

> Cannabis (marihuana) is a dangerous drug and as such, is a public health concern.

Second, the subcommittee received conflicting evidence as to other effects of marihuana—for example, any change in ability to drive an automobile or impairment of reflexes.

Research material from the Director of NIMH reads:

> The muscular incoordination and the distortion of space and time preception commonly associated with marihuana use are potentially hazardous since the drug adversely affects one's ability to drive an automobile or perform other skilled tasks.

While he testified he personally would recommend against driving an automobile, Dr. Fort informed our subcommittee of a University of Washington Medical School study which concluded that even "the sophisticated marihuana user, the person who had used it at least occasionally over a period of time, had no impairment whatsoever with the driving ability." In his own right, Dr. Fort testified, "The occasional use of marihuana—does not produce any measurable impairment of the individual functioning."

Third, a definite interpretation problem arose in a case cited by the President's Task Force:

> Recently a group of some 1500 psychiatrists, psychiatric residents, internists, general practitioners and psychologists in the Los Angeles area reported that they had seen almost 1900 "adverse reactions" to marihuana. It is difficult to interpret this finding since "adverse reaction" was poorly defined, and there has been no follow-up to define just what the reactions to the drug were. However, there have been reports of increased numbers of hospitalizations following the use of marihuana.

With the present situation, is it any wonder Americans are confused about marihuana?

THE HEALTH UNKNOWNS

Frankly, I believe our position today is wrapped up in a capsule by the testimony of Dr. Robert Weiland, special education department, of Colorado's Jefferson County school system. After describing a drug information program conducted in a school, he stated:

> One of the parents came to me after this had started and said, "I had a beautiful relationship with my daughter until you people put on that seminar. Now she is questioning me and my attitudes toward marihuana."
> Now parents feel very uncomfortable when kids challenge, and they challenge in an area where parents really aren't sure of themselves.

The fact of the matter is while there are some things we know about marihuana—and this information is available to parents—there is a great deal of uncertainty, a myriad of "unknowns."

If I may be allowed a pun on a pun: To put it mildly, the health consequences of using marihuana are not cut and dried by a long shot.

I want to emphasize in the strongest sense the following caution issued by the National Institute of Mental Health this year:

> Statements being reported by students that the use of marihuana is "medically safe" are not supported by scientific evidence. It is hoped that research now underway may add to the little currently known about the effects of the use of marihuana.

To that, add these statements from the same source:

> To be honest, scientists still don't know everything about the specific effects of marihuana . . .
> Today, research scientists are studying marihuana's effects on the brain, the nervous system, on chromosomes, and on various organs of the body. They're trying to find out why different people have different reactions to it. . . . Maybe it will turn out that there's no reason for it to be illegal. But nobody can be sure until all the facts are in. And until they are, it's a pretty bum risk.

Dr. James Goddard, former Commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration, appeared before the subcommittee. He lists the following health unknowns of marihuana:

> Does it affect the reproductive processes?
> Does it affect human chromosomes?
> Does long-term usage have harmful effects?
> What type of treatment will be most effective in rehabilitating chronic users?
> What conditions favor continuation of marihuana use as opposed to moving to hard drugs?

I have already placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the summary provided to me by the Library of Congress of federally financed research projects concerning marihuana. Some of those projects included marihuana only as a part of a larger study.

It is interesting to note, however, the testimony last month before a House Committee of the Surgeon General-designate, Dr. Jesse Steinfeld, on behalf of Dr. Egeberg, Assistant Secretary of HEW for Health and Scientific Affairs.

> With respect specifically to marihuana, NIMH activities have been substantially expanded with the past few years in recognition of the rapidly increasing seriousness of the marihuana problem. This increase is reflected in the amount of funds obligated by NIMH for research grants and contracts in this field. In FY 1967, NIMH obligated $786,000 for marihuana research grants and contracts. Comparable figures for 1968 and 1969 respectively were $1,239,000 and $1,330,000.
> In FY 1970, if funds are available, the Institute proposes to obligate $2,550,000 to support grant and contract studies of marihuana, which means that there will have been a more than three-fold increase for support of these studies in the last four years. In addition, of course, the Institute conducts its own intramural research programs on marihuana.

Mr. President, there is no question but that more research—extensive and intensive—is imperative.

Witness these comments from citizens seeking definitive answers about the drug.

From Dr. Walter Armistead, a high school principal:

> Medical research has been challenged and found wanting, in the area of definitive findings concerning marihuana.

From Dr. E. P. Sylvester, a botanist at Iowa State University:

> We've got to have some good, scientific information on marihuana.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, there is a desperate need to bring a sense of order to the marihuana debate.

As one of our witnesses so aptly noted regarding the many studies underway about marihuana:

> Most of us know only that they exist, but don't know which one is in favor and which one is against this, that or the other thing.

He is not alone, members of our subcommittee probably share the same feeling. I do.

There is a compelling need for factual, scientific information.

A regular compilation and judgment on the state of health knowledge from private and publicly financed research is an absolute necessity.

Proposals have been made in the Congress for a Presidential Commission on Marihuana or some form of committee to study the problems for 1 or 2 years and make recommendations. How do you convince 8 to 12 million people to stop using marihuana and wait for 2 years for a decision? The one-shot approach is not adequate.

I keep remembering this statement before a House committee by Dr. Yolles, Director of NIMH:

There are few fields in which there have been so many competent and thorough investigations by committees and commissions over the years as there have been in the area of narcotics and dangerous drugs.

I see no need to establish another committee or commission to study marihuana.

In contrast to establishment of another commission, I would favor provisions to direct NIMH to conduct research and make a basic determination on marihuana.

Medicine, as lawyers are fond of noting, is not an exact science. Opinions differ and research moves forward.

What I am asking for is an authoritative decision—regularly updated—or whether marihuana can be given a clean bill of health.

The Secretary of HEW and Surgeon General would be required to give us a report on the current state of knowledge in 4 months—March 31, 1970.

Each of us must feel a deep sense of responsibility when we read about:

First. A Virginia youth now serving a 20-year sentence for marihuana violations. It was reported he went to a medical school library to read about the drug, and "finally convinced it wouldn't harm his body or his head, Frank tried marihuana and liked it."

Second. A 19-year-old Colorado youth now serving an indeterminate sentence for marihuana possession who concluded, "I know—the kids know—that marihuana's OK."

In my judgment, the evidence before our subcommittee points up too many variables, too many unknowns, too many risks.

We do not need a "scare the bejeebers out of them" approach. We need cold, hard scientific facts.

Until we get more facts, do not play Russian roulette with your health.

A word to the citizen about to try marihuana—whether he or she contemplates a once-only experiment or regular use—I am reminded of a current vogue expression: "Think About It."

The bill (S. 3190) providing for the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, after consultation with the Surgeon General, to report annually to Congress concerning the health consequences of using marihuana, introduced by Mr. DOMINICK, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress finds that the use of marihuana is increasing in the United States, especially among the young people thereof, and that there is need for a better understanding of the health consequences of using marihuana. The Congress further finds that, notwithstanding the various studies carried out, and research engaged in, with respect to the use of marihuana, there is a lack of an authoritative source for obtaining information involving the health consequences of using marihuana.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, after consultation with the Surgeon General and other appropriate individuals, shall transmit a report to the Congress on or before January 31, 1971, and annually thereafter, concerning (1) current information on the health consequences of using marihuana, and (2) such recommendations for legislative and administrative action as he may deem appropriate. A preliminary report shall be transmitted to the Congress by the Secretary concerning such information and recommendations on or before March 31, 1970.

SEC. 3. This Act may be cited as the "Marihuana and Health Reporting Act".

SECTION I. CENTER FOR STUDIES OF NARCOTIC & DRUG ABUSE

A. Surveys; psycho-sociological studies

RO1–MH–12286 (3/66–2/68); Blum, Richard H., Stanford Univ., Stanford, Calif., Drug Use Among College Students, Total Pd, $98,000.

Completed research. See 2-volume book for research results: Blum, Richard H., & Associates. Society and drugs. Social & cultural observations. (Drugs I) 400 p. Students and drugs, College and high school observations. (Drugs II) 399p. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass, 1969.

Determined by survey methods, the patterns of drug use & abuse among West Coast college and high school students. Info on their socioeconomic background, religious & political participation, etc.

RO1–MH–13484 (2/67–7/69); Cohen, Nathan E., USLA, Inst of Govt & Pub Affairs, Los Angeles, Calif., Survey of Hallucinogenic Drug Abuse, Total Pd, $142,000, FY 69, $3,000.

To determine the prevalence of continuing LSD use in a sample of 300 persons out of a known population of 1400 persons in Los Angeles area who were given LSD by several physicians prior to 1962 for either research or therapeutic purposes. To distinguish continuers (of LSD use) from non-continuers. For continuers, patterns of use, motivations, & effects to be explored in detail. Detailed info on LSD & marihuana use; some info on other drugs of abuse including tobacco and alcohol.

RO3–MH–14130 (5/67–7/68); Pearlman, Samuel, Brooklyn Coll of the City of N.Y., Brooklyn, N.Y., Patterns of Student Drug Use and Abuse in Urban Universities, Total Pd, $4,000.

Students of 5 NYC universities will be given a questionnaire to study current patterns of student drug use, prevalence of drug abuse, and attitudes about drug use.

RO3–MH–14157 (1/68–12/68) (Continued as MH–17196); Grupp, Stanley E., Ill. State Univ., Normal, Ill., Marihuana Use and Emergent Drug Use Patterns, Total Pd, $4,000.

To study conditions necessary for sustaining a marihuana-use pattern as opposed to those necessary for the movement from marihuana use to hard drug use.

RO1–MH–14464 (5/68–4/71); Cohen, Melvin, Hillside, Hosp., Glen Oaks, N.Y., Drug Use in Psychiatric Patients, Pd Thru FY 69, $173, FY 69, $99,000, FY 70, $56,000.

Longitudinal study to determine the relationship of social, psychological, and psychiatric factors to the frequent use of potentially habituating drugs among a middle class psychiatric population (under age 26) and their siblings.

RO1–MH–14943 (6/66–8/69); Speck, Ross V., Hahnemann Med Coll., Philadelphia, Pa., Psychosocial Networks of Young Drug Users, Pd Thru FY 69, $163,000, FY 69, $57,000.

To study the social network of the adolescent "dangerous drug" user, including the pattern of contagion to their peers.

RO1–MH–15080 (6/67–8/68); Hollander, Charles, US Natl Student Assn., Washington, D.C., Regional College Studies of Student Drug Use, Total Pd, $61,000.

NSA to hold 3 regional conferences to study campus drug abuse and evaluate ways in which the university might respond to the rising incidence of campus drug abuse.

RO1–MH–15436 (5/68–9/69); Meyers, Frederick H., Univ of Calif Med Ctr., San Francisco, Calif., Drug Practices in the Haight-Ashbury Sub-Culture, Total Pd, $37,000.

To define patterns of drug use in Haight-Ashbury subculture and relate these to social, demographic, etc. variables; evaluate techniques of treatment.

RO3-MH-15659 (1/68-9/69); Goode, Erich B., Res Fdn of State Univ of N.Y., Albany, N.Y., A Sociological Study of Marihuana Users, Total Pd, $4,000.

Sociological study of 200 US urban resident marihuana users, studying initiation to use, motivation, communication, possible community, and use of other drugs.

RO1-MH-15737 (6/68-5/70); Wallerstein, Robert S., Pittel, Stephen M., Mt Zion Hosp & Med Ctr., San Francisco, Calif., Psychosocial Factors in Drug Abuse, Total Pd, $251,000, FY 69, $124,000.

To study and describe the social and psychological characteristics of the drug-based "hippie" community of San Francisco's Haight-Ashbury area.

RO3-MH-15805 (5/68-4/69); Goldstein, Joel W., Carnegie-Mellon Univ., Pittsburgh, Pa., Extent and Patterns of College Student Drug Use, Total Pd, $5,000.

A campus survey of drug usage, using a mailed questionnaire. Focus on what types of students use which drugs, under what conditions & with what perceived effects. Will measure students' drug information & misinformation. Pilot study for future research into personality differences between users & non-users and the conditions of beginning use and terminating use among students.

R01-MH-16054 (6/68-8/70); Kirk, Jerome R., Univ. of Calif., Irvine, Calif., Adolescent Users of Psychedelic Drugs, Pd Thru FY 69, $70,000, FY 70, $14,000.

To study the careers and role changes of a group of adolescent users of psychedelic drugs.

R01-MH-16161 (6/68-5/70); Holmes, Douglas, Assoc YM-YWHAs of Greater N.Y., New York, N.Y., Drug Use in Matched Groups of Hippies and Non-Hippies, Total Pd, $150,000, FY 69, $72,000.

To study the nature of drug use and of drug users among members of community centers and among a matched group of hippies in the metropolitan NYC area.

R01-MH-16224 (6/68-8/69); Steffenhagen, Ronald A., Univ. of Vt., Burlington, Vt., Group Therapy and Student Use, Total Pd, $74,000.

To study the personality and social characteristics of college student drug users as compared to non-users. University sponsored group therapy for student drug users at their request will provide good climate for data collection.

1 R01-MH-16536-01 (6/69-5/70); Rossi, Peter H., Johns Hopkins Univ., Baltimore, Md., National Survey of Drug Use on College Campuses, Total Pd, $113,000, FY 69, $113,000.

Nation-wide survey to make estimates of the prevalence of usage of psychoactive drugs and alcohol in the college and university population of the US; to investigate the personal and social concomitants of such use; to investigate the role of institutional factors (e.g. type of school, law enforcement policies, etc.).

1 R01-MH-16755-01 (6/69-5/70); McGlothlin, Wm. H., Univ. of Calif.—Dept. of Psychol., Los Angeles, Calif., Drug Use and Social Policy: Especially re Cannabis, Total Pd, $62,000, FY 69, $62,000.

A systematic and critical evaluation of the worldwide literature on cannabis, with special emphasis on the effects of use on the individual and society. Foreign language material to be translated or abstracted, depending on quality. Material to be rated on adequacy of scientific methodology and objectivity, as well as having content coded by topic.

R03-MH-17196 (5/69-4/70); Grupp, Stanley E., Ill. State Univ., Normal, Ill., Marihuana Use and Emergent Drug-Use Patterns, Total Pd, $6,000, FY 69, $6,000.

A continuation of MH-14157. A study of the conditions necessary and sufficient for movement from a marihuana use pattern to a hard drug use pattern. Subjects will now include bohemnians as well as college students, prison inmates, and persons from lower socio-economic strata.

PH-43-67-660 (8/67-2/69); Am Inst for Scientific Communications, Albertson, N.Y., Investigate Psychoactive Drug Use Among High School Students, Total, $63,000.

To develop a survey instrument & methodology for gathering data on drug use among the high school student population; to explore preventive education approaches; to gather data based on a probability sample of all high school students in a given community using methodology developed.

PH-43-68-664 (6/66-7/68); Friends of Psychiatric Res Inc., Baltimore, Md., Pilot Study on Illegal Drug Abuse in Maryland, Total Pd, $119,000.

To assess the feasibility of collecting data on drug abuse from various community agencies, other than police, and once collected, to interpret these data and evaluate their potential usefulness in helping community agencies (training schools, correctional, social, health, & educational agencies) to understand the various dimensions of the drug abuse problem.

PH-43-68-754 (FY68); Brotman, Richard, New York Med Coll., New York, N.Y., To Prepare a Position Paper on Marihuana, Total Pd, $18,000.

To produce a manuscript on marihuana. Includes cannabis and its history; the American experience with marihuana; and research strategies (public health, law, macrosociology, deviance, personality, economics).

B. Legal aspects

RO3-MH-14274 (6/67-8/68); Stone, Christopher D., Law Center, Univ of Southern Calif., Los Angeles, Calif., Legal Significance of Hallucinogenic Drug Research, Total Pd, $4,000.

To review existing knowledge about the hallucinogens and to survey the legal controls now in effect; explore alternative types of legal control systems.

RO3-MH-15714 (1/68-6/68); Maxwell, Richard, Univ of Calif., Los Angeles, Calif., Review of Marihuana Law Enforcement, Total Pd, $4,000.

Completed. See following publication: Kaplan, John. Project. Marihuana laws: An empirical study of enforcement and administration in Los Angeles County. UCLA Law Review, 15(5): 1499-1586, Sept. 1968.

C. Drug effects: Human studies

RO1-MH-15842 (6/68-8/70); Jones, Reese T. Langley Porter Neuropsychiatric Inst., San Francisco, Calif., Effects of Marihuana on Perception aid Cognition, Pd Thru FY 69, $17,000, FY 70, $21,000.

To study the effects of cannabis sativa on perceptual and cognitive functioning in human subjects.

RO3-MH-16810 (6/69-5/70); Tart, Chas. T., Univ. of Calif., Davis, Calif., Reported Quantities of Marihuana Intoxication, Total Pd, $4,000, FY 69, $4,000.

Using a 220 item questionnaire (already mailed out), investigator to study subjective effects of marihuana intoxication; to relate the patterns of effects reported to respondents various background factors such as use of other psychedelic drugs, length of marihuana use, educational level, etc.

D. Experimental animal studies; chemical and biochemical research

RO1-MH-4230 (9/60-8/71); Boyd, Eugene S., Univ. of Rochester—Sch. of Med., Rochester, N.Y., Neuropharmacological Effects of a Tetrahydrocannabinol, Pd. Thru FY 69, $253,000. Fy 69, $56,000, FY 70, $38,000.

Effects of 3 tetrahydrocannabinols to be compared with the effects of other psychotropic agents on 4 learned patterns of behavior in the white rat; elucidating mechanisms whereby THC derivatives produce their effects in the central nervous system.

RO1-MH-12608 (3/67-2/69); Miras, Constandings J., Univ. of Athens, Athens, Greece, Marihuana C14 Metbolism in Animals. Total Pd., $27,000.

To analyze existing supply of marihuana C14 by THC to separate and isolate working quantities of THC-C14; attempt to improve the specific activtiy of this material by improvement in growing methods; to investigate uniformity of the radioactive tag in the THC molecule.

RO1-MH-13180 (3/67-4/72); Mechoulam, Raphael, Hebrew Univ., Jerusalem, Israel, Marihuana Constituents. Pd. Thru FY 69, $73,000, FY 69, $23,000, FY 70, $33,000.

To study the chemical constituents of marihuana, to synthesize them, and to study their psychopharmacological activity. Essentially chemical research.

RO1-MH-14112 (6/67-8/70); Pickens, Roy W., Univ of Minn., Minneapolis, Minn., Behavioral Dependence on Non-narcotic Drugs, Thru FY 69, $87,000, FY 69, $41,000, FY 70, $41,000.

To develop procedures for evaluating behavioral dependence liability of non-narcotic drugs, and to explore environmental factors controlling the probability of such behavioral dependence in infrahuman subjects. Ss: male albino rats; monkeys. Drugs: LSD, THC, chlordiazepoxide, amphetamines, barbiturates, chlorpromazine.

RO1-MH-16051 (6/68-8/70); Burstein, Sumner H., Worcester Fdn for Exp Bio Inc., Shrewsbury, Mass., Metabolism of Marihuana-I H^{3}THC, Pd Thru FY 69, $22,000, FY 70, $25,000.

To study the metabolic transformations THC undergoes in vivo.

RO3-MH-16488 (3/69-2/70); Schlant, Robert C., Emory Univ., Atlanta, Ga., Effects of Marihuana and LSD Upon the Heart, Total Pd, $4,000, FY 69, $4,000.

To determine the effects of marihuana upon the heart & circulatory system of anesthetized dogs by studying the effects of inhaled crude marihuana smoke of known THC content; the effects of the IV injection of TCH will also be examined. To examine the effects of LSD upon the contractility and myocardial function in anesthetized dogs.

RO3-MH-16655 (3/69-2/70); Geber, William F., Med Coll of Ga., Augusta, Ga., Teratogenic Potential of Marihuana, Total Pd, $5,000, FY 69, $5,000.

To inject pregnant rats, hamsters, mice & rabbits with marihuana resin. After 5 days the animals will be sacrificed & their fetuses will be examined for possible malformations. It is also proposed to examine the fetuses of animals that have received marihuana extract over a period of 3 successive days.

RO1-MH-16663 (6/69-5/70); Best, Jay Boyd, Colorado State Univ., Fort Collins, Colo., Mechanism Action of Marihuana, Total Pd, $41,000. FY 69, $41,000.

A study of 1) the kinetics of absorption, transport, distribution & final disposition of THC following its inhalation as a vapor—to include ultracentrifugation of natural particles & the effects of THC on binding, & 2) the effect of THC upon experimentally induced aggressive behavior in animals. (Developing techniques for measuring the rate of THC absorption & distribution & some of the behavioral effects of marihuana administered by inhalation.)

RO1-MH-16990 (6/69-5/72); Pace, Henry B., Univ of Miss, University, Miss., Reproductive-Developmental Toxiocology of Marihuana, Pd. Thru FY 69, $52,000, FY 69, $52,000. FY 70, $67,000.

To examine the effects of marihuana preparations & synthetic cannabinols, administered repeatedly prior to or during the gestation period, on the mammalian reproductive processes. Possible effects of interest: altered fertility of either sex, failure of normal prenatal & postnatal development or reduced viability of the offspring, altered neurological or behavioral characteristics of the offspring. Effect on various aspects of reproduction through as many as 4 successive generations.

RO1–MH–17001 (6/69–5/74); Harris, Louis S., Univ of N Car., Chapel Hill, N.C. PHARMACOLOGY of (—)–Δ8 & 9–TRANS–THC, Pd Thru FY 69, $48,000, FY 69, $48,000, FY 70, $51,000.

To study the effects on 2 of the active marihuana principles on the CNS, the cardiovascular system & on the biochemical interactions with various enzyme systems & biogenic amines. Effects on spontaneous motor activity, interaction with reserpine & barbiturates, tests for amphetamine-like properies & a battery of behavioral procedures, etc.

PH–43–68–1307 (6/68–6/69); Univ. of Miss., Sch of Pharm., University, Miss., Cultivation and Extraction of Cannabis Sativa L., Pd Thru FY 69, $115,000.

To grow and harvest marihuana; extract "red oil"; study effects of environment, age of plants and harvesting procedures upon quantity of resins and quality of active components in resin; develop suitable analytic procedures for components of resin.

PH–43–68–1338 (6/68–5/69); Battelle Memorial Inst., Columbus, Ohio, Bioanalytical Studies of Cannabis Smoking (using smoking machine), Pd Thru FY 69, $107,000.

Using a smoking machine, determine what compounds of the cannabinoid class gets into the system of the marihuana user; metabolic study of cannabinoid compounds in marihuana and marihuana smoke; bioassay procedure.

PH–43–68–1339 (6/68–11/68); A D Little, Cambridge, Mass., Synthesis of THC (To produce Δ^8 & Δ^9 THC). Pd Thru FY 69, $65,-000.

To produce between 2.5 and 3 kilograms each of Δ^8 and Δ^9 THC.

PH–43–68–1340 (6/68–9/68); A D Little, Cambridge, Mass., Synthesis Methods of (To examine method), Pd Thru FY 69, $10,000.

To examine the method of synthesis of Δ^8 and Δ^9 trans-tetrahydrocannabinols as published by Petrzilka and compare it with approach for preparation of large quantities of THC compounds.

PH–43–68–1451 (6/68–6/69); Research Triangle Inst., Research Triangle, N.C., Preparation of a Representative "Red Oil" Fraction From Marihuana, Pd Thru FY 69, $19,000.

Extraction of "red oil" from plant material available from FBN; "red oil" to be freed from as much non-cannabinol types of materials as possible without destroying the THC content. Experience to be used as guide for extracting freshly grown material.

PH–43–68–1452 (6/68–6/69); Research Triangle Inst., Research Triangle Park, N.C., Synthesis of Radiolabelled Compounds (—)-Δ8 & (—)-Δ9 trans-THC, Pd Thru FY 69, $85,000.

To conduct the exploratory examination of the Petrzailka method of synthesizing THC; prepare radiolabeled compounds: carbon-14 labeled Δ8 THC and Δ9 THC; Titium labeled Δ8 THC and Δ9 THC; anticipated yield: 1 to 5 grams; components purified.

PH–43–68–1454 (6/68–6/69); Research Triangle Inst., Research Triangle Park, N.C., Isolation of Cannabinol Diacetate From Stored Marihuana, Pd Thru FY 69, $22,000.

To extract cannabinol and purify it as its crystalline acetate.

E. Determination of drugs in body fluids

RO1–MH–12959 (6/67–5/70); McIssac, William M. Tex Res Inst of Ment Sci., Houston, Texas, Drug Abuse, Total Pd, $143,000, FY 69, $48,000.

To develop methods for rapid detection of narcotics, barbiturates, amphetamines, phenothiazines, marihuana and hallcucinogens in biologic fluids using TLC and gas chromatography.

RO1–MH–13748 (1/67–12/70); Jaffe, Jerome H., Univ. of Chi., Chicago, Ill., Mechanisms of Tolerance and Physical Dependence, Total Pd, $44,000.

Studies on development of tolerance to and physical dependence on chronically administered drugs. Drugs: Opiates, barbiturates, scopolamine, cannabis, BOL, methsergide, nitrous oxide, etc. Ss: cats, rabbits, mice, rats, monkeys.

RO1–MH–14321 (6/67–11/71); Craig, John C., Sch. of Pharmacy, Univ. of Calif., San Francisco, Calif., Microgram Identification of Psychotropic Drugs (Particularly hallucinogens), Pd Thru FY 69, $112,000, FY 70, $39,000.

To develop methods for the identification of microgram quantities of psychotropic drugs (in particular, hallucinogenic drugs of abuse) by a combination of techniques using TLC, gas-liquid chromatography, infrared spectroscopy, and mass spectometry.

PH–43–64–931 (3/67–2/68); Hine Laboratories, San Francisco, Calif., Provide for Continuation of Study of Methods for Determining Narcotic Usage (marihuana, heroin, codein, etc.), Pd Thru FY 69, $71,000.

Compare existing methods for determining narcotic and drug abuse; pilot study on marihuana to identify in urine; evaluate length of time during which the urine and pupil tests remain positive (heroin & codein).

F. Prevention & education

PH–43–68–1322 (5/68–5/69); Grey Advertising Inc., New York, N.Y., Public Education Campaign on Drug Abuse, Pd Thru FY 69, $287,000.

To plan & develop a nat'l advertising campaign on drug abuse. To develop TV & radio commercials, newspaper & posted ads, brochures, etc. To provide consultation to NIMH in use of mass media for public educ in narcotics & drug abuse.

PH–43–68–1376 (6/68–11/68); National Education Assn., Washington, D.C., Insert for Inclusion in NEA Journal, Pd Thru FY 69, $23,000.

Completed. See the following publication: Students and drug abuse. Today's Education (NEA Journal), 58(3):35–50, March 1969. Circulation approx 1,400,000—teachers, principals, counselors, etc.

PH–43–68–1471 (6/68–6/69); American Assn for Hlth., Phy Ed & Recreation, Washington, D.C., Drug Abuse Education Development Program, Pd Thru FY 69, $200,000.

To develop guidelines for teacher education workshops on drug abuse & to develop "insturctional units"—materials to be used in Jr & Sr High school classrooms. Materials to be ready by Fall 1969.

G. Grants approved June '69 council to be funded in FY 1970

1. Surveys and Psycho-Sociological Research

RO1–MH–17383 (7/69–6/70); Myers, Peter L., Encounter, Inc., New York, N.Y., A Study of the Pre-Addict Personality, FY 70, $47,000.

To evaluate the efficacy of the Encounter program (similar to Daytop & Synanon) in dealing with the young middle class drug abuser. To investigate (1) the difference in social & personality characteristics between the pre-addict and the young non-drug user; (2) to discover the background & personality characteristics which predict whether a non-heroin user will succeed in this type program; (3) to determine what happens to people who leave the program. Detailed interviews with young drug and non-drug users; MMPI, etc; follow-up to determine long-term efficacy of treatment methods employed.

RO1–MH–17589 (7/69–6/71); Elinson, Jack, Columbia Univ., New York, N.Y. A Study of Teen-Age Drug Behavior, FY 70, $128,000.

To collect data, thru use of self-administered questionnaires, on the drug using behavior & attitudes of jr & sr high school students in order to devise more effective methods of intervention & education in drug abuse. Both longitudinal & trend data. Major areas covered in survey: 1) perception of drugs & their affects; 2) personal experience with drugs; 3) health; 4) family life; & 5) personal characteristics. Emphasis on relationship between drug use and achievement. (N=40,000)

ROI–MH–17642 (9/69–8/75); Manheimer, Dean I., Langley Porter Neuropsychiat Inst., San Francisco, Calif., Drug Use Related to College and Career Achievement, FY 70, $103,-000.

To study the relation of drug use during college to objective indicators of academic & career achievement & to subjective feeling of self-fulfillment using personal interviews & questionnaires. Involves 3 samples of men; 1) longitudinal panel of men graduating in 1971, N=1600; 2) a longitudinal sample entering as freshmen in 1970, N=1250; & 3) a cross-section who entered as freshmen in 1967, incl. drop-outs & transfers, N=1800.

RO3–MH–17647 (7/69–6/70); Rozynko, Vitali V., Mendocino State Hosp., Talmage, Calif., Typology of Drug Users, FY 70, $6,000.

To provide typology of drug abusers, will interview & administer psychological tests to a sample of 200 M admissions to the Mendocino State Hosp Drug Abuse Treatment Prgm, isolate discrete variables, both from the interviews & the test scores; then use multivariate techniques to perform cluster analyses in an attempt to discover meaningful dimensions of drug abuse. Population includes many methedrine users.

2. Exp. Animal Studies; Chem and Biochem Research

RO1–MH–15864 (7/69–6/70); Forney, Robt B., Indiana Univ Fdn., Bloomington, Ind., Isolation and Toxicology of THC, FY 70, $30,000.

Natural THC will be extracted from marihuana. The purified product will be compared to synthetic THC. More rapid & specific extraction procedures will be sought. The CNS effects will be further explored. Absorption, distribution, excretion & metabolism of THC & derivatives will be studied in animals (dogs, rats, mice). Human paid volunteers to be used to study effects of marihuana alone & in combination with other drugs.

RO1–MH–17478 (9/68–8/72); De Ropp, Robt S., Univ. of San Francisco, San Francisco, Calif., Effects of Smoke on Cannabis Sative on Mice, FY 70, $34,000.

Study of the effect of smoking marihuana on the behavior, emzymes and biogenic amine brain levels in mice as well as the carcinogenic & teratogenic effects. Specific measurements will be made of the amount of smoke necessary to produce discernible behavioral changes, the nature of the changes producd by either fraction, the incidence of cancer, effects on longevity, fetal absorption, abnormal fetal development, relative activities of certain brain enzymes and changes in brain serotonin of catecholamine levels.

Prevention and Education

RO1–MH–17527 (7/69–6/70); Drucker, Paula K., Westchester Reg Educ Ctr., White Plains, N.Y., Study of Drug Use and Abuse, FY 70, $39,000.

To initiate and test newly developed health education materials (with particular emphasis on drugs) in 4 Westchester high schools, representing a range of SESs. Student leaders and teachers, who will lead the drug educ classes will receive a weekend of sensitivity training before classes begin. Classes of ½ hr of formal presentation of material, with 1 hr of small grp discussion will be led by trained leaders. Initial target grp will be 100 10th grade students who will attend these sessions once a week for 20 weeks. Methods of presentation will vary (students alone; teachers alone; students and teachers interacting) and the effects of the varying methods will be evaluated. 2nd test group will be 7th graders.

SECTION II: PSYCHOPHARMACOLOGY RESEARCH BRANCH

Clinical research

RO1–MH–3030 PY–C (4/59–5/73); Hollister, Leo E., Stanford Univ., Stanford, Calif., Improved Clinical Screening of Phrenotropic Drugs, Pd Thru FY 69, $727,000; FY 69+$94; FY 70, $103,000.

See publications: Hollister, Leo E., Richards, Richard K., and Gillespie, H. K. Comparison of THC and synhexyl in Man. Clinical Pharmacology and Therapeutics, 9(6):783–792, Nov–Dec 1968. Hollister, Leo E. Steroids and moods: Correlations in schizophrenics and subjects treated with LSD, mescaline, THC, and synhexyl. Journal of Clinical Pharmacology, 9(1):24–30, Jan–Feb 1969.

R10–MH–4669 PY–C (1/61–2/72); Gershon, Samuel, NY Univ Med Ctr., New York, N.Y., Controlled Drug Evaluations, Pd Thru FY 69, $1,012,000, FY 69, $146,000, FY 70, $152,000.

See publication: Hekimian, Leon J., and Gershon, Samuel. Characteristics of drug abusers admitted to a psychiatric hospital. JAMA, 205(3):125–130, July 15, 1968.

B. Experimental animal and biochemical research

R10–MH–10990 PY–P (4/65–11/69); Irwin, Samuel, Univ of Oregon Med Sch., Portland, Oreg., Pre-Clinical Drug Evaluation and Methods Development, Total pd, $304,000.

Part of grant: Research program in psychopharmacology—Chronic studies with drugs that are abused. To investigate the similarities and differences in behavioral effects of several members (short and long-acting) of each class of drugs abused, using observational procedures. For cannabis class, THC to be studied.

R10–MH–11468 PY–P (6/65–5/70); Bass, Allan D., Vanderbilt Univ Sch of Med., Nashville, Tenn., Psychopharmacology Research Center, Pd Thru FY 69, $1,095,000, FY 69, $261,000.

Drug metabolism and biochemical pharmacology. Relationship between the CNS stimulating agents and catecholamines storage, secretion and metabolism. Recently undertaken study of actions of tetrahydrocannabinol.

R01–MH–11752 PY–P (6/65–8/69); (Formerly MH–3229), Weiss, Bernard, Univ of Rochester, Rochester, N.Y., Effects of Psychopharmacologic Agents on Behavior, Pd Thru FY 69, $303,000, FY 69, $75,000 more recommended.

To relate specific behavioral processes to specific neuropharmacological actions and to provide the basis of such correlations. (Monkeys) Part of research: studies on the effect of THC isomers (added to cigarettes) on various behavioral parameter in monkeys.

RO1–MH–11846 PY–P (6/66–8/69); Domino, Edward F., Univ of Mich., Ann Arbor, Mich., Michigan Neuropsychopharmacology Research Program, Pd Thru FY 69, $240,000, FY 69, $83,000.

Effects of psychoactive drugs & neurotransmitter mechanisms. Interactions of cholinergic, adrenergic, serotonergic & histaminergic systems in the rain in regard to arousal-sleep, self-stimulation and escape behavior. Interaction of marihuana & its derivatives being investigated on these phenomena.

RO1–MH–13186 PY–P (9/66–8/72); Freedman, Daniel X., Univ of Chi., Chicago, Ill., Psychogenic Procedures and Brain Neurohumors, Pd Thru FY 69, $174,000, FY 69, $67,000, (Formerly MH–3363).

Psychopharmacology of LSD & various forms of stress, & the effects of LSD on the "binding", metabolism & turnover of brain amines, particularly 5–HT & NE. Effects of the active THC isomer from marihuana on brain amine levels. MARIHUANA—SOME QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

WHAT IS MARIHUANA?

Marihuana is a drug found in the flowering tops and leaves of the Indian hemp plant, cannabis sativa. The plant grows in mild climates in countries around the world, especially in Mexico, Africa, India, and the Middle East. It also grows in the United States, where the drug is known as pot, tea, grass, weed, Mary Jane, and by other names.

For use as a drug, the leaves and flowers of the plant are dried and crushed or chopped into small pieces. This green product is usually rolled and smoked in short cigarettes or in pipes, or it can be taken in food. The cigarettes are commonly known as reefers, joints, and sticks. The smoke from marihuana is harsh, and smells like burnt rope or dried grasses. Its sweetish odor is easily recognized.

The strength of the drug differs from place to place, depending on where and how it is grown, how it is prepared for use, and how it is stored. The marihuana available in the United States is much weaker than the kind grown in Asia, Africa, or the Near East.

WHAT IS ITS USE?

Although it has been known to man for nearly 5,000 years, marihuana is one of the least understood of all natural drugs. In China, very early in history, it was given to relieve pain during surgery and, in India, as a medicine. Unlike other drugs, it has no known use in modern medicine. It is used mainly for its intoxicating effects. According to a United Nations survey, it has been most widely used in Asia and Africa.

Traffic in and use of drugs from the cannabis plant is now legally restricted in nearly every civilized country in the world, including countries where marihuana is used in religious ceremonies or as a native medicine.

HOW WIDELY IS IT USED IN THE UNITED STATES?

The use of marihuana as an intoxicating drug was introduced in the United States in 1920. In 1937, its general use was outlawed by the Federal Marihuana Tax Act, followed by strict laws and enforcement in every State. In the mid-1960's, authorities reported a sharp increase in the use of marihuana. Arrests on marihuana charges have more than doubled since 1960, according to the President's Commission on Crime.

The exact extent of marihuana use in the United States is not known. Some health authorities believe that 4 to 5 million Americans may have used the drug at least once in their lives. Other estimates are as high as 20 million. Research studies are underway to determine more precisely just how widely the drug is used.

HOW DOES THE DRUG WORK?

When smoked, marihuana quickly enters the bloodstream and acts on the brain and nervous system. It affects the user's mood and thinking. Its pathway into the brain is not yet understood. Some scientists report that the drug accumulates in the liver. Because it may cause hallucinations when taken in very large doses, it is classed as a mild "hallucinogen." Just how the drug works in the body and how it produces its effects has not yet been discovered by medical science.

WHAT ARE ITS PHYSICAL EFFECTS?

The long-term physical effects of taking marihuana are not yet known. The kind of research needed to learn the results of chronic use has not yet been done.

The more obvious physical reactions include rapid heart beat, lowering of body temperature, and sometimes reddening of the eyes. The drug also changes blood sugar levels, stimulates the appetite, and dehydrates the body. Users may get talkative, loud, unsteady, or drowsy, and find it hard to coordinate their movements.

WHAT ARE ITS OTHER EFFECTS?

The drug's effects on the emotions and senses vary widely, depending on the amount and strength of the marihuana used. The social setting in which it is taken and what the user expects also influence his reaction to the drug.

Usually, when it is smoked, marihuana's effect is felt quickly, in about 15 minutes. Its effects can last from 2 to 4 hours. The range of effects can vary from depression to a feeling of excitement. Some users, however, experience no change of mood at all. The sense of time and distance of many users frequently becomes distorted. A minute may seem like an hour. Something near may seem far away.

HOW DOES MARIHUANA AFFECT JUDGMENT?

A person using marihuana finds it harder to make decisions that require clear thinking. And he finds himself more easily open to other people's suggestions. Doing any task that takes good reflexes and thinking is affected by the drug. For this reason it is dangerous to drive while under the influence of the drug.

WHAT ARE THE LATEST FINDINGS ABOUT THE DRUG?

Working with man-made tetrahydrocannabinol, one of the active ingredients of marihuana, a leading scientist recently found that high dosages of the drug brought on severe reactions in every person tested. The National Institute of Mental Health study also showed that psychotic reactions sometimes occur, for unknown reasons, in some individuals who take smaller amounts.

The scientist observed that a dose equal to one cigarette of the United States type can make the smoker feel excited, gay, or silly. After an amount equal to four, the user notices changes in what he can perceive. He reports that colors seem brighter, his sense of hearing keener. After a dose equal to 10 cigarettes, other reactions set in. He experiences visual hallucinations (seeing things that are not there), illusions (seeing or imagining shapes in objects that are not there), or delusions (beliefs not based in reality). His mood may swing from great joy to extreme anxiety. He may become deeply depressed, or have feelings of uneasiness, panic, or fear.

IS MARIHUANA ADDICTING?

Authorities now think in terms of drug "dependence" rather than "addiction." Marihuana, which is not a narcotic, does not cause physical dependence as do heroin and other narcotics. This means that the body does not become dependent on continuing use of the drug. The body probably does not develop a tolerance to the drug, either, which would make larger and larger doses necessary to get the same effects. Withdrawal from marihuana does not produce physical sickness.

A number of scientists think the drug can cause psychological dependence, however, if its users take it regularly. All researchers agree that more knowledge of the physical, personal, and social consequence of marihuana use is needed before more factual statements can be made.

DOES IT LEAD TO USE OF NARCOTICS?

A 1967 study of narcotic addicts from city areas showed that more than 80 percent had previously used marihuana. Of the much larger number of persons who use marihuana, scientists agree that few go on to use morphine and heroin. No direct cause-and-effect link between the use of marihuana and narcotics has been found. Researchers point out, however, a person predisposed to abuse one drug may be likely to abuse other, stronger drugs. Also, users of one illicit drug may be exposed to a variety of them through contacts with drug sellers and other users.

WHAT ARE THE LAWS DEALING WITH MARIHUANA?

Under Federal law, to have, give or sell marihuana in the United States is a felony, which is a serious crime. Federal and many State laws deal with the drug as severely as if it were a narcotic.

The Federal penalty for possessing the drug is 2 to 10 years imprisonment for the first offense, 5 to 20 years for the second offense, and 10 to 40 years for further offenses. Fines of up to $20,000 for the first or subsequent offenses may be imposed. State laws also control the illicit use of these drugs. For transfer or sale of the drug, the first offense may bring a 5- to 20-year sentence and a fine of up to $20,000; two or more offenses, 10 to 40 years in prison. If a person over 18 sells to a minor under 18 years of age, he is subject to a fine of up to $20,000 and/or 10 to 40 years in prison for the first offense, with no suspension of sentence, probation, or parole.

WHAT ARE THE SPECIAL RISKS FOR YOUNG USERS?

Breaking the laws dealing with marihuana can have serious effects on the lives of young people. They may find their education interrupted and their future shadowed or altered by having a police record. An arrest or conviction for a felony can complicate their life and plans at many turns. For example, in many States, a person with a police record must meet special conditions to obtain or renew a driver's license. Conviction can prevent a person from being able to enter a profession such as medicine, law, or teaching. It can make it difficult for him to get a responsible position in business or industry. Special hearings are necessary before he can hold a government job. Before a student tries marihuana, he should be aware of the social and legal facts about getting involved with the drug.

Other risks are pointed out by experts on human growth and development. They say that a more subtle result of drug abuse on the young person is its effect on his personality growth and development. For young people to experiment with drugs at a time when they are going through a period of many changes in their transition to adulthood is a seriously questionable practice.

"It can be especially disturbing to a young person who is already having enough of a task getting adjusted to life and establishing his values," says an NIMH scientist engaged in studies of young marihuana users.

Another reason for caution: Statements being reported by students that the use of marihuana is "medically safe," are not supported by scientific evidence. It is hoped that research now underway may add to the little currently known about the effects of the use of marihuana.

WHY IS SO LITTLE KNOWN ABOUT THE DRUG?

Medical science does not yet know enough about the effects of marihuana use because its active ingredient—tetrahydrocannabinol—was produced in pure form only recently. In the summer of 1966 the chemical, first synthesized by an NIMH-supported scientist in Israel, was made available for research purposes. Now for the first time researchers can accurately measure the drug's effects and study its short- and long-term action on the body.

WHAT RESEARCH IS BEING DONE?

The National Institute of Mental Health, an agency of the Public Health Service, is responsible for supporting and conducting research to learn more about marihuana and to present this knowledge to the public.

The program of the NIMH Center for Studies of Narcotic and Drug Abuse includes surveys of how people get the drug, how widely students and others use it, and what effects different amounts and periods of use have upon people, physically and psychologically. With NIMH support, scientists are now studying the special drug qualities of marihuana, and its physical effects on the body.

The NIMH Addiction Research Center in Lexington, Kentucky, plans research to discover exactly how marihuana affects memory, perception (or awareness), mood, and physical movement. Other studies are planned to learn more about the drug's long-range effects on the body and mind.

A POT PRIMER FOR PARENTS

Know enough basic facts about marihuana to talk to your son and daughter about it.

As a parent, you're concerned. You read that college, high school, even junior students smoke marihuana. What about your own son or daughter? Have they tried it? Would they tell you? Do you just keep quiet and hope—do you talk?

Your youngsters may joke about grass, tea, joint, roach, head—words that mean something different to you. They seem to know more about drugs than you do—that's their side of the generation gap. But not all their "facts" may be facts.

Can you talk frankly to your child about pot?

As frankly as about other important matters, with tact and mutual respect. It may be easier to start by discussing marihuana experiences he's heard of from his friends. You won't want to come across as accusing or angry—it's as risky to assume he does "turn on" as to assume he doesn't. Keep it simple, direct. And make sure your concern for him, and what happens to him, shows.

Who uses pot, and why?

More boys than girls. Girls are likelier to try if their boyfriends smoke it. A majority of young people have not tried it, and have enough self-assurance to resist trying it. A number have tried it once or twice out of curiosity or boredom. A smaller number "turn on" just on weekends. A small percentage become "heads"—their lives centered around marihuana or other drugs, with very little interest in anything else.

What proven facts about marihuana can you tell him?

1. Individuals react very differently to this drug, which is why you hear stories of extreme reactions, and stories of no reaction.

2. Reactions vary according to setting, expectation, pattern of use, and the strength of the marihuana (which varies greatly).

3. Because of all these variables, little has been proven conclusively about specific effects of marihuana on the mind and body. This does not mean there are no ill effects, but that they cannot be catalogued and predicted exactly.

4. Involvement with this drug during the years while the young personality is finding and shaping itself, and learning how to deal with life's problems, is an intangible danger to try to measure, but of deep importance. That's a hard fact for the young to understand.

5. The possession of marihuana is illegal under local laws. In many states, it is a felony, equivalent to the possession of heroin. The laws provide severe penalties. Even being in the company of someone who possesses marihuana may make your child liable for arrest.

Easy answers to hard questions.

There aren't any. If your children ask, "What about parents' drinking and smoking?" a partial answer is that your body and personality have matured. Once anyone becomes dependent on any drug, including alcohol and cigarettes, it can be difficult to stop. Even if you're convinced they're harmful.

"Why do adults say marihuana leads to stronger drugs when that hasn't happened to my friends?" A teen-ager's experience is limited; it has happened. While marihuana itself does not lead to other drug use, association with "dealers" and drug users may be the first step to experimenting with LSD, speed and even heroin. And these drugs are far more than a stronger form of pot.

"What about the people who say pot is OK?" To be honest, scientists still don't know everything about the specific effects of marihuana. But certainly, the "authorities" your children quote, know even less. No expert is saying today that pot should be legal.

It boils down to this. Marihuana is a risk nobody has to take. Least of all somebody you care about.

EXHIBIT 5

WHEN ARE THEY GOING TO LEGALIZE POT?

A lot of people these days are going around saying it's only a matter of months until Acapulco Gold is available over the counter in menthol and king-size lengths.

Which is an indication of how little people know about marihuana. The real fact of the matter is that marihuana is a drug. Like all drugs, it affects the human body and the human brain. Like all drugs, it has side effects.

Today, research scientists are studying marihuana's effects on the brain, the nervous system, on chromosomes, and on various organs of the body. They're trying to find out why different people have different reactions to it.

They're studying its effects after one or two cigarettes, and they're trying to find out what happens with long term use.

Maybe it will turn out that there's no reason for it to be illegal. But nobody can be sure until all the facts are in. And until they all are, it's a pretty bum risk.

THE TRUTH ABOUT MARIHUANA

(Marihuana: 60 Secs.)

Open on hands: Anncr: (VO).

They roll a "joint": Why doesn't anyone tell the truth about marihuana?

Man: (VO).

Smoke pot. . . . and you wind up hooked on heroin!

Young, Hip Man: (VO).

Man, it's cleaner than alcohol!

Woman: (VO).

It's the first step right into the psycho ward.

Man: (young) (VO).

There's just no reason to keep it illegal!

Anncr: (VO).

Today, not one of those statements is true. Because to date, not one is based upon scientific fact. Millions of dollars are being spent this year on research to get these facts.

Hand takes it out of frame, smoke enters frame.

But there's one fact you should know now, possession of marihuana in the United States is a felony. Don't treat that fact lightly! Conviction, even with a suspended sentence, can, in some states, prevent you from getting a driver's license, furthering your education, landing a government job, or working in a profession.

Pan to license, pan to employment application, pan to doctor's license, pan to "joint," still burning, move in on smoke, N.I.M.H. logo.

With marihuana, some things that may be important to you in the future, can go up in smoke.

And that is the truth!

S. 3191—INTRODUCTION OF A BILL RELATING TO STATUS OF CERTAIN LANDS IN CALIFORNIA

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and my colleague, the senior Senator from California (Mr. MURPHY), I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to affect the status of various lands in Inyo and Mono Counties in the State of California. This bill has evolved through discussions among the appropriate Federal agencies, the city of Los Angeles, and the counties of Inyo and Mono. It represents, I believe, a satisfactory resolution to needed changes in the pattern of land use in the Owens Valley area.

The best summary of this somewhat complicated legislative proposal is a statement prepared by the staff at the Los Angeles Water and Power Commission. I ask unanimous consent that the statement be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 3191) to withdraw various lands in the counties of Mono and Inyo, Calif., from appropriations under the public land law, release certain lands in the counties of Mono and Inyo from withdrawal, acquire various lands owned by the city of Los Angeles, Calif., grant to the city of Los Angeles various land and water rights, modify the act of March 4, 1931, Executive Order No. 5843, dated April 28, 1932—and Executive Order No. 6206—dated July 19, 1933—and repeal the act of June 23, 1936, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. CRANSTON (for himself and Mr. MURPHY), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

The statement, presented by Mr. CRANSTON, is as follows:

INTRODUCTION OF INYO-MONO PUBLIC LAND LEGISLATION

The purpose of this bill is to provide for the use and control of public land in Mono and Inyo Counties, California, so as to achieve maximum public benefits through multiple use of the lands and at the same time protect the water supply of Los Angeles residents. This area supplies more than two-thirds of the water needs of the approximately three million citizens of the City of Los Angeles.

There can be no question that the public lands involved in the bill are a great national resource for recreational uses. Passage of this bill will enhance their development.

The public lands involved in this bill are in the Owens River watershed and the Mono Basin watershed, and it is not the intent of this bill to affect any lands or water rights other than in these watersheds.

The Owens River watershed is formed by the elongated Owens Valley on the east side of the Sierra Nevada mountains. It is about 120 miles long, from 15 to 30 miles wide and is a hydrologically closed basin with internal drainage to Owens Lake, which as a result is highly saline. The Owens River rises in Mono County near the divide between the Owens River and Mono Basin watersheds to the north. It flows southerly through Long Valley, where Lake Crowley has been created by the City of Los Angeles Long Valley dam onto the valley floor and is fed by tributary streams from the Sierra Nevada mountains to the west and, to a lesser extent, the Inyo and White Mountains to the east.

The Mono Basin watershed is also a closed basin hydrologically, draining into the saline Mono Lake. The Inyo National Forest encloses much of the area.

In 1904, it was apparent that the water supply of the Los Angeles River would not sustain the growth of Los Angeles. Surveys showed that other water resources in Southern California already were committed. The concept that water of the Owens River, then flowing into the highly saline Owens Lake and evaporating, could be diverted to Los Angeles was investigated and found to be feasible. The Water Department of the City then acquired land and water rights in the southerly end of the valley above Owens Lake, which would permit the diversion.

The Congress, in support of the City's diversion of water, adopted an Act approved by President Theodore Roosevelt on June 30, 1906, by which the necessary rights-of-way for the project were granted the City of Los Angeles. A 240-mile, 440-cubic feet-per-second capacity aqueduct was constructed between 1908 and 1913.

For a few years, the aqueduct served its purpose well. By 1920 the mean annual diversion reached the level of 260 cfs. However, the population in Los Angeles was increasing at a rate beyond expectations. At the same time, increasing diversions upstream and a period of drought in the early '20s combined to reduce the flow of the Owens River available to the aqueduct.

To ensure future capacity operation of the aqueduct system, it became essential that rights to Owens River waters be expanded by purchases of additional private lands in the Owens River watershed. By the end of 1934, approximately 234,000 acres of land had been purchased by the Department of Water and Power through negotiation with the owners. No lands were taken by condemnation. These lands constituted most of the patented lands in the Owens River watershed.

In 1930, the Department of Water and Power began an extension of the City's aqueduct system into the Mono Basin watershed and acquired by purchase 59,000 acres of privately-owned land and the water rights which would be affected by the diversion. This extension was completed in 1940.

Many of the public lands affected by this bill lay between the lands purchased by the Department of Water and Power on the valley floor of the Owens River watershed and the U.S. Forest Reserve in the surrounding mountains. While the lands were not suited for farming, the public lands were open for entry, and the possibility that entry could be made on them was a threat to the water supply of the City.

Congress recognized this possibility and enacted legislation, approved March 4, 1931, withdrawing from entry 367,637.87 acres of public land along the sides of the Owens Valley between the City-owned lands and the lands of the Inyo National Forest. On April 28, 1932, Executive Order No. 5843 withdrew from entry 261,025 acres of public land north of Mono Lake and east to Chalfant Valley. On July 16, 1933, Executive Order No. 6206 withdrew from entry 209,505 acres of public land below and around Owens Lake. On June 23, 1936, an Act of Congress was approved (Public Law 769–74) which granted land and rights-of-way in Mono County to the City for water supply and electrical generation purposes.

The above Acts and Executive Orders evidence the support the United States has given in protecting the water supply of the City. The Department of Water and Power of the City now has an investment of more than $200,000,000 in its water and power system in the area.

This bill will affect the some 838,168 acres of public land which has been withdrawn above. It will release from withdrawal for the protection of the water supply of the City approximately 603,000 acres of public land and make them available for classification under the land laws of the United States. It will authorize conveyances of City-owned land to the United States and public land to the City which appear desirable to agencies of the United States, to the Counties of Inyo and Mono, California, and to the City. It will modify the Act of March 4, 1931, Executive Orders 5843 and 6206 and will repeal the Act of June 23, 1936.

The rest of the land, approximately 226,000 acres, will remain withdrawn. The bill constitutes a contract between the United States and the City wherein it is agreed that as long as the City maintains in each County works and facilities used for the supply of water or electric energy for municipal purposes, these lands will not be patented to others. This provision will preclude the possibility that littoral or riparian rights may arise under state law in the event these lands were to pass into private ownership. In consideration of this agreement, and of the other rights and interests granted under the bill, the City will pay $100,000 and grant City-owned lands to the United States.

Of the lands to be withdrawn as part of the agreement, 9,843 acres are littoral to Mono Lake and Owens Lake. The bill grants the City the right to raise and lower the surface and underground water levels in these lands. As to the remainder, the bill grants the City the right to vary the underground water table by taking or failing to take water from either of the two watersheds. In addition, since the ground water table under approximately 325,000 acres of the land to be released from withdrawal will be affected by the amount of water diverted by the City, the right to vary the underground water table in these lands is granted. This will prevent possible claims of damage should some of these lands be patented to private owners.

The City also is granted the right to spread water on the withdrawn lands. During abnormal runoffs the available water exceeds aqueduct capacity. With this right the City may spread the excess waters on these lands as well as its own land and thus recharge underground basins. Water thus stored is available for use during drought. Easements to enter the withdrawn lands to control the flow also are granted; however, no right is granted to pump water on the withdrawn public land.

Easements for structures and improvements of the City in existence at the time the bill is approved both on lands in the forest and in the withdrawn lands are granted, and in addition, the bill provides the City may select easements for future structures and improvements for the period of ten years. The total of these easements may not exceed 5,000 acres. Provision is made for payment of just compensation if use of a selected easement should cause physical damage to any structure or improvement which is lawfully in place at the time the easement is selected. No future easements are granted in forest land, and any easements which may be required in the national forest will be obtained under the land laws.

Uses of the public land and uses of the forest lands by the City will be subject to such conditions as are reasonable and necessary in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture, respectively, to protect the interests of the United States in the management of the public land or national forests.

As stated above, lands will be conveyed to the City by this Act, and the City will convey lands to the United States. The lands to be conveyed to the United States include land desired by the Bureau of Land Management and the U.S. Forest Service. For instance, the 1,673, acre Moffitt Ranch owned by the City is desired by the Bureau for inclusion in the Alabama Hills recreational development. Parcels of 485 acres on Tuttle Creek and 366 acres on Lone Pine Creek are desired for campground development. The Forest Service wishes to acquire 520 acres at Horseshoe Meadows for its Trail Peak ski development.

In addition, lands are to be conveyed to the United States for the benefit of the towns in the Counties of Mono and Inyo. As part of its land acquisition program, the City purchased most of the land around the towns in both watersheds, and it is proposed that, as part of the benefits accruing under the bill, the City convey to the United States parcels of land outside Lone Pine, Independence and Big Pine in Inyo County and Lee Vining in Mono County for disposal by the United States for the orderly growth and development of these Counties.

Most of the lands to be conveyed to the City are in two categories: (1) isolated parcels of land surrounded by City-owned lands and (2) lands underlying reservoirs of the City. Conveyance of the first category of lands will simplify management of the public lands, and conveyance of the second category will aid the City in management of its reservoirs.

The bill provides that future exchanges of land between the United States and the City may be made if desired.

Lands to be withdrawn will be available for mining under the mining laws according to regulations to be established by the Secretary of the Interior. Also, under appropriate regulations, the Secretary may pemit hunting, fishing, camping and other recreational uses, stock watering and stock grazing upon the lands, provided, if lands are to be used for residential purposes, the consent of the City is obtained.

Any private rights hereafter acquired in the withdrawn lands are to be subject to the rights granted the City under this bill, but it is provided that any rights granted shall not affect any existing right nor any valid claim previously initiated.

All interests granted to the City of Los Angeles with the exception of the lands granted in fee, are to be held for purposes of municipal water and power supply of the City. Assignment of rights is prohibited except with consent of the chief officer of the Federal Department controlling the public lands concerned. All interests, other than lands granted in fee, are to terminate if the City does not, for a continuous period of one year, maintain works for a municipal water or electric supply in this area.

The bill specifically disclaims any intent to interfere with the laws of the State of California regarding land and water rights or with any right, power or privilege of the State of California in its sovereign capacity or in its proprietary capacity.

The bill provides for the repeal of the Act of June 23, 1936, entitled "An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell to the city of Los Angeles, Calif., certain public lands in California; and granting rights-of-way over public lands and reserve lands to the city of Los Angeles, in Mono County in the State of California." It also provides that upon acceptance of the Act by the City, as passed by the Congress, the Act of March 4, 1931, referred to above, shall not apply to lands released from withdrawal for the protection of the water supply of the City by the bill.

In conclusion, this bill provides benefits of value to the United States, to the counties in which those public lands are located and to the City. It will provide the City with all that it needs to protect its operations in the area from adverse and speculative claims which might arise as a result of some future private acquisition of public lands. The contract in this bill merely prohibits the United States from disposing of the public lands withdrawn by the bill. Recreational uses, mining uses and stock grazing and stock watering uses will be permitted. It will simplify management of the public lands, and the United States will acquire City-owned lands which can be developed into recreational areas. It also will make available land in which the towns in the Counties of Inyo and Mono, California, may grow.

S. 3192—INTRODUCTION OF A BILL TO HAVE AN UNNAMED LOCK IN THE PORT OF SACRAMENTO PROJECT DESIGNATED AS THE WILLIAM G. STONE NAVIGATION LOCK

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, today, in behalf of my distinguished colleague, Senator CRANSTON, and myself, I introduce proposed legislation to have an unnamed lock in the Port of Sacramento project designated as the William G. Stone navigation lock.

The appropriateness of such a designation was recognized recently in resolutions, which were almost identical except for the names of the groups taking the action, which were passed by the board of supervisors of the county of Sacramento, the board of supervisors of the county of Yolo, and the port commission of the Sacramento-Yolo Port District.

Since the text of these resolutions is so close, I would like to read one of them into the RECORD. It is as follows:

Whereas, death has taken William G. Stone who served as the first Port Director of the Port of Sacramento for a period of over sixteen years; and

Whereas, William G. Stone spent the greater part of his working life actively working for the creation of the Port of Sacramento; and

Whereas, William G. Stone was held in exceptionally high esteem by all who knew him for his integrity and dedication; and

Whereas, the said Port of Sacramento project includes a navigation lock which does not bear an official name;

Now, therefore, be it resolved that the Board of Supervisors of the County of Sacramento, State of California, wishing to memorialize the efforts of William G. Stone, does respectfully urge that the lock be officially named the William G. Stone Navigation Lock.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that a news item and an editorial published in the Sacramento Bee following Mr. Stone's death be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and without objection, the article and editorial will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 3192) to designate the navigation lock on the Sacramento deepwater ship channel in the State of California as the William G. Stone navigation lock, introduced by Mr. MURPHY (for himself and Mr. CRANSTON), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Works.

The article and editorial, presented by Mr. MURPHY, are as follows:

RETIRED PORT DIRECTOR STONE DIES AT 84 AFTER HEART ATTACK

William G. Stone, the man regarded as responsible perhaps more than anyone for the Port of Sacramento, died late yesterday in the Sutter General Hospital.

Stone, who was 84, entered the hospital Saturday after he suffered a mild heart attack. A member of his family said he had a previous attack last month.

A native of Potomac, Ill., Stone had been a resident of Sacramento for 63 years and he had more than 60 years experience in the transportation industry.

He came to California as a youth in 1903 and began his career loading oranges aboard freight cars in a Southern California packing house.

He worked for the Southern Pacific Co., was chief inspector for the Transcontinental Freight Bureau in Sacramento and for 20 years he served as traffic manager for the Thomson-Diggs Co., a wholesale hardware concern.

For 16 years, Stone was manager of the Sacramento Chamber of Commerce's Transportation and Industrial Department and the last 15 years of his active career were spent as director of the Port of Sacramento.

PORT OPENED IN 1963

He began crusading for construction of the port in 1932 shortly after he was hired by the Chamber of Commerce and he never stopped his efforts in its behalf until he saw the port opened for the first oceangoing vessel in 1963. He retired shortly thereafter.

The Sacramento-Yolo Port District was created in 1947 after six years of effort in which the Chamber of Commerce, under Stone's guidance, raised $100,000 for research and promotional purposes.

It was largely through Stone's efforts that congressional committees were convinced of the future of the port and voted funds to begin construction of the port of the Sacramento Deep Water Channel.

REVIVED PROJECT

During the Korean War, the port's detractors insisted the project was dead, but Stone was determined and each year for four years he kept knocking on doors of congressmen until he succeded in reviving funding for the project.

In 1955, a token appropriation of $500,000 was made and construction of the deep water channel resumed in 1956.

Stone's credentials in the transportation industry were voluminous. He was a charter member of many transportation organizations, served as a Western regional director of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, and often was called upon for advice in transportation and maritime matters.

ELDER IN CHURCH

He and his wife Myrtle, a school teacher who died last year, were active in the affairs of the Westminster Presbyterian Church of which he was an elder.

He held membership in the Sacramento Rotary Club, the Sacramento Chapter of Delta Nu Alpha transportation fraternity and the Sacramento Valley Transportation Club of which he was a charter member. He also was a member of the Sacramento Camellia Society and a charter member of the American Camellia Society.

He is survived by a son, William H., of San Mateo; a daughter, Mrs. Carolyn Howe of Sacramento; three grandchildren, Mrs. Marilyn Whitney and Gordon and Ronald Howe, all of Sacramento, and two great-grandchildren.

Funeral services will be conducted Friday at 2 p.m. in the Andrews and Greilich Chapel, 3939 Fruitridge Road, and private entombment in East Lawn Cemetery will follow. The family requests any remembrances be sent to the Westminister Presbyterian Church memorial fund.

SACRAMENTO'S DEBT TO "BILL" STONE

In every civic undertaking there always has to be a so-called "spark plug" who ignites the community effort and keeps it going.

Many contributed to the completion of the highly successful Sacramento deep Water Channel.

But the driving force behind it was W. G. "Bill" Stone who served as director of the Sacramento-Yolo Port District for 15 years before his retirement and who now is dead at the age of 84 after a long and fruitful career of dedicated public and civic service.

It was Stone, as manager of the Sacramento Chamber of Commerce's Transportation and Industrial Department, who began pushing the project in 1932.

He never rested in his efforts to bring oceangoing ships to Sacramento, despite discouraging setbacks in obtaining funds from the federal government. He finally saw his dream realized in 1963.

His combination of energy and enthusiasm which went with a "soft sell" approach convinced many a skeptic of the need for the facility.

And before Bill retired he had the foresight to recruit a team to carry on the port's successful operation.

Truly, Stone earned the title of "Mr. Port" as he was called affectionately by his coworkers and his many friends.

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILLS

S. 2004

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, at the next printing, the name of the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BELLMON) be added as a cosponsor of S. 2004, to amend the Communications Act of 1934 to establish orderly procedures for the consideration of applications for renewal of broadcast licenses.

S. 3055

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, at the next printing, the name of the Senator from Michigan (Mr. HART) be added as a cosponsor of S. 3055, to authorize the use of excess Government-owned foreign currencies to finance the establishment abroad of binational foundations for educational and scientific purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

S. 3147

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, at the next printing, the name of the Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON) be added as a cosponsor of S. 3147, to amend the act relating to indemnity payments to dairy farmers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SENATE RESOLUTION 292—SUBMISSION OF A RESOLUTION RELATING TO TROOP DEPLOYMENT IN EUROPE

Mr. MANSFIELD submitted a resolution (S. Res. 292) to express the sense of the Senate with respect to troop deployment in Europe, which, by unanimous consent was referred to the Committees on Armed Services and Foreign Relations, jointly.

(The remarks of Mr. MANSFIELD when he submitted the resolution appear earlier in the RECORD under the appropriate heading.

TAX REFORM ACT OF 1969—AMENDMENTS

AMENDMENT NO. 316

Mr. CURTIS submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (H.R. 13270) to reform the income tax laws, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT NO. 318

Mr. ALLOTT submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to House bill 13270, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT NO. 319

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I submit an amendment, intended to be proposed by me, to H.R. 13270, and I ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and printed, and will lie on the table.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, today I am submitting an amendment to H.R. 13270 which will delete section 515 of the Senate Finance Committee version of the Tax Reform Act.

Section 515 of the Senate bill would have the following effects: First, lump sum distributions to employees would be taxed at ordinary income rates upon distribution in an amount equal to employer contributions after 1969; second, employers' contributions after 1969 toward the purchase of the employers' securities would be taxed at ordinary income rates upon distribution to the employee in an amount equal to the cost basis of contributions; and third, it establishes a special 5-year "forward" averaging method for the ordinary income part of a lump-sum distribution. I believe that these provisions would destroy valuable incentives upon which our business firms and their employees rely, and I urge that the Senate strike out this entire section of the bill.

Under present law, an employer who establishes a qualified employee pension, profit-sharing, stock bonus, or annuity plan is permitted to deduct his contributions to the trust. Moreover, income earned by the trust is exempt from tax if the employee trust is exempt. Upon retirement the employee who receives annual benefit payments is taxed at ordinary income rates. The exception to this rule is the payment of the benefits in a lump-sum distribution from the plan, in which case the payment is taxed as a long-term capital gain. I am particularly concerned that this highly successful feature of profit-sharing plans will be adversely affected by the changes in section 515.

The Finance Committee decided during its deliberations to deny such favorable capital gains treatment to lump-sum distributions on the grounds that they are in reality deferred compensation at more favorable tax rates than other compensation received for similar services. It was noted in the committee report that taxpayers with adjusted gross incomes in excess of $50,000 gain more and that there have been a number of distributions of over $800,000.

It cannot be denied that there probably are individuals who receive large distributions at favorable rates. However, it must be noted that tax-exempt profit-sharing plans are not inequitable. All profits are distributed on a nondiscriminatory basis—from janitor to president—because of the regulations which govern qualification as a tax-exempt profit-sharing plan. Furthermore, a survey made in 1968 showed that 90 percent of the lump-sum distributions made involved distributions of less than $30,000 and that almost 70 percent fell in the range of from $500 to $10,000. Far from being a device for the rich, lump-sum distributions affect millions of members in all income groups.

Since 1942, when the provision giving long-term capital gains treatment to lump-sum distributions was added to the code, over 80,000 companies have adopted deferred tax-qualified profit-sharing programs, covering over 5 million employees. Over 10,000 of these plans were established in 1968 alone. Clearly profit-sharing plans are popular with both employers and employees, and their continued growth is a clear affirmation of their success.

It has been alleged that distributions are actually deferred compensation and ought to be treated as ordinary income. However, this is not usually the case. Most corporations consider profit sharing as additional incentive and make their distributions in addition to ordinary compensation and benefits. Article II, section 1 of the Constitution and bylaws of the Council of Profit-Sharing Industries makes it clear that its concept of profit sharing is a procedure for payment in addition to prevailing rates of pay.

Lump-sum distributions from qualifying profit-sharing plans are further distinguished from simple "deferred compensation," or ordinary income, by the fact that it is risk capital. After the employer makes his contribution, it is the employee alone who is affected by changes in the investment of the contribution. Thus any number of factors, including inflation and bad stock or bond markets, could severely reduce the amount an employee would ultimately receive. Since the individual employee has no direct control over the investment of the funds, it would be erroneous to call it deferred compensation. Rather, the contributions have been invested in a manner that would ordinarily yield capital gains treatment.

Furthermore, the proposed change is defective because the distributions represent "bunched income" which has accumulated over a period of years, perhaps an entire working lifetime. The committee's answer is a complex amendment permitting averaging the gross "ordinary income" less the amount received during the year as compensation and less the capital gains. This method ignores the fact that averaging could push an elderly employee into a tax bracket higher than the level at which the contributions were originally made.

Apart from the claims of equity, there is another compelling reason why we should not tamper with the tax treatment of profit-sharing plans. Three decades ago a subcommittee of the Committee on Finance found that profit sharing contributes to harmonious labor-management relations and to labor peace and contentment. This astute observation is no less true today. Profit sharing enables employees to share in the fruits of the corporations for which they work. Where equity participation is not possible because the business is a partnership or close corporation, profit sharing gives employees a valuable and substantive stake in the soundness of the business. Through profit sharing an employee is afforded an opportunity to share in the benefits of ownership and to accumulate funds for his retirement or his beneficiaries. It is, I believe, an intelligent response of the free-enterprise system to demands for participation in the profits of one's business.

I fear that any changes in the status of employer contributions may retard the further growth of plans. Taxation of lump-sum distributions at ordinary rates may diminish the attractiveness of these plans and discourage further participation in them. I believe that profit sharing is a valuable financial incentive that must be preserved. I urge my colleagues who share my interest in the continued viability of profit-sharing plans to join me in this amendment to strike out section 515 of the tax reform bill.

AMENDMENT NO. 320

Mr. MURPHY submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to House bill 13270, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT NO. 321

Mr. MILLER (for himself, Mr. MUNDT, Mr. PEARSON, Mr. DOLE, Mr. ALLEN, Mr. METCALF, Mr. MCGEE, and Mr. HUGHES) submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, to House bill 13270, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT NO. 322

Mr. GRIFFIN submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to House bill 13270, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT NO. 323

Mr. CURTIS submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to House bill 13270, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENTS NOS. 324 THROUGH 326

Mr. HARTKE submitted three amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to House bill 13270, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT NO. 327

Mr. FANNIN submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to House bill 13270, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT NO. 328

Mr. PROXMIRE submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to House bill 13270, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

DEPARTMENTS OF LABOR, AND HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE, AND RELATED AGENCIES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1970—AMENDMENT

AMENDMENT NO. 317

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I submit at this time an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the appropriation bill for the Departments of Labor and Health, Education, and Welfare. This amendment provides for the appropriation of $2,500,000 to fund the State advisory councils on vocational education.

It was not my privilege to serve in the U.S. Senate when the 1968 Vocational Education Amendments were approved. However, I have studied the language of that act, and I am tremendously interested in the provisions that created a National Advisory Council on Vocational Education and advisory councils in all the 50 States.

The State councils are broadly representative of the various interests in vocational education. Included among the membership are persons familiar with the vocational education needs and problems of management and labor; persons representing State industrial and economic development agencies; representatives of community and junior colleges and area vocational schools; persons familiar with the administration of State and local vocational education programs; persons from educational agencies and school boards; representatives from manpower and vocational education agencies, and persons who have special knowledge in educating the disadvantaged and the handicapped; and persons representative of the general public.

The purpose of the State council is to advise the State board for vocational education on policy matters in developing a comprehensive plan for vocational education; to evaluate vocational education programs, services, and activities assisted under the 1968 act; and to prepare and submit to the Commissioner of Education, and the National Advisory Council, an annual evaluation report. This report is to be accompanied by comments from the State board on the evaluation, and may contain recommended changes as may be warranted by the evaluations.

I think it is highly desirable that these State councils become involved in matters pertaining to vocational education. Those who serve as members can greatly assist by bringing to vocational education the information, advice, and counsel that is necessary in order for this program to serve the career and occupational needs of all citizens. Likewise, these councils can promote the economic and industrial potential of all the States through orderly planning for meeting the manpower needs of the economy. These councils are an excellent device for citizen participation in the process of education.

Because of their importance, and because of their potential for improving and expanding vocational-technical education, I am convinced that these councils should, at the very least, be funded at the minimum level. As a matter of fact, the language is apparently mandatory for it states, in regard to funding of State councils, that—

Such amount shall not exceed $150,000 and shall not be less than $50,000.

In the bill approved by the House of Representatives, H.R. 13111, the funds for State advisory councils were approved at the level of $1,680,000 as recommended by the Budget Bureau. My amendment would increase the House approved measure by $820,000. This will enable the State councils to be funded at the minimum level of $50,000 per State.

Mr. President, if the Congress is at all serious about the purposes and duties of these State councils, we must provide funds for them to perform their duties and accept their important responsibilities. It would seem the better part of wisdom to fund these councils at least at the minimum level, or not at all. How can we honestly expect the councils to be responsible when we do not provide the necessary resources?

In terms of the total budget, $820,000 is a small percentage; in terms of the potential for achieving much good, I believe that the Senate could not make an appropriation that is any more important. The State advisory councils should be made fully operational, not half operational as would be the case under the appropriation bill approved in the other body.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and printed, and will be appropriately referred.

The amendment (No. 317) was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF AMENDMENT

AMENDMENT NO. 313

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, Mr. RIBICOFF, Mr. GOODELL, and Mr. HARTKE, I ask unanimous consent that, at the next printing of amendment No. 313 to H.R. 13270, to reform the income tax laws, and for other purposes, which I submitted last Wednesday, the names of the Senator from Colorado (Mr. ALLOTT), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. BIBLE), the Senator from Alaska (Mr. GRAVEL), the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCHWEIKER), and the Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON), be added as cosponsors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pursuant to the order of Wednesday, November 26, 1969, the transaction of morning business is limited to 1 hour. That time has expired.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended for 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE BOXCAR SHORTAGE

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I regret that it is necessary for me to rise once more and call the attention of Congress and the country to the failure of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Last week I pointed out that there was an estimated 40 million bushels of grain on the ground in Nebraska alone. It is placed on the ground because the elevators are filled. The elevators remain full because no boxcars are available.

The midwestern and western railroads build considerable numbers of boxcars. They are loaded with the products of our area and sent east and south. They are not returned promptly. Another railroad will find it cheaper to pay the daily charge for someone else's boxcars, and a shipper will find it to his advantage to keep the car because it is cheaper to pay the daily charge than to build boxcars or to build storage.

About 2 years ago, Congress passed an act and was informed at that time that that act, which was signed by President Johnson, would give the Interstate Commerce Commission the tools necessary to regulate boxcars and see that justice is done to the agricultural areas of our country.

Were the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission kidding us at that time in causing Congress to believe that the legislation enacted would enable them to compel offending railroads to return cars? Or are they deliberately failing to do the job now?

Mr. President, why should we have an Interstate Commerce Commission if it has neither the will nor the courage to regulate in the public interest?

Today I was informed that 70 percent of the boxcars owned by the Burlington Railroad are not in their possession on their lines. Why does not the Interstate Commerce Commission act?

THE FOOD STAMP PROGRAM

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, over the weekend, on national television and in the national press, the junior Senator from South Dakota undertook to assail the President of the United States and other administration officials for opposing a Senate-passed bill containing his amendment to increase the authorization for the food stamp program to $1.25 billion for fiscal 1970, to $2 billion for fiscal 1971, to $2.5 billion for fiscal 1972. This compares to a $610 million appropriation already made for this program for fiscal 1970—more than double the $280 million appropriated for fiscal 1969.

The administration, by its support of the $610 million appropriation for fiscal 1970, is clearly on record in support of very large increases in the food stamp program—to the extent that such increases can be well administered and financed. But it has made it clear that where additional increases cannot be well administered because of the limitations on trained personnel needed to administer a greatly expanded program, or where the fight against inflation would be seriously set back by spending more money than the Treasury would have available, further expansion of the program must be held to $610 million for the current fiscal year, which, as I have pointed out, is more than double the amount for the last fiscal year.

The unreasonableness of the criticism of the President and his administration on this point is highlighted by the recent rollcall vote on the so-called Allen amendment which would have increased the personal exemption, for income tax purposes, from $600 to $1,200, at an estimated cost of $18 billion to the Treasury. This would also have meant that wealthy taxpayers in a 70 percent income tax bracket would have received an $840 tax break for each exemption; whereas taxpayers in a 20-percent tax bracket would have received only a $240 tax break for each exemption.

It is significant, I believe, that the junior Senator from South Dakota and several other members of the Senate who voted for, were paired for, or positioned for the amendment to increase the authorization for the food stamp program to $2.5 billion by 1972 also voted for the Allen amendment. In other words, they put an $18 billion income tax reduction, with the inflation and high interest rates this would promote through budget deficits, on the same level of priority as feeding the hungry.

There has been a lot of talk around Washington about the need to establish priorities, and this does not mean establishing equal priorities, but putting first things first. Negative criticism of the President and his administration should not be permitted to draw the public's attention away from rollcall votes of the critics which would preclude the spending for programs they advocate.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I did not hear all the remarks of the Senator, and he may have pointed out there will be a White House Conference on Food, Nutrition and Health starting tomorrow. It appears there may be an effort on the part of some to deliberately undercut the purpose of this conference. I speak specifically of John R. Kramer, Executive Director of the National Council on Hunger and Malnutrition in the United States. He appeared before our Committee on Agriculture and Forestry earlier this year. I asked him, frankly, if his statement had been prepared by the Democratic National Committee, because it was nothing more than an indictment of this administration, which at that time had been in power only 5 or 6 months.

I would hope that Mr. Kramer and others who find it so easy to criticize would recognize just what progress has been made by this administration in a few short months.

I hope even more we never reach the point that malnutrition becomes a partisan political matter.

I certainly share the view of the Senator from Iowa that the President and the administration are on the right track.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the morning hour be extended for an additional 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Only the Senator's time has expired. The time for the transaction of morning business has been extended to 11:15 a.m.

Mr. MILLER. I ask unanimous consent that only my time be extended for an additional 3 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. There are those, Mr. Kramer and others, who have attacked Members of the other body and members of the House Committee on Agriculture, Republicans and Democrats. I believe there are Members of the House and the Senate who are concerned about hunger now and have been for many years. They are concerned about malnutrition but the problem will not be solved by making it a partisan political issue or by making irresponsible statements.

I am not certain whether yesterday's "Face the Nation" program was timed to undercut the White House Conference on Food, Nutrition, and Health, but point out that months ago CBS had a documentary on hunger in America. After the documentary they set out to prove that it was accurate, because many inaccuracies were discovered.

Mr. MILLER. I thank the Senator from Kansas for his comments. I share his concern that the subject of hunger and malnutrition not be placed in the partisan political arena.

The point I was trying to develop in my comments was that negative criticism of the President by critics whose rollcall votes in the Senate would strap the Treasury so that it could not pay for those programs is not well taken.

If there is a discussion in the White House conference about funding of an expanded program to feed the hungry, I think it had better be in a responsible frame, making clear that this is a first priority and that taking money out of the Treasury through amendments to the tax bill is not the way to handle this kind of priority. Once that is gotten across to the people, perhaps such criticism will be placed in proper perspective.

Mr. DOLE. The chairman of the White House conference is Dr. Jean Mayer, considered by almost everyone to be the leading nutritionist in America. He has a great record, and he is not involved in any partisanship, as has been charged by Mr. Kramer. Dr. Mayer is concerned about the problem, and in trying to solve it and to emphasize what needs to be done in America.

I am inclined to believe that on the CBS program yesterday there may have been an effort, wittingly or unwittingly, to undercut the real purpose of this conference, when considering who the panelists were, the questions, and who the guest was, and to me this is unfortunate.

Mr. MILLER. That program, which I did not see, seems to fit into the pattern of criticism voiced on national television by the junior Senator from South Dakota, which I think is most unfortunate at this time, just as this conference is going to get underway. If we want to keep this matter in a nonpartisan political framework I think criticism at the very beginning of the White House conference is not timely at all, and, of course, it is very irresponsible to level such criticism when the critics themselves have been voting for amendments to the tax bill to cut out the programs they say they advocate.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, yesterday our colleague, the junior Senator from South Dakota (Mr. McGOVERN), attacked the record of President Nixon in dealing with hunger and malnutrition. He accused the administration of "double talk" and "double action." And he accused the administration of blocking hunger legislation in the House of Representatives.

These charges are not true. In fact, the Nixon administration has launched the most far-reaching attack on the problems of hunger and malnutrition in our country's history. The President has accepted the responsibility of eliminating hunger in America for all time. He has proposed major amendments to the food stamp program that will allow that program to provide participants with a nutritionally adequate diet at a cost they can afford. President Nixon has proposed that free food stamps should be available for the very poorest families. The President has gone further and authorized his Secretary of Agriculture to begin a pilot free stamp program in Jasper and Beaufort Counties in South Carolina.

These reforms are not being blocked by the administration. They are being blocked, if at all by a Democrat-controlled Congress.

When fully implemented the President's food stamp program will cost $2.5 billion per year. It will combine with the new assistance available to the poor under the President's family assistance plan as part of the most extensive and basic attack on hard-core hunger and poverty ever proposed.

The record of the present administration in the war on hunger and malnutrition is one we can be proud of. It should not be subject to unfair and misdirected attacks.

The President has made a full commitment to eliminate these serious threats to the health of the Nation. As far back as last June, after very serious and thorough study, the administration proposed legislation to transform the food stamp program into an enlarged and effective weapon against poverty-induced hunger and malnutrition. The budget request for the 1969–70 fiscal year was sharply increased to over $600 million. When fully implemented over the country, this proposal envisioned a program costing about $2.5 billion annually.

Senator McGOVERN's bill, which recently passed the Senate, is simply an enlargement of the administration's bill. Its basic purpose is to provide authority to make major modifications in the present food stamp program. The same purpose and concepts are embodied in the administration's bill. It should not therefore be construed that the administration is less interested in eliminating hunger and malnutrition than is Senator McGOVERN. It does not help, in the final analysis to attack every measure to help the poor simply on the basis that it is inadequate. Rather it is time we got together on a constructive effort to pass the legislation and vote the funds that are needed.

The Senator from South Dakota criticizes the President for not supporting a $2.5 billion food stamp program. The President has proposed such a program. The Senator's own legislation would authorize expenditures of only $2.5 billion on a food stamp program that would cost nearly $6 billion with only two-thirds of the eligible families participating. Is this intended to be a 6-month food stamp program? I just do not know.

The administration has proposed a $2.5 billion food stamp program that will combine with family assistance to attack not only hunger, but the root of hunger—that is poverty. As additional resources become available, family assistance will provide a vehicle for expanding this attack with cash assistance that will not only meet the needs of the poor, but do so with a measure of dignity.

THE PASTORE BROADCASTING BILL

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, S. 2004, popularly known as the Pastore bill, now before the Subcommittee on Communications of the Committee on Commerce, presents one of the most difficult and sensitive problems before any committee of the 91st Congress. The purpose and effect of the bill and its potential for radically changing the nature of the broadcasting industry in the United States are matters on which that subcommittee will be focusing during the coming weeks and months. Whether or not a bill is reported by the subcommittee and then by the committee, the questions involved deserve the attention of every Member of the Senate. A great deal of light is thrown on these questions in an exchange of articles published in the current issue of the New Republic. Prof. Louis L. Jaffe, a professor of law at Harvard and one of the most eminent administrative law experts in the Nation, has written a piece entitled "We Need the Pastore Bill." A response entitled "No, We Don't" has been written by one of the most imaginative, energetic, and intelligent men ever to serve as a member of the Federal Communications Commission, Nicholas Johnson. Since I believe that the articles are worthwhile reading for all Senators and for Members of the House, as well, I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New Republic, Dec. 6, 1969]

WE NEED THE PASTORE BILL

(By Louis L. Jaffe)

The critics of the Federal Communications Commission have been checkmated by Spiro Agnew. Now that he has appropriated their concepts and their terminology—for example, that irrelevance, "the public's airwaves"—they may be compelled to consider the implications of their thinking. For years they have refused to face the problems involved in their demand for government regulation of the quality of broadcasting. They have simply ignored the arguments against it and the procedural proposals for implementing it.

The most recent example is their hosannas for the fatuous decision of an FCC rump (three out of seven commissioners voting affirmative and one negative) in the Boston WHDH case and their outraged denunciations of the Pastore bill.

In WHDH the Commission, overturning its practice of decades—a practice upon which the economics of the broadcasting industry has been built—decided that a broadcaster's license would be up for grabs every three years! It is true that the Communication

Act of 1934 as it was drafted would support such a reading—licenses are renewable every three years. But the understanding of Congress manifested in many ways and the consistent practice of the Commission has been that if a licensee behaved itself it would be renewed. In WHDH there was no finding that the licensee had misbehaved or that its programs were deficient; simply a determination that a competing applicant was preferable because WHDH was owned by a newspaper and it was not. The objective of diversifying the media is absolutely sound, and in an initial contest for a license there is a valid basis for preferring an independent to a newspaper-owned applicant. (WHDH could have been decided on the basis that it was in fact an initial licensing proceeding. The Commission has since indicated that the case is a special one not to be taken broadly. Arguably, this makes the Pastore bill unnecessary.) But to license a newspaper-owned broadcaster and then after the investment is made to forfeit it to a newcomer is inexcusable. It is inequitable and functionally unsound. The obvious riposte was the Pastore bill, which provides that if a licensee has fulfilled its obligations it is entitled to be renewed.

Yet The New York Times and The New Republic ("Pastore's Pet," October 25, 1969) have denounced the Pastore bill. They have resorted to the amazing analogy of an election for public office. An officer must run for reelection, they ask, why not a broadcaster? And why not the New York Times or The New Republic? Scribners? the theaters? the moving picture houses? Oh, but the broadcasters are using the "public airwaves." Well, The New Republic is using the public's mail with its second-class mailing privilege. However, the whole argument is irrelevant. The function of broadcasting is communication and the question is whether a communication industry financed by private capital can be run on a three-year basis. Once the question is asked it appears to be almost rhetorical.

We may have to face the irony that what we now need is precisely something like the Pastore bill. That bill forbids the Commission to consider new applicants unless it first finds that the present licensee has failed to measure up to its responsibilities; the Commission is required to pinpoint the licensee's failures. Without such a bill, the licensee must compete with new applicants, so that he can be defeated on a merely comparative basis. His rival may freely improvise what is needed to establish that his future performance will be superior. Thus, the Commission would have an easy opening for censoring the licensee and keeping him in constant terror.

But there still remains the question whether whatever the sanctions, the quality of broadcasting can and should be controlled by government. For example, Thomas Hoving, chairman of the National Citizens Committee for Broadcasting, has agreed WHDH as an entré for improving the quality of television. It may be possible to isolate cases of particularly outrageous exploitation of sex and violence. A trial examiner of the FCC has indeed recently refused to recommend the renewal of a Los Angeles station. That station day after day has shown motion pictures of the most nauseating character deliberately beamed to the whole family. Yet we are all aware of the basic difficulties of judgment in this area, and of the near impossibility of developing objective standards, particularly of positive quality. And Mr. Agnew's performance should help those who to date have chosen to ignore the problem, to face up to it. Do they really want the bureaucrats of the FCC judging programs?

Is there then no role for government in the improvement of broadcasting? Possibly not a great role but there is a role, and it is better to understand what it may be, rather than to demand what is dangerous or impossible.

Spiro Agnew and FCC Commissioner Nicholas Johnson are agreed on one thing—the high degree of control in the broadcasting industry. Much of this is unavoidable as long as the networks serve significant and valuable functions in newsgathering and expensive entertainment formats. But there are possible ways of reducing network power and of reducing multiple ownerships of the broadcast licenses. We can encourage CATV—the present policy of the FCC is moving in that direction—and of other technical innovations. CATV may solve the scarcity problem; it brings signals into the home by cable rather than over the air and thus could expand enormously the number of channels available. We can maintain competition in these developing areas. We can, in short, seek to promote more competition and more voices in the communications industry.

What about programming responsibility? We cannot do much about quality but we can lay down rules requiring stated minimum amounts of public service programming. Professor Hyman Goldin is proposing a requirement of a certain amount per week, in prime time, of public service programs by the networks. A recent proposal suggests that advertising during children's programs be severely limited. More generally, maximum advertising standards could be established and perhaps the FCC could devise and police a more general definition of excessive commercialism.

This does not exhaust the potentialities of useful government control. But beyond government regulation, we can subject broadcasters to continuous surveillance and criticism. We can encourage the local publics to participate in renewal proceedings, as indeed some of them, particularly the blacks, are now doing. But ultimately there is a limit. We have committed broadcasting to an industry financed by advertising. It is, then, an essentially popular, mass-audience medium. CATV, public and educational broadcasting can provide something for elite audiences as commercial broadcasting does now in its news, sports, occasional public service programs and sometimes high-level entertainment (vide, Midsummer Night's Dream, Vladimir Horowitz). It is encouraging that recently public and educational television is substantially increasing its appeal; polls show that four out of every 10 households watch it. Anthony Lewis recently noted that even in England—half commercial, half public TV—programming is becoming more and more "popular." As long as the masses support TV by taxes or advertising revenue, it is idle to expect it to be much different from what it is today. We should strive for improvement and for diversification within the limits of the possible.

NO, WE DON'T

(By Nicholas Johnson)

Few men have contributed as much scholarship and creativity to the field of administrative law as my friend and former colleague in this vineyard, Professor Louis L. Jaffe. It is, therefore, with considerable hesitation that I respond to The New Republic's request that I "answer" his article.

There is much in Professor's Jaffe's argument with which I agree. I agree that there is a "role for government in the improvement of broadcasting"; that "the objective of diversifying the media is absolutely sound"; that "there are possible ways of reducing network power and of reducing multiple ownerships of the broadcast licenses." I agree that "we can encourage CATV . . . [and] promote more competition and more voices." I of course agree that "we should strive for improvement and for diversification within the limits of the possible." I agree that "we cannot do much about quality," that we do not "want the bureaucrats of the FCC judging programs," but that "we can lay down rules requiring stated minimum amounts of public service programming"—including network "prime time . . . public service programs." I agree that "public and educational broadcasting can provide something" in addition to commercial fare. I agree that "maximum advertising standards could be established," and that "advertising during children's programs [should] be severely limited." I agree that "local publics" should be permitted (he says "encouraged") to participate in renewal proceedings."

I most emphatically disagree, however, that "what we now need is precisely something like the Pastore Bill." Let's begin with a few basics.

Virtually every country in the world treats broadcasting as an activity possessed of unique public responsibilities. In many places—Scandinavia among them—all stations are owned and programmed by an agency of government or a public corporation. Other countries have supplemented their public broadcasting facilities with the competition of privately owned, commercial stations (subject to government regulation). Japan is an example. When England supplemented its world-famous BBC service with "Independent Television," the new stations continued to be publicly owned. They are merely programmed, during portions of the week, by various programming companies licensed for fixed terms by the Independent Television Authority (ITA). (Unlike the Federal Communications Commission, the ITA has been quite freely encouraging competition by refusing to renew some companies' authority.)

These special responsibilities of broadcasters are based upon a number of considerations. (1) Only one broadcast signal can operate on a given frequency, at a fixed time and place; some rules are necessary. (2) Presumably the rules could have been evolved by courts (as we regulate the use of air space for buildings and other purposes); but it has been generally conceded that administrative regulation of some kind seems to have worked better. (3) There tends to be a much greater demand for broadcast stations than the supply. This is due in part to the technological limits upon the number of stations in a given advertising market, and the resultant opportunity for monopoly or oligopoly profits. (4) Most countries have concluded that it is inappropriate to permit the "homesteading" of this public resource through ownership from use. They have, instead, utilized public licensing when private use is permitted at all. (5) They also recognize the awesome potential of such a powerful instrument of enlightenment or propaganda to do a nation's people good or ill. They recognize that in any country in which public opinion is relevant to public policy the power of those who control the mass media is far greater than that of elected officials. (6) Most countries have not limited profits, or exacted significant fees, for the use of frequencies. They have, instead, established some minimal standards of fair play and insisted that the public be repaid through public service programming; service above and beyond what profit-maximizing in the marketplace would produce.

Such concerns and standards have their analog in the history of broadcast regulation in the United States. During the debates on the Radio Act of 1927, and the Communications Act of 1934, fears were often expressed that (as Congressman Johnson put it in 1927) "American thought and American politics will be largely at the mercy of those who operate these stations." A six-month license term was originally specified.

Later (as the industry gained political power) this was extended to one year and then three years. (Recently the industry has been urging—and former FCC Chairman Hyde supported—a five year term.) Even the National Association of Broadcasters acknowledged in the early years that: "It is the manifest duty of the licensing authority in passing upon applications for licenses or the renewal thereof, to determine whether or not the applicant is rendering or can render an adequate public service. Such service necessarily includes broadcasting of a considerable proportion of programs devoted to education, religion, labor, agricultural, and similar activities concerned with human betterment." The FCC was established as the people's representative to see to it that the licensees would, indeed, "render adequate public service."

For a variety of reasons the system hasn't worked. As in so many other instances of government "regulation" of an industry, the FCC has performed as the ally of the broadcasters in every light skirmish with the public. The FCC once decided that a radio station with more than 30 minutes of commercials per hour was serving the public interest. It approved the renewal of a station that quite candidly reported it proposed to program no news, and no public affairs. It first refused public participation, and then ignored protests about racist programming from a station in Mississippi—only to be roundly reversed, repeatedly, by the United States Court of Appeals. Seldom has the FCC found even the most exclusive monopoly control of the mass media to violate the public interest—notwithstanding the vigorous protests of the Antitrust Division of the United States Department of Justice. It examined the record of a station guilty of bilking advertisers out of $6000 in fraudulent transactions—while on a one-year, probationary status for similar offenses earlier—and found that the station had, nonetheless, "minimally met the public interest standard." And recently the Commission showed its reluctance to enforce even its technical and business standards, when it refused to consider license revocation for a licensee who had been charged with not paying his employees, stealing news, ordering his engineer to make fraudulent entries in the station's logbook, operating with an improperly licensed engineer and 87 other technical violations over a three-year period. Despite the questions raised about technical operation, the extent of licensee control, and financial qualifications, the Commission decided to keep the licensee in business.

The broadcasters, meanwhile, look at this record of FCC performance and are concerned that the standards have been too onerous. They certainly have never, to my knowledge, complained that the kind of intellectually corrupt decisions just mentioned are as much of a disservice to the industry as to the public—as I believe to be the case. The industry has for decades deluded itself into believing, as National Association of Broadcasters Chairman Willard Walbridge put it on "Face the Nation" the other day, that "the public says that the programming is fine . . . that they like broadcasting pretty much he way it is."

This refusal to face facts has been, in my judgment, the greatest single handicap broadcasters confront. It is a blind spot that has been created and purveyed to the great profit of the broadcasting subgovernment in Washington (Broadcasting magazine's full page ads and collection of downtown real estate; the NAB's rising dues, lobbying funds, handsome expense accounts, and new multi-million-dollar building). But it has led the broadcasters themselves—jovial, prosperous, martini in hand—down a jungle road into the largest ambush from an outraged citizenry ever confronted by an American industry.

I have been warning broadcasters since I came on the Commission in 1966 that they were going to pay a very severe price for ignoring the rising chorus of complaints from their audience. A growing minority of responsible broadcasters have responded. They recognize their obligations, and their problems, and are trying to reform. But an uncomfortably large number still practice haughty, arrogant disregard of public, critics, government, professional standards—everything, indeed, but ever-escalating profits.

Virtually every aspect of television is under attack from some quarter. Television does to your mind what cotton candy does to your body. It attracts your attention, makes you want it, and then leaves you with nothing but an empty feeling and a toothache. The resulting frustration and anger are manifest in many ways. Some people are concerned about the violence on television. (They include the Eisenhower Commission on Violence; the chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Communications, Senator Pastore; the Surgeon General; and the National Institute of Mental Health—along with thousands of scholars and parents.) Some complain about television's impact upon our moral values, the obscenity, and so forth. Some believe the newsmen are biased—either for the establishment (Abbie Hoffman) or against it (Vice President Agnew). Blacks complain about the failure of the media to serve their needs and interests (picket signs read, "Soul Music Is Not Enough"), and to employ qualified minority group members (the industry's record is one of the worst in American business—the Department of Justice, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and the Community Relations Service are all concerned). Mothers are angered by the lack (or impact) of children's programming and commercials. (Action for Children's Television recently picketed WHDH in Boston for cancelling part of "Captain Kangeroo.") Action on Smoking and Health is attempting to enforce the fairness doctrine requirement that stations carry anti-smoking spots—something the FCC refuses to do. (Broadcasters argued to the Supreme Court that the requirement violated their First Amendment "right" to keep information about health hazards from their audience. They did not prevail.) Local groups in Atlanta, Chicago and Seattle protested the loss of classical music from radio. My mail comes from all age groups, all educational and economic levels, all sections of the country, and all positions on the political spectrum. That television needs some improvement, and that the profiteers of the public airwaves are not living up to their responsibilities, are propositions for which Agnew's army and the "effete intellectual snobs" march arm in arm.

What the people have discovered during the past few years is that writing letters—to advertisers, networks, stations, and FCC—while helpful, is not enough. Looking about for alternative remedies—short of bombing the RCA building—they have seized upon "the fairness doctrine" and the license renewal process.

The requirements of the fairness doctrine are loose. It does not require the presentation of any particular spokesman. It only requires that a broadcaster be "fair" in his presentation of all points of view on controversial issues of public importance. If not, any citizen can file a "fairness complaint" with the FCC. The complaint must be acted upon. If it is accepted, the broadcaster—and all others like him—must present the omitted point of view. If rejected, the complaining citizen can appeal to the United States Court of Appeals and ask that the FCC ruling be reversed.

But many complaints are not covered by the fairness doctrine: minimal quantities of local programming, excessive commercialization, failure to carry network documentaries, and so forth. And citizens unwilling to have their legitimate protests treated like junk mail soon found relief in the FCC's licenses renewal process.

In 1927 and 1934 the Congress purposefully provided that an FCC license would only be "for the use . . . but not the ownership" of the assigned frequency. The license would be for a term. After that term the FCC could refuse to renew; it could grant the license to another party. The licensee's relation to the government was to be very much like that of a highway contractor—he is free to bid against others for an extension of the profitable relationship, but he is not entitled to an additional term as of right. The US Court of Appeals has said he must, like a public official, literally "run on his record"—an analogy Professor Jaffe professes to find "amazing."

All that is different today from thirty years ago is that citizens' groups all across the country have dusted off this old legal machinery, found the "push-to-start" button, and have begun to make it work as Congress intended. License renewal challenges are now pending in New York, Los Angeles, Boston—and other cities. It is not, as Professor Jaffe says, that the Commission has recently come up with a whimsical decision "that a broadcaster's license would be up for grabs every three years!" It is rather, as he goes on to explain, "that the Communications Act of 1934 as it was drafted would support such a reading."

The broadcasting industry's response has been to say, in effect, that "all these public rights were acceptable so long as no one knew about them or used them; now that they do we must have some protection." It is rather like a businessman supporting the theory of small claims court until claims are filed against him.

In fact the broadcasting industry, and Professor Jaffe, are premature in their concern. For all the talk, the FCC has yet to transfer a single license from a broadcaster to a protesting group because of poor programming performance. (WHDH is easily distinguishable, as the Commission pointed out in a subsequent opinion, and as Professor Jaffe knows. KHJ has not yet been decided by the Commission. WLBT is still on remand from the court. The other cases are in various stages of development.)

There are 7500 stations in this country. All the licenses in a given state come up for renewal at the same time. With three-year terms, this means roughly 2500 a year. Even if the FCC were to take away two or three licenses a year—something it has yet to do during its 42-year history—we would still be providing rubber stamp renewals to 99.9 percent of the stations. Professor Jaffe poses the question "whether a communication industry financed by private capital can be run on a three-year basis." Given an industry-wide average 100 percent rate of return annually on depreciated tangible investment, and a 99.9 percent (or better) probability of license renewal, I would agree with Professor Jaffe that "once the question is asked it appears to be almost rhetorical." At the least, it is scarcely grounds for Professor Jaffe's concern that the "Commission will have an easy opening for censoring the licensee and keeping him in constant terror." (The Commission has repeatedly made clear its unanimous position that it will not second-guess its licensee's programming content, whether Democrats complain about coverage of the 1968 Convention, or Republicans complain about comments following Persident Nixon November 3 Vietnam speech.)

The Pastore bill is a three sentence bill. It provides, in pertinent part, that ". . . the Commission . . . may not consider the application of any other person for the facilities for which renewal is sought. . . . If the Commission determines . . . that a grant . . . would not be in the public interest . . . applications . . . by other parties may then be accepted. . . ." In short, the Commission would be precluded by law from accepting the assistance of the people with the greatest incentive to evaluate whether "a grant . . . would not be in the public interest"—namely, those who stand to gain economically by obtaining the station if they can convince the FCC the broadcaster's license should not be renewed.

Let us assume for a moment that there may be a kernel of legitimate concern buried beneath the broadcasting industry's pile of propaganda, irresponsibility, public relations, arrogance, greed, political power, and general confusion. Let us assume that there are responsible broadcasters with a spectacular record of local and public-service programming who are frightened because any disgruntled member of their audience can throw them into a burdensome and expensive hearing. Let's say they believe that during that hearing their performance will be measured against standards that have never been articulated.

In the first place, the outstanding broadcaster has little to fear. He knows the people of his community and they know him. He heads off legitimate complaints before they become serious. He is seeking out representatives from all segments of his audience, including potential protestors, even more than they are looking for him. He knows such an approach is just good, audience-building business—as well as public service. Any group seriously looking for a license to challenge is going to go after the station with the lousiest record in town, not his station. In the second place, there is no reason why the FCC need hold long, useless, harassing hearings. Administrative practice is flexible enough to permit the FCC to draft hearing issues tightly, and to use informal pre-hearing procedures, to enable the frivolous cases to be disposed of quickly. (In fact, the most innovative current development has been the negotiated "settlements" in Texarkana and Rochester between outraged citizens and local broadcasters. Renewal hearings were contemplated, and then dropped, in exchange for concessions by the stations. This innovative means of self help involved little burden on the broadcaster.) Finally, if anyone in or out of the industry is seriously interested in helping to draft standards for the comparative evaluation of stations' license renewal their contribution will be most welcome. So far Commissioner Cox and I have been unable to pick up a single additional vote for the proposition that stations proposing less than one percent public affairs programming ought to be asked why they believe that serves the interests of their local community! We have followed that with our book-length studies; and proposed standards, in the Oklahoma, New York, and now Mid-Atlantic renewals. Some standards were suggested by Professor Jaffe (which we have been using for some time in slightly altered form). As he quite correctly points out, the fact that it is virtually impossible to evaluate quantitatively the quality of a given program does not mean that it is impossible to evaluate the programming performance of a broadcaster.

We can all look forward with Professor Jaffe, to a day when there is greater diversity and competition in the audio and visual programming product. The Public Broadcasting Corporation, subscription television, cable television, direct satellite-to-home broadcasting, common carrier channels, standards for "public access" to the mass media in accordance with the Supreme Court's Red Lion decision, FM and UHF station development, more educational stations, community supported stations like Pacifica, home access to audio and video libraries of programs, home video recorders, and tape and disc players—all these developments, and more hold out hope for the future. If the totality of the broadcasters' product were truly offered to the audience as magazines are today—subscriptions, newsstand sales, and libraries—much, if not all, of the need for program performance regulation would vanish. But that day it not yet here. It is not even near. And until it is we are left with the contrast between the intention of the drafters of the 1927 and 1934 Acts and the current practice of the FCC and the broadcasting industry.

The FCC has demonstrated conclusively, for all to see, its inability to serve the public interest without the active participation of public groups. Chief Justice Burger knew this, and said as much is the first United Church of Christ case (involving WLBT in Jackson, Mississippi). The broadcasters knew it; they are much more comfortable with their friends at the FCC than when confronting their hostile audience. Senator Pastore and Professor Jaffe ought to know it.

The broadcasting lobbyists, Senator Pastore, Professor Jaffe, and other supporters of S. 2004 ought to know that, after the rhetoric is cut away, the net effect of the Pastore Bill will be to remove from the people the only thin small reed to which they now cling in their self-defense struggle against the combined force of the broadcasting industry and the FCC. They ought to know that its passage will leave a frustrated people with no recourse, except to engage in more violent protests and other actions that serve the interests of no one.

NEW DIRECTIONS IN THE PACIFIC AREA

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, on November 5 the junior Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON) made an important speech in Seattle urging that U.S. policy toward mainland China be put on "a less rigid, more sensible footing."

Senator JACKSON proposes two immediate steps: First, renewal of the invitation to the Peking regime to join in the 25-nation arms control meetings in Geneva; and second, active pressing of Peking for the reopening of the bilateral United States-China ambassadorial talks, either in Warsaw or at another agreed site. Among other agenda items for the renewed talks, Senator JACKSON proposes greater United States-Chinese people-to-people exchanges including reporters, scholars, scientists, and cultural performers.

Senator JACKSON recognizes that we cannot guarantee a favorable response by Peking to these initiatives, but he argues that a less rigid U.S. policy, which while respecting American treaty obligations in the area, leaves open the way for a positive Chinese response, should increase the chances of more normal relations between our two Governments if not in the immediate future, at least over the longer term.

I recommend this address to all Senators.

I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW DIRECTIONS IN THE PACIFIC AREA

(By Senator HENRY M. JACKSON before the Rotary Club of Seattle, Nov. 5, 1969)

I am delighted to be with you this noon and I am honored to share in this program.

Three times in the past generation the United States has found itself involved in costly wars in the Pacific area. If this painful experience has any lesson for us today, it is that peace and stability in that area depend very heavily on what the great powers do, and notably on the coherence and rationality of our own foreign policies.

In the Pacific Northwest, we have always felt close ties to the countries of the Western Pacific. Our economic and cultural relationships have special significance.

At a time when much of our policy in the Pacific is in a state of flux, I am persuaded that we can make a contribution in attempting to think, and think hard, about our policies, and develop new, forward-looking approaches for the years ahead.

I believe it would contribute to peace and stability in the Western Pacific if Communist China, comprising over seven hundred million people, could begin to re-enter the international community and place its international relations on a more normal, stable plane.

Whether the Peking leadership is seeking opportunities to move in this direction remains an open question.

The Peking regime a few weeks ago commemorated its twentieth anniversary. At present the Chinese people appear to have weathered the worst of the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution. The Red Guard excesses and the chaos that characterized the period from mid-1966 to late 1968 have given way to some modicum of internal order and stability, albeit under military control. While the Peking regime has continuously aided and abetted Hanoi in South Vietnam, there is evidence that the regime's own military policies remain cautious and of a low risk nature: the refrain is constantly reiterated, "We shall not attack unless we are attacked."

Also, there are some indicators of a new preoccupation in Peking with its diplomatic posture. The Chinese have recently entered into discussion with the Soviet Union regarding the border issue that only a few months ago was leading toward a major Sino-Soviet confrontation—and which may yet end up that way. As for its attitude toward the United States, the Mainland government has evidenced some downgrading in its estimate of the nature of the so-called "threat" from America. Hints persist of a revived interest on the part of the Chinese in reopening the bilateral Ambassadorial talks with us, which Peking broke off in February this year.

Meanwhile, there is the continued progress of the Chinese in developing a nuclear-missile capability. The Chinese detonated two nuclear devices in late September—one underground and one above ground. In fact, Peking's decision to develop nuclear weapons may well be proving counterproductive in that it has encouraged some other governments in the area to consider the indigenous development of nuclear weapons and has made public acceptance of such weapons more tolerable. These are not developments which would be welcomed by any leadership in Peking. Time may well see a changing attitude on its part toward arms control arrangements. It is pretty obvious that sometime, somehow, the Mainland Chinese regime will have to join in the negotiations on arms control if it and the rest of the world are going to have peace and security.

In any event, as far as United States policy toward Mainland China is concerned I believe we should get it on a less-rigid, more-sensible footing.

The U.S. Government has already taken a few hesitant steps to ease exchanges between the Chinese and American peoples. But more are possible, and these may in turn contribute to a more substantive exchange between our respective governments. We cannot guarantee that a favorable response will be the case; we cannot predict how Mao Tse-tung or his successors will respond to U.S. overtures. But a new U.S. policy, which while respecting American treaty obligations in the area, leaves open the way for a positive Chinese response, should increase the chances of more normal relations between our two governments if not in the immediate future, at least over the longer term.

I propose that we take two steps immediately:

1. We should renew the invitation to the Peking regime to join in the 25-nation arms control meetings in Geneva. Negotiations on arms control are going to be long and difficult. This isn't the sort of thing that can be negotiated in a month or six months or a year. But we shouldn't have to waste any time talking about the desirability of Mainland China's participation in such efforts.

2. We should press Peking for the reopening of the bilateral U.S.-China Ambassadorial talks, either in Warsaw or at another agreed site. At the reopening of the Ambassadorial talks the United States ought to be prepared to make constructive suggestions for discussion and negotiation. As I see it these suggestions should include:

The start of mutual U.S.-Chinese exchanges of reporters, scholars, scientists and cultural performers.

The regularization of postal and telecommunication problems.

The improvement of trade relations between U.S. and Mainland China, including the mutual reduction of barriers to trade.

The subject of Mainland Chinese participation in the United Nations and other international bodies on terms that would not exclude the Republic of China on Formosa.

The approach I am proposing is in the interest of the United States. But it is also in the interest of Mainland China. It is time that both the Americans and the Mainland Chinese recognized that they have a mutual interest in, and a mutual responsibility for, peace and stability in the Western Pacific area.

Furthermore, I believe this approach would have a broad appeal internationally and would be supported by our allies and others in the Asia-Pacific area. In effect, we would be signaling the United States willingness to explore with Mainland China directly and with greater concreteness than before the possibilities for peace and stability in the Western Pacific.

In recent months, significant steps have been taken to start winding down the Vietnam war and to reduce American casualties. We are all intensely concerned that progress toward peace in Vietnam be continued in the months ahead. The question at issue in the debate over Vietnam is not whether to end the Vietnam war. Everyone I know wants to do that. The question is how to do it?

Many Americans are now preoccupied with the problem of getting out of Vietnam. But we have to be concerned with more than that. We have to be concerned with the kind of world we will be living in after we have withdrawn and with the effect of how we withdraw on our ability to deal with the problems of the post-Vietnam world.

As I see it, American disengagement from Vietnam must be phased and orderly, or our foreign policy problems will become more difficult and more unmanageable than ever.

A precipitous withdrawal, a disorganized and haphazard retreat in the face of the recalcitrance we have met at the negotiating table in Paris, would have fateful consequences for the future of this nation and of individual liberty. President Nixon described those consequences in his speech this week. Our adversaries would figure they have us on the run, and they would not hesitate to take advantage of it by pushing their luck in other trouble spots in Asia, in the Middle East, and in Europe. A hasty retreat in Vietnam would disconcert and destabilize other countries to which we have made commitments— for example, South Korea, the Philippines, Japan, not to mention our partners in NATO. And a disorderly withdrawal would not bring peace in Vietnam. Fighting, doubtless bloodier than we have yet seen, would go on and on.

The key to peace in Vietnam is a careful, deliberate and phased replacement of U.S. troops by those in the Army of the Republic of Vietnam. If the South Vietnamese are better prepared today to defend themselves, it is because we have secured for them time in which to build a trained and organized and equipped self-defense force with which to meet the challenge from the North.

In spite of our best efforts, of course, we cannot, from the other side of the world, guarantee the future of the people of South Vietnam. What we can and should do is everything possible consistent with our national interest to leave in the hands of the South Vietnamese the capacity to determine their own future, in short, self-determination.

IDAHO NEWSPAPERS ARE NOT SILENT ABOUT OUR VIETNAM POLICY

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, on November 3 of this year, the President introduced a new entity into American politics. By invoking the silent majority—a group which would, presumably, disappear in the very act of asserting itself—the President sought acceptance for his policy of "Vietnamizing" the war.

A number of Idaho newspapers have commented editorially on the President's speech. I ask unanimous consent that three highly perceptive editorials from the Idaho press be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Emmett (Idaho) Messenger-Index Nov. 6, 1969]

DUNKIRK

An unprecedented publicity buildup extending over several weeks in advance of President Nixon's Vietnam speech Monday night had created a sense of high anticipation throughout the nation and throughout the world. People had come to believe, or half hope and half believe, that the President would come up with some master stroke of genius that would point the way out of the long and weary war.

The President in essence said three things, all of which have been said before.

1. He said all efforts at negotiation—public, private and secret—have been completely fruitless. He indicated little confidence in future negotiations.

2. He said the United States will not make precipitate withdrawal, leaving South Vietnam and the Saigon government defenseless against the blood bath that would be sure to follow.

3. He said the United States will withdraw on an orderly and flexible, but unannounced, timetable as the South Vietnamese become strong enough to defend themselves. The timetable, he indicated, will be controlled in part by the level of enemy activity and by the rapidity with which the South Vietnamese can be trained and equipped to do their own fighting.

That, said President Nixon, is the solution for ending the war. He said it will work.

It was a great speech, both in delivery and in clarification of official U.S. policy.

By implication, it eloquently expressed three additional points.

1. That the United States has no plan and no hope for defeating the Viet Cong and North Vietnam in battle.

2. That the United States has no intention of abandoning or forcing a change in the corrupt Thieu-Ky regime in Saigon.

3. That the process of disengagement might be very slow and costly, running an indeterminate number of years into the future. The President was very careful in references to withdrawal of ground combat forces, with no reference to support troops of naval and air power.

Another major point was expressed by implication more eloquently than ever before and that is the extreme difficulty and complexity of disengaging from a war that the nation cannot win and will not lose.

For all its eloquence, however, the President's speech omitted the overriding, controlling element in the war. That is the viewpoint of the Viet Cong and North Vietnam and the world powers friendly to them.

That viewpoint is that the war is an internal struggle of liberation that eventually will be won, at any cost necessary, and that the United States is the foreign aggressor. The President and his advisers have spoken brilliantly of what the United States will, and will not, do. They have failed miserably in their unspoken analysis of what the enemy will do.

They have underestimated tragically the tenacity of an enemy that will fight endlessly against all odds for what they believe is right and just. They have underestimated the continuing exploitation by Russia and China of an unparalleled opportunity to embarrass and hurt the United States. It is naive indeed to think that Russia will let the South Vietnamese win when and if the United States completes the phased withdrawal promised by the President.

So President Nixon's much-heralded speech in the end will please none except North Vietnam and Russia, who can bide their time until their day will come. It will displease those who persist in the belief that this nation can and should win its war in Vietnam. It will displease those who believe the United States was wrong in ever going to Vietnam in the first place and compounds the wrong every day it remains there.

The very least the President could have done in his speech would be to pledge aid and support for the establishment of a representative government in South Vietnam. The Thieu-Ky regime is the enemy of the South Vietnamese people no less than the Viet Cong, as were the military dictatorships we sponsored and supported before it.

So what indeed will the VC, North Vietnam and Russia do now that the United States is definitely committed to pull out at some unspecified time in the future?

Two immediate options are open to them.

They can sustain and perhaps even intensify the military pressure in the hope that the unceasing cost and highest possible American casualties will spawn really serious disorders in the United States.

Or more probably, they can reduce the level of hostilities, thus hastening the American disengagement while they gather their forces and plan for the takeover of South Vietnam at an appropriate time.

The eventual outcome will be the same. The unknown is when.

When this era is studied in the history books of the future, it will be recorded that the United States destroyed South Vietnam, and perhaps other areas of southeast Asia as well, by sending hundreds of thousands of troops to their defense—by making an American war on the Asian mainland. No more tragic blunder has ever befallen this nation.

As was proved in Indonesia, and as would be proved in Thailand and Malaysia if left to their own devices, these nations could work out their own destinies were it not for the pauperization of spirit imposed by a foreign power assuming their own responsibilities.

President Nixon did not start the Vietnam war, but he and most other Americans supported it from the start. It is the President's personal tragedy, and the nation's tragedy as well, that there is no really satisfactory way to end it.

Americanization of the Vietnam struggle was a mistake from the start, a terrible mistake. It still is. The damage is irrevocable. The wounds cannot begin to heal until it is over and done.

President Nixon should withdraw unconditionally and immediately. It is the only way to salvage national pride and pave the way for greater world order. The withdrawal should be as rapid as logistics and the physical protection of the last contingents to leave will permit.

NIXON SPEAKS FROM JOHNSON'S SCRIPT

The failure of Lyndon Johnson as President was a failure to be honest with his constituents. There are complex and elaborate reasons for that failure, but the point is that he did fail in this respect and that as a consequence the nation became divided and severe damage was done.

Richard Nixon is probably acting for different reasons, but he is acting in the same way; he is being less than candid, less than honest, with his constituents. The results cannot be good.

In his much-anticipated speech of November 3, the President fell back on the bankrupt excuses of the Johnson years—the claim that we cannot let people down by being defeated in Vietnam. In point of fact we have been defeated in Vietnam, if defeat is defined as a failure to obtain our objectives; the smart move now is to cut our losses, get out before much more blood is shed.

We agree with the President that a precipitate withdrawal would cause more bloodshed than it would prevent, and so a certain amount of delay is acceptable, provided the delay is not indefinite and the withdrawal continues at a rapid rate. There is little if any excuse to still be in Vietnam when 1971 begins.

We are convinced that President Nixon made up his mind as long ago as last spring to withdraw all our forces step by step. His mistake was that he did not announce this intention to the world. If he now continues this plan, it will appear that he was pushed into it by the Vietnam Moratorium demonstrators, and the reaction will be bad. And if he comes to believe his own rhetoric and fails to withdraw, the meaningless violence will go on and on, and the division in America will become worse and worse.

Mr. Nixon not only read from one of LBJ's old speeches; he also fell back on one of his own worst old vices: he talked out of both sides of his mouth. At one point he could say that he would not break faith with "the silent majority" which supports his policy of letting the war drag on. Yet at another point he could say that the easy political course would have been to withdraw immediately when he first became President. He did not explain how immediate withdrawal and continued war can both be the will of the people—nor did he say why it is dishonorable to follow the popular course in January, but honorable to follow the popular course in November.

For the sake of peace, Mr. Nixon should probably be permitted his secrecy, his doubletalk, and his pretense, just so long as he gets the troops out of the war. But it would be useful if he could and would do something along the way to heal the national split; if he could, for example, more forcefully and in his own name acknowledge the efforts of the Moratorium backers are making for peace. President Nixon pulled the rug out from under his Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare in order to please a pressure group as small as the American Medical Association. Surely he could do the same thing to a lesser man—Spiro Agnew—in order to please a larger and more responsible group—the Moratorium demonstrators.

[From the Lewiston (Idaho) Morning Tribune, Nov. 4, 1969]

A JINGOISTIC UNILATERAL WITHDRAWAL

President Nixon's address to the nation last night on the Vietnam war produced little more than a restatement of his existing plan for ending the conflict on his own time schedule.

There were no breakthroughs, no surprises and no hope for a dramatic and sudden conclusion. But the speech was a masterful and probably successful political performance calculated to invigorate American faith in his role as commander-in-chief, regain control of the nation and snatch the initiative from those who would have peace tomorrow at any price. He may have bought some time.

Domestically, his remarks were a mixture of the responsible and the irresponsible.

The address was responsible to the extent that it laid out coherently what his policy is. It communicated. Some of the speakers who addressed Moratorium Day audiences across the nation Oct. 15 criticized the President for not taking steps he had already taken. The blame for those incidents must be shared by the speakers in question and by Mr. Nixon for failing to make his position clear enough to compromise the credibility of critics who don't do their homework.

After his address of last night there can now be no mistaking the President's position. Agree or not, it is clear what Mr. Nixon intends to do. He should report to the people more often.

But the President courted a rash response in calling for a specific strain of emotional support that can only intensify, rather than quiet, the screaming of political factions and parochial generations against one another.

In one breath he differed with his immoderate vice president in conceding the integrity and national devotion of his critics. Mr. Nixon acknowledged that "honest and patriotic Americans" have differed with administration policy. He even declared his respect for the "idealism" of the young who have led the attack on his war posture.

But in the next breath he urged Americans to be united for peace and "against defeat." He said "only Americans" can defeat and humiliate this nation, not the North Vietnamese or the Viet Cong. And he called for "the silent majority" to help win the peace and avert the defeat by making their sentiments known.

The tone was temperate. The message was inflammatory. It amounted to an invitation to the nuts on the right to meet the nuts on the left in the streets. The President cannot have failed to realize that his remarks amount to urging simultaneous counterdemonstrations against the second Moratorium Nov. 14–15.

It's a free country, and everyone can speak his mind for or against the war, but the juxtaposition of Mr. Nixon's words invite a specific response to a specific opinion on a specific day. The President is not a man who would knowingly foster political street battles, but in asking "the silent majority" to make their sentiments known, he naively set the stage for a Nov. 14–15 conflict.

Since the speech covered no new ground, its style and strategy seem more significant than its reiterated message. But the message, though repetitive, was plain for the first time. And while the hawks are girding for the opportunity to put the peacemakers in their place, the doves should not lose sight of one encouraging aspect of the policy Mr. Nixon enunciated last night more clearly than he has before:

Whether it is fast enough or based on sound reasons, the fact is that the President is ending the war in Vietnam. While there was some vague threats of counterescalation, the President said, virtually, that he will end the war no matter what the other side does. He described a blank wall on the diplomatic front, offered no hope that Hanoi will become more reasonable and still went on to say that he will bring the war to an end "regardless of what happens on the diplomatic front."

He described the operation in jingoistic euphemisms, but what his plan amounts to is turning the war over to the South Vietnamese whether the South Vietnamese want it or not. Only the pace of American withdrawal, not the intention, can be affected by developments at the peace table and on the battlefield.

It is one thing for the doves to complain that Mr. Nixon clings to the domino-theory slogans of the Johnson administration; it is another to contend inaccurately that his approach is the same as Mr. Johnson's.

Clearly his policy is to extract America soon from the war and call it a victory. That differs only semantically and in pace from the dove position of extracting Americans from the war immediately and calling it a sobering experience. Unlike Mr. Johnson, Mr. Nixon is ending the war, albeit at a speed consistent with his own political image and with occasional overtones of the Old Nixon.

Mr. Nixon is steadfastly following a policy of unilateral withdrawal while calling it by other names and pretending to reject that course.

Ending the war is the correct course, it is what his critics wants and it will conclude this bloody business quite soon. Nothing can alter the course if the peace movement can exercise the good sense not to give Mr. Nixon too many Agnewish lumps as he grimly leads this nation to something finer than meddling in the internal affairs of a corrupt land whose most sinister elements never were a real threat to the United States.

YOUNG DETROIT MUSICIAN WINS ACCLAIM IN ITALY

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I am pleased to invite attention to the latest chapter in the success story of a remarkable young Detroiter.

Mr. James Frazier, though still not 30 years of age, has won international acclaim for his contributions in the field of fine music.

Two weeks ago, this brilliant young man became the first American to win the coveted Cantelli prize at the La Scala Opera House in Milan, Italy. The prize, which is awarded to promising conductors of symphonic music, was established in the name of a protege of Toscanini, Guido Cantelli, who died in a 1956 airplane crash.

Mr. Frazier's achievement is notable from many standpoints, one of which is that he is an American who happens to be black.

America has good reason to be proud of this young maestro.

I am sure we will be hearing much more of him as time goes on.

Mr. President, an article about Mr. Frazier, written by John Askins, was published in the Detroit Free Press of Sunday, November 23, 1969. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BLACK MAESTRO ENDS LONG TREK TO PODIUM

(By John Askins)

The workers at Milana La Scala called out in Italian, "Good morning, Maestro," and bowed deferentially. It puzzled the handful of American tourists standing around.

Why were the doormen and so forth being so, you know, emotional about this young black guy, they asked each other.

It didn't bother James Frazier though. Hardly anybody knew even who he was in Detroit, his home town; he certainly didn't expect Americans to recognize him now in another country.

Besides, he had just won the Cantelli

Prize the day before, and nothing could get under his skin. And tomorrow night, he would be standing at the La Scala podium, his baton upraised, an expectant hush behind him, and he had a lot to think about. La Scala audiences are among the toughest in the world.

So he smiled and said, "Buon giorno" in his broken Italian and went in to rehearse the orchestra. One thing at a time.

When Frazier made his debut with the Detroit Symphony in 1964, he gave himself five years to get somewhere in the music world.

"If I hadn't made it by the time I was 30," he says now, "I was gonna go back to medical school. I didn't want to be 35, 40, 50 and still, you know, making it."

Last week, at 29½, he won the prestigious Cantelli Prize and the important agents began taking a serious interest in him for the first time. It won't be automatic, but his future looks bright.

"It was just a combination of fortuitous circumstances," he said later in his quiet, polite way. Then he broke into a wide grin. "But I just got in under the wire, didn't I? I'll be 30 in May."

Frazier started his music career at the age of 5 ,when he began taking piano lessons at the Detroit Conservatory.

He performed at school and in churches around Detroit all during his childhood and at 14 took over as choir director at People's Community Church. After graduating from Northwestern High School he enrolled at the University of Michigan, planning to get a degree in music.

But he became discouraged about his future as a serious black musician in the mostly white world of classical music, so he decided to become a physician. He graduated from Wayne State with a chemistry degree, applied to Howard Medical University School and was accepted.

Fortunately, before he left for Howard one of his former music teachers came down from Ann Arbor to hear a performance at People's Community Church featuring the great black singer William Warfield, with Frazier directing the orchestra.

The teacher urged Frazier to reconsider his decision to abandon music and convinced him to enter a conducting competition in Liverpool, England. Frazier didn't win but he received a special award aimed at encouraging him to continue his training.

When he returned to America, the teacher got him accepted at the Interlochen summer music camp, where he worked with an assistant to Eugene Ormandy, conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra.

The assistant sent him to Ormandy, who listened to him conduct and then sat down and wrote a letter praising Frazier's ability, a rare gesture.

The award and the letter, coupled with a good deal of persuading by People's Community Church fathers, convinced the Detroit Symphony to give Frazier a chance. But his debut came during the 1964 newspaper strike and attracted little public notice.

Frazier went back to the University of Michigan and got a master's degree in music. He taught for a couple of years, waiting for something to happen. He attempted international competitions from time to time with only modest success.

"I had all these hangups that were bothering me," he explains. "I was very reluctant to go into the Milan competition because I felt, 'Well, maybe I don't have the ability.' But I finally decided it was the hangups that were inhibiting me, and so I put them out of my mind and went to Milan. Fortunately, I won."

But it was more than good luck. There were 42 contestants for the Cantelli Prize, established in the name of a brilliant young composer and conductor, Guido Cantelli, who died in 1956 airplane crash flying from Italy to New York to conduct the New York Philharmonic. Cantelli was a protege of Arturo Toscanini.

Frazier and 11 others were picked as semi-finalists. The semi-final competition required each contestant to rehearse and direct the La Scala orchestra in any one of the eight movements from two Beethoven symphonies.

As one of three who survived that trial, Frazier was put to a two-part test: First, conduct Brahm's "Tragic Overture;" second, conduct any one of four works chosen by the judging committee. Frazier picked Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," a personal favorite.

His victory was a combination of talent, exhaustive preparation and careful strategy. He went over the music in advance until he knew every piece by heart. "Just like studying for a test," he explained blithely.

He tried to anticipate parts of the scores that would be likely to cause orchestral problems—and he tried to "psyche" the judges. "I knew they would be looking for someone who could make the audience respond, so I thought I would make my fortes LOUD, for instance."

The orchestra members voted for him 76–9. The orchestra gets only one vote in the judging, but its favorite obviously has a bit of an edge. After a prolonged debate (one of the judges was strongly pro-Italy, and the other two finalists were Italian), Frazier was named Il Vincitore, the winner.

He believes his work with the Brahms symphony made the difference. "A lot of times there were places where the woodwinds had important parts and I made them play contrary to what the score said. The score would say 'soft,' meaning soft for everybody, but a flute can't be soft and be heard against 20 violins playing soft, so you have to tell them to play loud.

"I don't call things like that innovations, just things that are rarely done by a large number of conductors. The average conductor underplays a lot of times."

Frazier is not reluctant to talk about the special problems of a black conductor, but he is not bitter about them—now.

"The big problem is that there's such a schism between the black and white communities. When I was 11 or 12 I was playing in a lot of the churches around Detroit and a lot of Negroes knew it but not many whites.

"At the same time there were white kids who played piano—some not as well, some better probably—and they got more exposure, got chances to play with the symphony when they were 13 or 14, mainly because they were known in the white community. I was an unknown quantity until my early 20s.

"Then I think you have to prove yourself more than the average white conductor. People wonder, 'What kind of a musician is he, is he all talent and emotion?' They refuse to accept the possibility that you may be quite scholarly, because we as a people are not accepted as being intellectually astute.

"The big difficulty is getting your foot in the door so you can prove yourself. It's difficult for white conductors too, but it's more difficult for Negroes, I think."

He says he would like to help create more opportunities for black people in music. "I wouldn't have made it this far without the support of the black community," he declares.

The next step for Frazier will be building a reputation by making a lot of appearances as a guest conductor around the country. With the Cantelli Prize and a top agent, that should be no problem.

As the winner of the competition, Frazier was required to conduct before a live audience at La Scala two days later. How did he feel, just before raising his baton for the opening notes of Beethoven's Seventh?

"Well, my first night in Milano, the orchestra was performing. I knew I would be conducting this orchestra in the competition, so I thought I'd go hear them. I went up in the last gallery and listened."

"So when I walked out on the stage, I thought, 'A week ago tonight I was sitting up there in the last gallery and now here I am on the podium.' And I just felt all of a sudden as if I had grown wings and flown down, somehow, with no time in between.

"I didn't have any fear; those bugs were out of me a long time ago.

"And despite what I call my disappointments, I've had a lot of dreams come true. So I was thinking, 'God, how many people ever live to see their dreams realized?' I sorta think now that even if nothing else ever happens, I wouldn't feel so badily. But maybe I don't mean that, maybe I'm just talking."

That should be the least of his worries. During the La Scala performance, the audience began breaking into applause between movements, which is unheard of. At the end there were nine curtain calls and shouts of "Bis! Bis!", which means "More!"

But Frazier didn't know that much Italian—he thought they would be shouting, "Encore," like Americans, if they wanted more—so there were no encores.

NORTH DAKOTA STATE UNIVERSITY IS NO. 1

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, on December 13, the No. 1 small college team in the Nation, the North Dakota State University Bison, will meet the University of Montana in the Camellia Bowl at Sacramento, Calif. The majority leader had something to say about the game as reported in an article by Ed Kolpack of the Forum, published in Fargo, N. Dak.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEAR SENATOR BURDICK, YOUNG; NDSU IN BOWL GAME TOO

(By Ed Kolpack)

An open letter to Quentin N. Burdick and Milton R. Young, North Dakota senators in Washington:

Gentlemen, the State of North Dakota and North Dakota State University's football team are taking a beating from one of your peers. Mike Mansfield, the senator from Montana, may not be the Democratic whip but he is sure whipping up a lot of propaganda about the Montana Grizzlies.

As you know, the NDSU Bison will play Montana Dec. 13 in the Camellia Bowl at Sacramento, Calif. And you must be aware by this time that NDSU is the No. 1 College Division football team in the nation. Montana is only No. 2.

Last week Mr. Mansfield made the national news wires when he asked for Montana's scores this season so he could tell the whole Senate how great the Grizzlies are.

I didn't notice either of you gentlemen asking for equal time so the Senate would know that the Bison have been unbeaten the last three seasons, have 19 straight victories, won six straight North Central Conference championships and are playing in their fifth bowl game in the last six years. Stuff like that.

I know you fellows have been busy with taxes and the draft and Judge Haynsworth.

But what really hurt was the report Wednesday that Mr. Mansfield had invited President Nixon to the Camellia Bowl. My question, Mr. Young, is this: How come a Democrat senator (from Montana yet) gets to invite a Republican president to a bowl game to be held in a state headed by a Republican governor?

Mr. BURDICK. Now, Mr. Kolpack, you cannot criticize our distinguished majority leader for trying. When you are No. 2, you have to try. Notwithstanding, Mr. MANSFIELD is whistling in the dark, because North Dakota State University has one of the greatest teams of all times, and I predict that the University of Montana will emerge from the Camellia Bowl no better than No. 2, and our beloved MIKE MANSFIELD will have tried in vain.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE ADMINISTRATIVE PROCESS

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the Administrative Conference of the United States met in October to consider a number of proposals relating to improvement of the administrative process. A brief glance at the recommendations of the conference yields some suggestion of the breadth of its activities, ranging from abolition of the sovereign immunity doctrine to updating the subject indexes in the Code of Federal Regulations.

The Subcommittee on Administrative Practice and Procedure has a specific mandate to consider recommendations of the conference "with a view to determining whether additional legislation is required to provide for the fair, impartial, and effective" operation of the administrative process. The subcommittee will certainly examine these recommendations in light of that mandate. I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the recommendations be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the recommendations were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RECOMMENDATIONS ADOPTED BY THE ADMINISTRATIVE CONFERENCE OF THE UNITED STATES AT ITS THIRD PLENARY SESSION, OCTOBER 21–22, 1969, WASHINGTON, D.C.

RECOMMENDATION NO. 9—STATUTORY REFORM OF THE SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY DOCTRINE

The technical legal defense of sovereign immunity, which the Government may still use in some instances to block suits against it by its citizens regardless of the merit of their claims, has become in large measure unacceptable. Many years ago the United States by statute accepted legal responsibility for contractual liability and for various types of misconduct by its employees. The "doctrine of sovereign immunity" should be similarly limited where it blocks the right of citizens to challenge in courts the legality of acts of governmental administrators. To this end the Administrative Procedure Act should be amended.

Recommendation

1. Section 702 of title 5, United States Code (formerly section 10(a) of the Administrative Procedure Act), should be amended by adding the following at the end of the section:

"An action in a court of the United States seeking relief other than money damages and stating a claim that an agency or an officer or employee thereof acted or failed to act in an official capacity or under color of legal authority shall not be dismissed nor relief therein denied on the ground that it is against the United States or that the United States is an indispensable party. The United States may be named as a defendant in any such action, and a judgment or decree may be entered against the United States. Nothing herein (1) affects other limitations on judicial review or the power or duty of the court to dismiss any action or deny relief on any other appropriate legal or equitable ground; or (2) confers authority to grant relief if any other statute that grants consent to suit expressly or impliedly forbids the relief which is sought."

2. Section 703 of title 5, United States Code (formerly section 10(b) of the Administrative Procedure Act), should be amended by adding the following sentence after the first full sentence:

"If no special statutory review proceeding is applicable, the action for judicial review may be brought against the United States, the agency by its official title, or the appropriate officer."

RECOMMENDATION NO. 10—JUDICIAL ENFORCEMENT OF ORDERS OF THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

Recommendation

The orders of most major independent regulatory agencies normally become enforceable automatically unless challenged in court. The statutory requirement that an order of the NLRB can be made effective only by affirmative action to obtain judicial confirmation of its terms, even when its validity is wholly uncontested, is contrary to efficient law enforcement. The Administrative Conference of 1961–62 urged that NLRB orders be treated, for purposes of judicial review, like those of the other major independent administrative agencies. That recommendation remains as sound today as when it was first made. The present practice burdens the courts with unnecessary proceedings whose only product is delay rather than added protection against ill-founded action. In the absence of any challenge after due notice to the parties, NLRB orders should be enforceable by the U.S. Courts of Appeals without further intermediate steps.

RECOMMENDATION NO. 11—PUBLICATION OF A "GUIDE TO FEDERAL REPORTING REQUIREMENTS."

Popular demand for the official index-digest entitled "Guide to Record Retention Requirements" indicates that a companion piece covering the matter of Federal reporting requirements would serve a public need.

Recommendation

1. Each agency subject to Chapter 35, title 44, United States Code, entitled Coordination of Federal Reporting Services, should make separate digests of and citations to each statutory provision and each regulatory provision relied upon by the agency for the solicitation of information as contemplated by Chapter 35.

2. After consultation with the Bureau of the Budget, the Director of the Federal Register should prescribe the style, coverage, and submission of such digests, and should publish the overall "Guide to Federal Reporting Requirements" in the Federal Register in the same manner used for the publication of the "Guide to Record Retention Requirements."

RECOMMENDATION NO. 12—ANALYTICAL SUBJECT-INDEXES TO SELECTED VOLUMES OF THE CODE OF FEDERAL REGULATIONS

Currently the Code of Federal Regulations is updated annually by the issuance of some 112 revised books. Many of these books are self-indexing. The usefulness of some books may be greatly impaired by the lack of an analytical subject index.

Recommendation

1. Each agency contributing substantially to the CFR should review its materials and (a) determine what books should include an analytical subject index, and (b) arrange for the preparation and publication of requisite indexes.

2. The Office of the Federal Register should review proffered indexes and arrange for the publication of those that appear to be professionally adequate.

RECOMMENDATION NO. 13—ELIMINATION OF DUPLICATIVE HEARINGS IN FAA SAFETY DECERTIFICATION CASES

Recommendation

The Federal Aviation Administrator has authority to revoke or suspend the licenses of aviation personnel and training facilities, airworthiness certificates, and other permits related to the operation of aircraft. Present procedures contemplate a full trial-type hearing, if one is desired by the respondent, before the Administrator issues an order of suspension or revocation. If an appeal is taken from that order, a second full hearing is afforded by the National Transportation Safety Board. This is wasteful of time and personnel, and is unnecessary as a protection of affected parties.

In order to expedite proceedings bearing directly on public safety, without sacrificing the interests of individual respondents, the Federal Aviation Administrator should discontinue providing hearings in the nature of trials in "certificate actions." This will not result in "punishment before trial," since the effective date of a certificate action order is invariably postponed, except in emergency situations, pending the outcome of proceedings before the National Transportation Safety Board.

RECOMMENDATION NO. 14—COMPILATION OF STATISTICS ON ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEEDINGS BY FEDERAL DEPARTMENTS AND AGENCIES

Government agencies which conduct formal or informal rulemaking proceedings or cases of adjudication which directly fix the rights and obligations of private persons (hereafter referred to as "proceedings")[1] owe a special duty to the individuals affected and to the general public to manage their caseloads as efficiently as possible, to eliminate inordinate delays in the conduct of proceedings, and to work continuously toward improving the fairness, effectiveness, and economy of their procedures. The present volume of Federal administrative proceedings is so great that much of the basic information needed in these efforts can be developed in intelligible and useful form only through statistical study. The compilation and publication of comprehensive statistics on Federal agency proceedings, at regular intervals would—

Provide each agency with information concerning its business which would enable it to manage its caseload more effectively.

Augment generally the information concerning its activities which each agency must furnish to the President, the Congress, and the public.

Afford affected parties and their counsel a better understanding of the administrative processes which determine their rights and obligations, and

Provide a basis for specific study of particular agency procedures by the agency itself, by committees of Congress, the Administrative Conference of the United States, the organized bar, research scholars, and other individuals and organizations, public and private, interested in improving the Federal administrative process.

Recommendation

1. To the extent deemed useful to advance the purposes of this recommendation, each Federal administrative agency which conducts proceedings (as defined above) affecting private persons' rights, privileges or obligations, should prepare annual statistical data pertaining to those proceedings, to be compiled in such manner and presented in such publications as the agency considers appropriate.

[1] The agency compilations proposed by this recommendation should not be limited to formal proceedings, or indeed to "proceedings" as that term has been employed in gathering statistics for past conferences or Congressional groups. Rather, agency figures should report all matters directly fixing the rights, privileges, and obligations of private interests, including the routine handling of applications and claims.

2. These statistical compilations should list the kinds of proceedings pending during the year, with a concise yet meaningful description of the nature and purpose of each kind of proceeding and citations for the statutory authority under which the proceedings are conducted, and the sections of the Code of Federal Regulations which set forth the rules of practice governing each kind of proceeding.

3. For the purpose of agency efforts that may be made in cooperation with the Chairman of the Administrative Conference of the United States, to lessen delays in administrative proceedings, the statistical compilation should show the number of days which elapsed during each significant step of the proceedings which were concluded during the year.

4. In designing each agency's compilation, the following information, together with the time-study data referred to in 3 above, should be considered minimal:

a. the number of proceedings of each kind pending at the beginning of the year;

b. the number of new proceedings filed or otherwise commenced during the year;

c. the number of proceedings concluded during the year and the manner of their disposition (i.e., by settlement, dismissal on procedural grounds, decision on the merits without hearing, final decision by agency after hearing, and an examiner's initial decision, etc.);

d. the number of proceedings remaining at the end of the year; and

e. the number of proceedings concluded during the year which were appealed to the courts.

5. Each agency should periodically analyse all of the information thus compiled and should develop improved techniques fitted to its particular needs to reduce delays and expense and otherwise to improve its administrative processes. A copy of this analysis should be submitted to the Administrative Conference of the United States.

6. In presenting its statistical compilation, each agency should summarize this analysis and describe the specific steps it has taken toward the ends referred to in 5 above.

7. Each agency, in its subsequent compilations, should follow a pattern that makes possible a comparison of data with corresponding data for earlier periods, thus reflecting changes in backlogs, volumes, and elapsed times and providing a measure of the agency's experience following the specific actions referred to in 6 above.

RECOMMENDATION NO. 15—CONSIDERATION OF ALTERNATIVES IN LICENSING PROCEDURES

Court decisions, notably Scenic Hudson Preservation Conference v. FPC,[2] have emphasized that in licensing cases the Federal Power Commission must explore and give proper consideration to possible alternatives to the specific plan proposed by the applicant. This principle may in the future be applied to other licensing agencies. Since the range of possible alternatives in any case can be extensive and in some cases virtually unbounded, ways must be sought to control the scope and duration of licensing proceedings within manageable limits while meeting the requirements of the law.

Recommendation

Each agency which issues licenses, permits, or other forms of authorization, should seek to create procedures fitting its particular circumstances which will assure appropriate consideration of alternatives, where necessary, and at the same time will permit effective administration of that agency's licensing functions.

Because the various agencies must deal in their licensing procedures with many diverse subject matters, the Administrative Conference cannot specify a single rule and procedure for achieving this objective. Procedural techniques which experience has shown useful in analogous situations and which an agency might consider include: (1) guidelines embodying a rule of reason concerning the number and character of alternatives to be considered in particular types of cases; (2) rules providing a point in time beyond which the issues in a proceeding will not be expanded to include additional alternatives except under compelling circumstances; (3) techniques, such as prehearing conferences and the filing of testimony in written form before trial, which tend to promote early identification of interested parties and important alternatives; and (4) placing responsibility upon the party or other person proposing an alternative to the applicant's proposal to make an appropriate threshold showing that the alternative deserves the agency's consideration.

RECOMMENDATION NO. 16—ELIMINATION OF CERTAIN EXEMPTIONS FROM THE APA RULEMAKING REQUIREMENTS

Recommendation

In order to assure that Federal agencies will have the benefit of the information and opinion that can be supplied by persons whom regulations will affect, the Administrative Procedure Act requires that the public must have opportunity to participate in rulemaking proceeding. The procedures to assure this opportunity are not required by law, however, when rules are promulgated in relation to "public property, loans, grants, benefits, or contracts." These types of rules may nevertheless bear heavily upon nongovernmental interests. Exempting them from generally applicable procedural requirements is unwise. The present law should therefore be amended to discontinue the exemptions to strengthen procedures that will make for fair, informed exercise of rulemaking authority in these as in other areas.

Removing these statutory exemptions would not diminish the power of the agencies to omit the prescribed rulemaking procedures whenever their observances were found to be impracticable, unnecessary, or contrary to the public interest. A finding to that effect can be made, and published in the Federal Register, as to an entire subject matter concerning which rules may be promulgated. Each finding of this type should be no broader than essential and should include a statement of underlying reasons rather than a merely conclusory recital.

Wholly without statutory amendment, agencies already have the authority to utilize the generally applicable procedural methods even when formulating rules of the exempt types now under discussion. They are urged to utilize their existing powers to employ the rulemaking procedures provided by the Administrative Procedure Act, whenever appropriate, without awaiting a legislative command to do so.

RECOMMENDATION NO. 17—RECRUITMENT AND SELECTION OF HEARING EXAMINERS; CONTINUING TRAINING FOR GOVERNMENT ATTORNEYS AND HEARING EXAMINERS; CREATION OF A CENTER FOR CONTINUING LEGAL EDUCATION IN GOVERNMENT

Recommendation

A. Recruitment and selection of hearing examiners

1. The Civil Service Commission should enlarge the base of recruitment and the number of qualified candidates available for appointment to hearing examiner positions by recognizing trial experience as one basis for qualification.

2. The Civil Service Commission should depart experimentally from the selective certification system as now practiced in the appointment of hearing examiners. Instead, it should develop a system under which the number of candidates qualified for hearing examiner positions is enlarged through the use of a general register for all agencies, with additional credit for specific relevant professional experience or selective certification for those agencies which demonstrate to the Civil Service Commission's satisfaction a current need for personnel possessing a specific background. The purpose of this experiment should be to permit meaningful comparative evaluation with the system now in effect. A report should be made to the Administrative Conference after three years of experience.

To aid the Civil Service Commission in effectuating the objective of this part of the recommendation, the Chairman of the Administrative Conference should appoint special committees from time to time to evaluate the standards of specific relevant professional experience proposed to the Civil Service Commission by any agency as being required for its work. Present selective certification agreements should continue until new standards have been adopted by the Civil Service Commission.

3. The Civil Service Commission should study and, if practicable, should institute an experimental intern program to supplement the direct appointment of hearing examiners from the Register. Without finally deciding the issue, the Conference urges the Commission to consider anew whether successful interns should automatically be placed in hearing examiner positions.

4. The Veterans Preference Act should be amended to permit the selection of examiners for each vacancy from the top ten available persons then appearing on the Register, determined on the basis of examination and ranking without reference to veterans preference.

B. Continuing Training for Government Attorneys and Examiners

1. Agencies employing attorneys and hearing examiners should encourage their participation in programs of continuing legal education. Budgets should include adequate funds for personnel so that attorneys and examiners may be released for reasonable periods of time to accomplish added training. Agencies should take all suitable steps to assure wide knowledge of training opportunities.

2. Agencies should also explore ways in which they can support the professional training activities of the Federal Trial Examiners Conference, bar associations, foundations, the Civil Service Commission, law schools, the individual agencies with parallel legal interests and other institutions offering appropriate training for attorneys and examiners.

3. The feasibility of short-term exchange assignments of experienced attorneys in higher grades among agencies should be considered, in order to enhance the insight and effectiveness of government lawyers by exposing them to varied aspects of legal problems with which they may deal.

C. Creation of a Center for Continuing Legal Education in Government

1. A center should be established in the Washington area for the continuing legal education of Government lawyers, hearing examiners, and private attorneys practicing before Government agencies. The center should also promote coordinated programs within the Government and with specialized segments of the organized bar; stimulate and engage in the preparation of manuals, research materials, and other publications in support of such continuing legal education; and provide a mechanism for the exchange of information concerning professional problems of Government attorneys.

[2] 354 F. 2d 608 (2d Cir. 1965), cert denied, 384 U.S. 941 (1966). See also Udall v. FPC, 387 U.S. 428 (1967).

The center, under the direction of lawyers, should be oriented toward applied legal problems. The Civil Service Commission should make available to it the benefit of the Commission's experience in establishing and operating Federal Executive Institutes and Centers. The Federal Administrative Justice Center proposed by the American Bar Association in a resolution adopted by the American Bar Association's House of Delegates in January 1969, as an example, would serve the purpose of the present recommendation.

2. The establishment of the Center should not diminish each agency's present responsibility to provide continuing legal education for its own lawyers through "in-house" training programs, but the Center should support and assist all agencies in maintaining these programs at a high level of effectiveness.

ASPIRA

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, on Saturday, November 29, 1969, the New York Times published an article entitled "Puerto Rican Hopes Lifted." It describes the work of an organization I have known well for some years—"Aspira." Aspira—the Spanish word for aspire—is a self-help organization of Americans of Puerto Rican descent who have banded together to make sure that their children will aspire to reach for the American dream, and that they will have the education to succeed.

I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PUERTO RICAN HOPES LIFTED

(By Alfonso A. Narvaez)

In Puerto Rico el pitirre is a small bird, noted for its ability to soar high over the tallest trees on the island.

But for an increasing number of the 1.5 million Puerto Ricans in the United States mainland it is a symbol used by Aspira, a Puerto Rican self-help organization, to show confidence, self-reliance and the determination to overcome adversity.

Last week, 49 teen-age boys and girls—some black-skinned, with slicked-down hair, others brown-skinned with Afro haircuts, and still others white-skinned with soft flowing hair—stood under the dimmed lights in the main reading room of Philadelphia's Free Library on Girard Avenue and took an oath.

The youths—all Puerto Ricans—were being initiated into seven new Aspira Clubs formed in the high schools there and by their oath were pledging to finish school, continue on to college and return as professionals to their communities to help in leadership roles.

However, for these youngsters, as well as for the thousands of other Puerto Ricans youths who join Aspira (Spanish for aspire) Clubs in New York, Chicago, Newark and San Juan, the main concern today is a search for who they are—for an identity.

For petite 16-year-old Maria Rosa, a senior at William Penn High School in Philadelphia, the Aspira Club means a chance "to learn about my community and race."

"I hope it will help me learn more about myself," she said.

For Robbert Baez, 16 and a junior at Mastbaum High School, Philadelphia, the club would help prepare him for college and "teach me how to deal with people."

Tall and proud, he added, "Maybe I'll get a better understanding of who and what I am."

This search for an identity, with its cultural values, is consuming many Puerto Rican youths in Philadelphia and other parts of the country. Some find it and move ahead. Others don't, and either rebel and lash out at society or lose confidence in themselves and give up.

In 1966, it opened offices in Brooklyn, the Bronx and Manhattan, and this year—with a Ford Foundation grant—in Newark, Chicago and San Juan.

Aspira's organizers found that while Puerto Rican youngsters were making up an increasing proportion of the city's school population only a handful were going on to college.

In 1963 there were more than 14,000 Puerto Rican youngsters enrolled in academic high schools, but only 331 received academic diplomas, the usual prerequisite for colleges. Through Aspira's efforts the number has been constantly increasing.

Louis Nuñez, national executive director, said that although in 1963 only 27 youngsters went on to college through the agency's efforts, last September 901 Aspira students were accepted into colleges throughout the country.

Some of the students who have graduated from college have returned to the agency to work as counselors, passing on some of the benefits they received from the agency.

While much of Aspira's budget comes from Federal sources—such as the Office of Economic Opportunity and Health, Education and Welfare—the organization has been able to build a growing awareness on the part of foundations and corporations of the needs of Puerto Rican youngsters.

A growing proportion of funds have been coming in from corporations on the island and on the mainland. Last year, more than $67,000 was received from corporations.

It is through the clubs with 4,500 members that Aspira has been able to reach Puerto Rican youngsters in the New York City school system. The agency has been able to do a counseling job that, according to Mr. Nuñez, is almost nonexistent in the city's schools.

SENATOR JAVITS: CHAMPION OF THE HUNGRY

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Hunger in America," written by the distinguished senior Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS), to be published in next month's issue of Playboy magazine. The article is without question one of the best that I have read on this problem which so troubles the country's conscience.

It should surprise no one that the article is so comprehensive and heartfelt. Senator JAVITS is among the select few in the country who have pioneered and carried on the fight against letting American citizens go without adequate nutrition. He was one of the original four members of the Subcommittee on Poverty which journeyed to Mississippi several years ago and found, as he writes, "conditions of malnutrition and hunger that were thought to exist only in parts of India, Africa, and Asia." He is also, of course, the ranking minority member of the Select Committee on Nutrition and Human Needs, of which I am chairman, and I can testify personally to his enormous contribution to the crusade against hunger this year. It is my belief that the passage of a strong food assistance bill in the Senate last September would not have been possible without the brilliant leadership of Senator JAVITS.

The New York Senator recounts the full history of the crusade, beginning in Mississippi, picking up steam with the issuance of the "Hunger, U.S.A." and the CBS documentary on hunger, the initial findings of the national nutrition survey, the work of the select committee, and the declaration by the President last May to end hunger in America for all time. The Senator modestly does not mention what I know to be a fact—that he played a key role in convincing the President that the time had come to issue that declaration.

Senator JAVITS also mentions that the Senate took the historic action in September of passing a food stamp reform bill supported by a bipartisan coalition of the select committee but that the House has not yet passed a reform measure. He voices the hope that in the year ahead we will make even greater progress in the battle against poverty and hunger and ill health because there is a "bipartisan determination to surge ahead." I join him in that hope, and I am sure that with his continuing concern and support it is a hope that will come true.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HUNGER IN AMERICA

(By U.S. Senator JACOB JAVITS)

(NOTE.—The senior senator from New York describes the feast-and-famine malaise that is abroad in the land and prescribes a cure.)

I first came face to face with the hidden shame of hunger in America when I visited Mississippi in the spring of 1967. I was one of four members of the Senate Subcommittee on Employment, Manpower and Poverty, and we traveled to Jackson to "examine the War on Poverty." We went to Mississippi because we were anxious to see how such Federal programs as Head Start and the one-dollar-per-hour minimum wage for farm workers were faring in the poorest state in the nation.

It frankly never occurred to me nor, I believe, to the other Senators on that trip—the late Senator Robert F. Kennedy and Senators Joseph Clark and George Murphy—that the ravages of American poverty could produce conditions of malnutrition and hunger that were thought to exist only in parts of India, Africa and Asia. Looking back now to that trip made just two and a half years ago, I still find it difficult to understand how we Senators—and the nation at large—could not have been more aware that poverty breeds malnutrition just as surely as poverty breeds unemployment, bad housing, crime and illiteracy.

Had the bread lines of the Thirties been so easily forgotten? Were we so complacent as to assume that simply because the Department of Agriculture offered surplus foods—and food stamps (at a price)—to the poor, the poor automatically received all the nourishment needed to keep body and soul together? Somehow, we had not made the connection between poverty and hunger, and it took the nightmare of Mississippi to awaken us to the reality of millions of people who simply do not get enough to eat—not only in the rural South but also in the urban ghettos of the North, the Indian reservations of the Southwest, the mining towns of Appalachia and in migrant-worker camps throughout the nation.

Even today, two and a half years after that conscience-searing trip to Mississippi, the full facts on hunger in the United States are not yet in. A national nutrition survey is presently under way, but the chief investigator, Dr. Arnold E. Schaefer of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, already reports that a disturbing picture of hidden hunger is emerging: "We have found more malnutrition than I ever expected to see in a society described as the best fed in the world."

Dr. Schaefer found, for example, that 92 percent of the children in one preschool Head Start program had such extreme vitamin-A deficiencies that they could go blind at any moment—a condition that could be prevented at the cost of one candy bar per child per year.

Dr. Schaffer produced the startling information that until the fall of 1968, the Department of Agriculture distributed nonfat dry milk lacking vitamins A and D as part of its commodities program for the poor, while at the same time, since 1965, nonfat dry milk fortified with vitamins A and D was shipped to six foreign countries by the same department.

The nutrition survey has already confirmed other reports that goiter, rickets and hookworm infestation, thought to have been eradicated decades ago, are still afflicting the poor. One third of the children examined thus far in the survey are anemic. Ninety-six percent of the children require immediate dental treatment involving an average of five decayed teeth. Ten percent of the children show growth retardation and evidence of the related problem of mental retardation.

These preliminary findings have been reinforced by other medical reports from across the nation—disturbing indications of a direct link between malnutrition, especially insufficient protein, in pregnant women, infants and children and brain damage. It now appears that three quarters of mental retardation is found in big-city slums and rural poverty areas.

In "Hunger, U.S.A.," an exhaustive survey of malnutrition across the country conducted by a distinguished group of private individuals who joined together as the Citizens Board of Inquiry, there is further unsettling documentation of the nutrition needs of the poor. In Baltimore, the hemoglobin level of slum children was found to be lower than that of infants in rural Pakistan. In Seattle, half to three quarters of all poverty infants between 6 and 36 months of age were found to be suffering from nutritional-deficiency anemia. In Boston, one out of five children admitted to the wards of Boston City Hospital has nutritional anemia. In posh Palm Beach County, Florida, 97 percent of migrant-worker families failed to consume minimum recommended amounts of milk or milk products and 63 percent ate no green or yellow vegetables.

What makes these reports even more alarming is the fact that the Federal food-assistance programs still reach only 6,000,000 of the nation's 30,000,000 poor—those citizens earning less than $3000 a year. And the situation appears to be stagnant, at best, because the programs now reach approximately the same number of people reached eight years ago.

These Federal food efforts take two basic forms. There is the commodities-distribution program, which distributes specific food items free to needy families; and there is the food-stamp program, in which needy families buy coupons redeemable at retail stores for food products only, at a value in excess of the purchase price of the coupons. Communities may have either program—food distribution or food stamps—or none at all, but never both.

Under the commodities-distribution program, the Department of Agriculture gives away such foods as corn meal, grits, flour, nonfat dry milk, peanut butter, rice and rolled wheat—all surpluses that have been purchased to help support farm prices. The selection from the 22 basic commodities available varies from month to month, depending on what is in surplus. One of the most flagrant shortcomings of the program, therefore, is that these foods are not chosen for their nutritional value nor to provide a poor family with a balanced diet. Rather—by the Department of Agriculture's own admission—commodities merely supplement the family's diet. Unfortunately, many families look to the commodities program for their sole source of food.

On the other hand, the flaw in the food-stamp program is that many families cannot afford the price of the stamps themselves, even when graduated downward, depending on family income. When this happens, they have no source of emergency rations, because commodities are not available in communities where food stamps are sold.

The hard and undeniable fact is that we have a food-assistance system that fails to reach the vast majority of the desperately poor people who need it and fails to meet the needs of those few who are reached.

Perhaps our awakening to this fact took place in Mississippi because hunger, and the awful conditions of disease, filth and hopelessness connected with it, is easier to spot in the ramshackle shanties of the delta than in the stifling tenements of the big cities. Perhaps it all began in Mississippi because in that state and in other states of the Deep South, there are areas that have allowed themselves to become stereotypes of poverty aggravated by the blatant disinterest of local officials. To be frank, it is easy to kick Mississippi in the pants—to tell it to do something about the awful conditions of human degradation that exist within its borders. But it is quite another thing to take stock of what we see in Mississippi and to come away with a lesson that hunger in that state is simply an extreme version of what we can find within walking distance of the U.S. Capitol—or of your own homes. The challenge, then, based on the lesson of Mississippi, is to look for hunger and root it out wherever we find it, with whatever means and at whatever cost required of the Federal Government to do the job.

The committee learned that the most common hunger situation in Mississippi involved an abandoned middle-aged black mother living in a cramped two-room shack and caring for from four to fifteen children. Sometimes the father traveled North to find work and sent checks home periodically to support the family. Often the children were illegitimate offspring of several fathers; and if some of the older children were daughters, one or two of them may have had two or three children of their own, and no husband in the home. Sometimes an elderly man, usually a grandfather who was unable to work, lived with the family.

The diet of such a family consisted of a breakfast of grits, molasses and biscuits. The adults often ate nothing for lunch, while the children at home were given a piece of bread and some Kool-Aid or water. At night, the family ate boiled beans and corn bread, sometimes supplemented with boiled rice, dry peanut butter or a little can of meat from the Federal commodities program. Usually, there was no electricity nor refrigeration. The surplus commodities were stored in brown-paper bags that were infested with rats and insects.

A few of the shacks had running water, but almost none had toilet facilities. Often there were no outhouses, either; only open sewers and stagnant pools of water surrounded the dwellings. The shacks, worth possibly $35 as firewood, were usually windowless and inundated with the odor of urine that emanated from cracks in the floors and walls. There was usually no table and the little food available was eaten by hand out of a bowl or from a newspaper on the floor. There was also the almost unbearable stench of decomposed food in the cracks of the creaking floor.

Most of the children did not have shoes or adequate clothing to attend school. In one situation brought to the committee's attention, five out of the nine children in a family were too filthy to get near or to touch. They had gone unwashed for so long that their arms and legs were a blue-gray claylike color. Kenneth L. Dean, executive director of the Mississippi Council on Human Relations, who described some of the family circumstances to us, said: "This family is actually too poor to participate in a poverty program. This type of situation represents hunger at its worst."

The adults in these families, Mr. Dean said, often "are of such a destroyed mental, physical and emotional state that they are incapable of caring for either themselves or their offspring. They are barely communicative. Some of these people have been destroyed to the extent that they fluctuate between the human and the subhuman level." Mr. Dean, like other community workers the committee heard in Mississippi, attributed these conditions in large part to the many years in which Negroes were considered by many whites to be "just a shade below the human level."

"It is this kind of past," Mr. Dean testified, "that has produced this middle-aged Negro woman, whose only pleasure is found in those brief moments of free expression in sex relations with a partially destroyed male who also has a pattern of behavior that has developed outside the norms of society. This woman, having her intellectual, emotional and social dimensions of personality denied development, has been reduced to the condition of primitive man and cannot be condemned for failing to appreciate or recognize the social norms of the community."

The hearing in Mississippi also provided me with substantial evidence that the combination of state welfare programs and Federal food programs had made little headway against extreme conditions of deprivation and backwardness. The average monthly welfare benefit to a fatherless family of four in Mississippi, we learned, was between $50 and $60. Out of this, the mother would have to pay all family costs, including rent, utilities (if there were any), medical bills (if a doctor could be found to care for her family), transportation (if any public transit serviced her area) and clothing. Rarely was there enough money left over to provide the family with sufficient food for a full and balanced diet.

Mississippi was—and still is—the only state in the nation to have a Federal food-assistance program in every county. But the severe hardships faced by the poor were, nevertheless, compounded, because most of the counties had switched, or were in the process of switching, from the free commodities to the pay-as-you-go food-stamp program.

This led me to ask one of the key witnesses, Miss Marian Wright, a black lawyer who was working in Mississippi as counsel to the NAACP Legal Defense Fund, this question: "Is there any feeling that counties have switched to food stamps in order to pressure the very Negroes who needed free food the most?" Miss Wright replied: "That's right, Senator Javits. And many people do feel, too, that it's part of an over-all state policy to not respond to the overwhelming need in the delta in order to force these Negroes out because they don't want them here." She said there was a drastic drop in the number of food-assistance recipients as a result of switches from commodities to food stamps. She gave as an example Jones County, in which 17,500 people had been getting commodities but only 4,700 were getting food stamps—a decrease of nearly 13,000—after the county switched programs. The reasons for the sharp drop, she said, were either that needy families could not scrape enough money together to purchase all the stamps, once a month as required, or that state welfare officials had made it extremely difficult, if not impossible, to qualify for eligibility.

Echoing statements the committee was to hear from community representatives across the country, Miss Wright said: "People are not treated with dignity when they go into the welfare office, and they are not allowed to be people, and they are investigated and they are threatened, and this is a terrible kind of thing that has to be stopped."

I came away from that Mississippi hearing with several impressions and conclusions that were to shape my thinking on the hunger problem in the months to come. First of all, needy people were not getting enough to eat, because the Federal food programs were not reaching them. The problem seemed to be a combination of local disinterest and Federal lethargy—a combination that might have been tolerable as just another bureaucratic muddle if people were not starving in the process.

Furthermore, from a practical standpoint, food stamps were beyond the means of destitute families, and those who could afford them usually ran out of food before the end of the month. On the average, six dollars in stamps buys ten dollars worth of food, but the value of a month's supply of stamps never approaches the $120 that the Department of Agriculture says is the minimum a family of four must spend each month to achieve a balanced diet. As far as commodities were concerned, not only did the $22.20 worth of food a month for a family of four fail to provide a balanced diet but commodities, like the food purchased with stamps, did not last a month. Also, the month's supply of commodities was too heavy for most families to carry from distribution centers, so families either had to hire or borrow transportation or do without all the food to which they were entitled.

It was clear, then, that some quick Federal remedies were needed in Mississippi that would also apply to other areas of the nation that faced problems of hunger. There was a dire need for free food stamps for those families that didn't have the money to pay for any. There was also a need to get commodities into those areas where people, for whatever reason, had no food. In other words, the law had to be changed to permit distribution of stamps and commodities at the same time in the same area. Also, Federal authorities had to be authorized to bypass local government when it became clear that people were not getting food because local officials were not cooperating with the Federal programs. Finally, there was a real question as to whether the food-assistance programs would ever meet the nutritional needs of the poor if they continued to be administered by the Department of Agriculture, whose main concern is with farm surpluses, land utilization and supporting farm prices. Obviously, if Mississippi taught us anything, it taught us that the Federal food programs were a matter of life and death—not simply a means of helping the Government dispose of farm surpluses.

If there were any lingering doubts of the seriousness of the conditions in Mississippi, and what it implied for other impoverished areas of the nation, they were dispelled by the report of six prominent doctors, who, after examining children in rural Mississippi, wrote: "We found it hard to believe we were examining American children of the 20th Century." In their report, "Children in Mississippi," they cited case after case of children suffering mental and physical retardation because they came from the wombs of mothers who were unable to provide them with nourishing foods.

The doctors reported "obvious evidence of severe malnutrition, with injury to the body's tissues—its muscles, bones and skin, as well as an associated psychological state of fatigue, listlessness and exhaustion." They related a horror story of anemic, diseased, parasite-ridden children—who cried in pain at the gentle touch of a physician's hand, who moved their arms and legs with agonized effort, of a 70-year old man suffering from crippling arthritis and who were beyond medical assistance because they did not get enough to eat. The doctors reported finding not malnutrition but children suffering and dying from hunger and disease that they said "is exactly what 'starvation' means." In conclusion, they declared: "It is unbelievable to us that a nation as rich as ours, with all its technical and scientific resources, has to permit thousands and thousands of children to go hungry, go sick and die grim and premature deaths."

Even then-Secretary of Agriculture Orville Freeman sent the committee a departmental memo that reported evidence of malnutrition and hunger, of families without jobs who could not buy food stamps because they had no income, and of the need for better certification procedures for food recipients. He said that massive layoffs of cotton fieldworkers, resulting from rapid mechanization by landowners who balked at paying the new one-dollar minimum wage, had resulted in 40,000 to 60,000 people unemployed in the delta.

But Secretary Freeman's response to demands by me and other subcommittee members for immediate remedial action in Mississippi served only to point up the Department of Agriculture's traditional inability to recognize or react to the emergency of unchecked hunger. This became painfully clear at a subcommittee hearing nearly three months after our trip to Mississippi. Responding to some heated and persistent questioning by me, Secretary Freeman doggedly refused to declare an emergency in Mississippi, insisting that this action "would make no difference as such and would not authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to do anything he cannot do now in Mississippi and that is not being done now in Mississippi."

Contrary to the legal opinion of the subcommittee, Secretary Freeman contended that his emergency powers under the law did not permit him to issue free food stamps. He ordered instead that the minimum price of the stamps be reduced in Mississippi from two dollars to 50 cents per person, even though he conceded that some families were so destitute that they would not be able to find money even to pay so low a price—they just had no cash at all.

The tragic implications of the Department of Agriculture's position under Secretary Freeman became clear last March, when the Nixon Administration's new Secretary of Agriculture, Clifford Hardin, simply signed an order for the issuance of free food stamps in two impoverished rural counties in South Carolina. Mr. Hardin, who also has made important strides in initiating food-stamp programs in counties that still offered no food programs and in establishing supplemental feeding programs in areas where food stamps have proved insufficient, shows every sign of not being a traditionalist.

His main problems are the same as those of the department under Secretary Freeman: lack of sufficient funds to bring Federal food programs to all the nation's poor and an unwieldly departmental bureaucracy that gives such priority to management of the nation's food surpluses that the fortifying and distribution of these surpluses to the poor may be suffering in the process.

The Nixon Administration at first seemed content merely to place a high priority on initiatives to get current programs to operate more efficiently. There was an apparent reluctance—even among some of the closest advisors of the President—to spend the large sums needed to get these programs to the poor and to educate them on the basics of a balanced diet. The Nixon budget followed precedent by providing more than three billion dollars for farm price-support programs and only $739,000,000 for family food programs—or, as The New York Times so aptly put it—"more than four times as much to make food scarce as to make it available."

But then in May, the President, in a historic humanitarian action, announced that he planned to wage an aggressive campaign against hunger, a campaign that would cost an additional one billion dollars a year.

Under President Nixon's plan, there would be $610,000,000 spent the first year and one billion dollars each year thereafter, to augment and improve the present food-assistance programs. I, and other Senators long concerned with the hunger problem, still had to express doubt that even these additional funds would be adequate to guarantee every poor family, no matter how modest its means, a diet that meets the minimum Federal nutritional standards. The Senate lost little time in following up on the Administration's action by voting to boost the authorization for the food-stamp program to $750,000,000 in the coming fiscal year—more than double last year's $340,000,000 and $140,000,000 more than asked by the Nixon Administration.

But money is only one of the answers to how to establish an effective nationwide food-assistance program. If the Federal Government is to continue using local officials to administer its programs, there must be a major effort to ensure that those officials are concerned with the needs and the problems of the poor and will exercise their authority as contemplated by Federal Law and policy. It is not only in Mississippi that you find local officials who resist these programs more than they administer them.

The CBS television report Hunger in America, which did so much to arouse public concern when it was broadcast in May 1968, showed San Antonio, Texas, County Commissioner A. J. Plock being asked about hunger in his community. Plock replied: "Well, why are they not getting enough food? Because the father won't work and I mean won't work. If they won't work, do you expect the taxpayer to raise all the kids? First, let's do something with their daddies and then, yes, take care of the kids." Commissioner Plock is just one of thousands of public officials across the country who feel that way. It is incredible that innocent children are to be held responsible for the "sins" of their fathers.

Referring to the migrant workers who live in squalid shacks rivaling those I saw in Mississippi, one Collier County, Florida, official told the committee: "They're not Collier County people. They're Federal people." Apparently, the fact that these outsiders made it possible for the county to harvest its $40,000,000 citrus crop did not earn them recognition, much less a living wage.

Even in Washington, D.C., I heard food-stamp applicants complain about the difficulty in getting certified. But the complaints at the certification center I visited did not deal with any hostility or abusiveness on the part of officials involved but, rather, with long delays. When I arrived at ten a.m., there were more than 100 applicants waiting to be processed by six clerks—a process that involves a 45-minute interview. Many people were resigned to coming back the next day. There is really no excuse for such delays, especially in Washington, where even now the food-stamp program fails to serve three quarters of 122,000 persons eligible for assistance.

And let there be no mistake that hunger stalks the ghettos of Washington, just as it does in New York City's Harlem, Chicago's West Side, Los Angeles' Watts and Boston's Roxbury. Not the blatant, bizarre sort of hunger that you find in the putrid wastes of rural poverty areas; but it is still the insidious malnutrition that is bred of the hopelessness of poverty amid plenty, the malnutrition that saps the energy and ambition of adults and leaves children listless.

On a tour through tenements in the Columbia Road section of Washington, where one of the nation's worst urban riots raged only a year earlier, after the assassination of the Reverend Martin Luther King, I visited the cramped, stuffy, rat-plagued apartment of Mrs. Florence Spain. She had four children and a disabled husband, and her only source of income was a $131-a-month welfare check. Out of that $131, Mrs. Spain was supposed to pay $80 a month rent and $40 for food stamps that entitled her to $78 worth of groceries. That left her $11 to pay for her husband's medicines, the electric and gas bills, clothing and shoes for her children and the monthly installment on the 12-inch television set that no one was watching in the living room. That month, however, Mrs. Spain did not have enough cash left over to buy food stamps.

I asked Mrs. Spain what she had for breakfast.

"Had no breakfast," she replied.

I asked what she'd had for lunch.

"Had no lunch," she replied.

"How about dinner?" I asked.

She replied: "Don't know about dinner. Maybe some neck bones, potatoes and grits." She said her childen get lunch at school under the Federal school-lunch program. She told me that the family table hadn't seen beef in eight or nine months, pork chops in a year.

"It's really hard, you know," Mrs. Spain said.

The fight against hunger has presented the Nixon Administration with an opportunity to win a dramatic battle in the War on Poverty. Happily, the Administration appears to have seized the opportunity, and the shame of hunger may yet provide the catalyst for waging a vigorous war on poverty on all fronts.

The Administration has already taken a major step toward reforming the overall welfare system. In his address to the nation last summer, the President began the difficult process of moving away from the present inequitable and degrading system. In his subsequent message to Congress, he charted a course for the Federal Government to adopt minimum welfare standards throughout the nation and to pay a share of the resulting higher payments in states that truly cannot afford them. Clearly, the minimums are only a beginning and are still inadequate to meet the human needs of the nation's poor and the fiscal needs of the states and localities that carry the greatest burdens.

Indeed, the proposed Federal minimum of $1600 annually for a family of four would barely cover the food budgets of the poorest families, leaving little—if anything at all—to cover other such basic costs of shelter, clothing and transportation. The President's plan now favors the states doing the least on their own and penalizes the states, such as New York, that are doing more than their share to help the poor. But with adequate funding by Congress, the President's proposal for establishing national minimum welfare standards would go a long way toward ending the exodus of the poor from rural areas where welfare payments are shockingly low to the cities where assistance is generally maintained at more enlightened levels.

The new Administration has shown itself bold enough to overcome the the vicious and degrading stereotypes of poverty. Its welfare proposal, for example, requires that assistance programs be available to all impoverished families, including those that have a man in the house. No longer would able-bodied men be encouraged or compelled to abandon their families so that their wives and children could qualify for welfare assistance. No longer would families be disqualified from receiving assistance if the head of the house were able to find work and yet were unable to maintain the family at a subsistence level.

Ultimately, there must be an assured minimum income for the poor—either through a reverse income tax or through income maintenance by family allowance—but always with incentives to work, to educate oneself, to lift oneself out of the degradation and hopelessness of poverty. Such a drastic step cannot be taken in a vacuum. There must, at the same time, be an all-out effort to provide adequate and effective vocational training, to provide Federal incentives for improving education in our ghettos and rural poverty areas and to provide sufficient day-care centers so that welfare mothers—nearly 1,000,000 of them without husbands to provide for them—can have the opportunity to work while their children are properly supervised.

Such a multifaceted Federal drive to eliminate poverty should not be hampered by state laws and regulations that might inhibit its effectiveness. For poverty is truly national in scope and no one region should be so blind as to selfishly dispose of its poor as it sees fit, at the expense of other areas of the nation.

Another essential ingredient in the drive to eliminate poverty is to bring adequate health care within the reach of all Americans—including those now on Medicare and Medicaid—through a universal health-insurance system. America's capacity for the cure and prevention of illness and disease has never been greater. Yet, our ability to deliver needed health services at a reasonable cost and to provide for the most basic physical needs has never been more in doubt. This crisis is evidence by skyrocketing health costs, by marked shortages of doctors and other health personnel and by seriously inadequate, obsolete and outmoded health facilities.

In a bill I am preparing for introduction this year, I propose a universal health-insurance system that ultimately would replace Medicare and Medicaid. The medical costs of indigent and dependent persons would be covered by Federal, state and local governments, but the costs of the vast majority of Americans would be financed by employer-employee contributions. There would be freedom of choice among competing plans but participation in a plan would be compulsory. At the very heart of the system would be the requirement that each plan provide complete health care and that each plan submit itself to realistic cost controls overseen by government health agencies. Thus, everyone, regardless of how much he earns or where he lives, would be entitled to adequate medical care.

The ultimate elimination of poverty—and I am convinced that it can be eliminated—will cost billions of dollars. But for a meaningful and productive start, the Bureau of the Budget has estimated that for an additional one and one half billion to two billion dollars a year, all the nation's poor could be quickly reached by the Federal food-assistance programs. This is considerably more than the three quarters of a billion dollars now being spent on food efforts; but it is a fraction of the 80-billion-dollar defense budget and even less than the four billion dollars now set aside for the space program.

What I am suggesting now is that a new set of national priorities is called for—one that balances internal needs with the requirements of its external security.

At the very least, we must move ahead to provide free food stamps to the poorest of our nation's poor and to lower the price of stamps for those who can barely afford them now. There can be no justification in continuing to compel the poor to pay half to three quarters of their income for food, while the average family in our nation pays less than a fifth. Furthermore, the value of the stamps should be increased to permit at least the minimum level of buying that the Department of Agriculture says a family must do to keep all its members well nourished. Also, extra value should be given to stamps that are used to buy special enriched foods. The cost of this program would be under two billion dollars—a small price for our nation to pay to eliminate the hunger in its midst.

To make such a program work efficiently, and in a manner that upholds the human dignity of the recipient, there must be some basic reforms in the food-stamp program. There should be, for example, a computerized system of preparing and mailing the food-stamp coupons, in much the same way that Social Security and welfare checks are now distributed. There simply is no excuse for continuing the demeaning practice of requiring food-stamp recipients to report each month, often at relatively great travel cost, for what must seem to many a dole grudgingly handed out by an insensitive bureaucrat. Also, the use of food stamps should be extended to permit the purchase of such essential nonfood products as soap, toilet tissue and other items for home and personal hygiene.

It is also essential to provide Federal incentives—including demonstration grants—for developing nutrition-education curriculums and techniques to make clear to parents and children alike what goes into a balanced diet. But education is not enough for expectant mothers. They must also have milk, fortified foods and vitamins, to ensure against mental retardation in their offspring. And the supply of these nutrients must be extended to the newborn as well. For school children from poverty areas, there should be a free school-lunch program to replace the pay-as-you-go program that now reaches mostly children in middle-class neighborhoods and affluent suburbs.

It is important to stress that the attack on hunger should not be limited to the Governmental sphere. Food companies, for example, should be stimulated—with Federal subsidies, if necessary—to produce, package and merchandise fortified foods in new forms—fortified soft drinks, for example—to make them especially appealing to the poor.

There is much more, also, that the medical profession can do in fighting the rigors of hunger. One of the most startling and disturbing revelations before the Senator hunger hearings thus far was that there is a shortage of doctors trained to identify and treat malnutrition. Behind this shortage is a failure of the nation's medical schools to make courses on nutrition an integral part of their curriculum or to encourage students to make field studies of malnutrition in surrounding poverty areas.

All these proposals are contained either in my bill—the so-called Health, Nutrition and Human Needs Bill—or in bills of my Senate colleagues.

Last year, the best that Congress could provide was an extra $55,000,000 for the school-lunch program. This year, Congress plans to authorize $750,000,000 for food stamps alone.

I was particularly gratified that, as this issue went to press, the Senate took the initiative in enacting meaningful hunger reform by rejecting the Food Stamp Bill of the Senate Agriculture Committee in favor of a more ambitious bill cosponsored by Senator George McGovern and me. Our bill, which was passed by a comfortable 54-to-40 margin, would permit the issuing of free food stamps to families earning less than $60 a month. It also would permit the simultaneous issuing of food stamps and commodities in communities that are shifting from commodities to food stamps or establishing food stamps as their first food-assistance program.

The McGovern-Javits Bill also gives the Federal Government power to bypass local authorities who refuse to establish a program and run it adequately; at present, there is no national standard. And finally—recognizing that poor families should not have to spend a greater percentage for food than better-off families—the bill establishes that no family would be required to spend more than one quarter of its income on food stamps.

This was a truly historic action by the Senate—but one that still must be duplicated in the House, where resistance by the tradition-oriented House Agriculture Committee poses a major obstacle.

But there is hope for meaningful action in 1970. There is a bipartisan determination to surge ahead—represented by Senator McGovern, chairman of the so-called Hunger Committee, by me as its ranking Republican member and by the President himself. Most important, the public has been aroused as never before by the specter of starving Americans. A recent national poll attests to this, showing seven out of ten Americans favoring free food stamps for the nation's most impoverished citizens. With this sort of momentum, hunger in the United States may soon be just another conquered American frontier, leading the way toward the final goal of equal rights and equal opportunity for each citizen to his share of the great American dream.

DEATH OF E. M. "TED" DEALEY

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, it was with deep and sincere regret that I noted the death, the day before Thanksgiving, of E. M. "Ted" Dealey, publisher of the Dallas Morning News; a man who devoted his entire lifetime to development and achievement within his city and of the State of Texas and whose work enabled his newspaper to become known by many as the leading publication in the Southwest.

The first issue of the Dallas Morning News was published October 1, 1885, after George Bannerman Dealey, father of Ted Dealey and for whom Dealey Plaza in Dallas is named, recommended Dallas to Col. A. H. Belo, publisher of the Galveston News, as a site for a second newspaper. Later the publishing corporation which now carries the Belo name, sold the Galveston News and moved its headquarters to Dallas.

In March of 1926, G. B. Dealey and his two sons, Walter A. Dealey and E. M. "Ted" Dealey, announced the Dealey family had purchased the Belo Corp.

Ted followed his father as publisher of the Dallas Morning News. He received a bachelor's degree at the University of Texas, a master's degree at Harvard, and joined the staff of the News as a reporter in 1920. He became a member of the board of directors when the Dealey family purchased the corporation in 1926.

Ted Dealey never forgot that a newspaper's basic responsibility is to inform its readers accurately of the facts and he continued his own reporting efforts even into his last years of life.

Carved in the stone front of the Dallas Morning News building in large enough letters to be read a block or more away, is that statement which stands at once as a pledge to readers and a charge to employees:

Build The News upon the rock of truth and righteousness. Conduct it always upon the lines of fairness and integrity. Acknowledge the right of the people to get from the newspaper both sides of every important question.

Those were the words of G. B. Dealey. His son Ted lived by those words, and he demanded that his newspaper live by them.

His biggest story was probably his reporting of the Japanese surrender aboard the U.S.S. Missouri in Tokyo Bay in 1945. His dispatches were later published in a book called "Sunset in the East."

Mr. President, we are living in a time when the foundation of mass communications, the daily newspaper, is facing every increasing competition due to scientific and technological advancement which now makes it possible for millions of Americans to see events instantaneously as they occur from as far away as the moon.

Ted Dealey was born into a world that did not even know of the existence of radio signals. The main communications problem of those days was not how to get the information to the people first, but how to get it to them at all.

In the past several years, problems of economics have forced many newspapers to link themselves together or to resign themselves to either failure or continuing mediocrity. The Dallas Morning News was fortunate to have been located in one of our Nation's fastest growing communities; but the fact that the News has continued to improve itself, has remained a communications leader in the Southwest and has avoided outside financial control is indeed a tribute to the man who has provided it with executive leadership for more than 40 years, Mr. E. M. "Ted" Dealey.

The city of Dallas and the State of Texas will miss him.

Personally, I have lost a friend that I esteemed infinitely as a man.

SEYMOUR MELMAN DESCRIBES A MAJOR MILITARY BUDGET CUT

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, one of the most provocative and incisive minds in the Nation today is that of Prof. Seymour Melman, professor of industrial engineering at Columbia University. He is the author of several important books, including "Our Depleted Society," "The Peace Race," and the forthcoming "Pentagon Capitalism."

Recently, he has described the formula that could be used to reduce our massive military budget from approximately $80 billion to $26 billion. I ask unanimous consent that his article, entitled "How To Cut the Military Budget by $54 Billion," and published in Commonweal magazine for November 28, 1969, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOW TO CUT THE MILITARY BUDGET BY $54 BILLION

(By Seymour Melman)

In the name of defense, the government of the United States has constructed the most formidable military establishment in the world. It includes 3.5 million uniformed personnel and 1.2 million civilians; 18 army divisions; 35,000 aircraft; 347 warships; over $200 billion in physical assets; 29 million acres of U.S. land; over 2,000 foreign bases and military locations; 10's of thousands of nuclear warheads; and 4,200 deliverable nuclear warheads mounted in vehicles (missiles and planes) of intercontinental range.

The effect of this military power includes a capability for killing any other society many times over. With only 156 Soviet cities with populations of 100,000 or more, the U.S. clearly wields overkill power of staggering, even if unknown, dimension. It is meaningless to determine whether this dimension is two, twenty, two hundred or two thousand.

Nevertheless, the one thing that the Department of Defense cannot deliver is the defense of the United States, in the elemental sense of shielding the nation.

In the nuclear era they can destroy us, we can destroy them and it doesn't matter who moves first.

Furthermore, this destruction can now be carried out by multiple means. There is overkill in nuclear weapons. There is overkill in biological weapons. There is overkill in chemical weapons. A hundred million doses of nerve gas are stockpiled in steel containers in the Army's Chemical Warfare branch outside Denver. Since the Kennedy Administration, the United States has been mass-producing biological warfare materials. There are multiple delivering systems for nuclear warheads: missiles, planes, mines, balloons, rockets, torpedoes and demolition kits; as well as for bacterial and other weapons.

I shall outline here a set of proposals that have been sent to each Member of the Congress. These proposals would reduce the overkill system so that, before any disarmament agreements, there would remain an armed force of 2.3 million, a nuclear delivery system of staggering dimension and naval and other forces of enormous size. Therefore, let no one call the consequence of what I am about to outline "disarmament" or "unilateral disarmament." I shall also outline a series of budget reductions totaling $54 billion. The purpose of the budget reductions is: first, to improve the military security of the United States, for reduction of military tension systems would achieve this effect; and second, to emphasize that this is the essential step for making funds available for serving the requirements of life in this and other societies.

We should appreciate where we stand. Even though the United States has a Gross National Product of $900 billion for 200 million people, $4,500 of GNP per person, we are a depleted society. What is a depleted society?

40.7 percent of the young men examined by the Selective Service in the last recorded year were rejected on grounds of being physically or educationally incompetent. That is a depleted society.

The United States ranks 18th among nations in the world in infant mortality rates. Sweden ranks the lowest at 12/1,000 compared to the United States' 23/1,000. The difference is 40,000 infant fatalities a year. That is a depleted society.

In 1950 there were 105 M.D.'s in private practice for each 100,000 citizens. There are now 98. That is a depleted society.

An average of 25 percent of the nursing posts budgeted in our hospitals stand vacant. That is a depleted society.

Ten million Americans live with hunger as a sustaining condition. That is a depleted society.

The American College of Surgeons warns that half of the emergency ambulances in the United States are operated by morticians. That is a depleted society.

Half of the school buildings in New York City are in violation of the city's own building code. That is a depleted society.

64 percent of the basic metalworking machinery used in American industry is ten years old or over, giving the United States the distinction of operating the oldest stock of metalworking machinery of any major industrial country in the world. That is a depleted society.

The steel industry, the machine tool industry, the civilian electronics industry and the shipbuilding industry are incompetent as producers of ordinary products able to hold their place even in domestic, let alone world, markets. That is a depleted society.

REASONS

Why do we have such depletion with a Gross National Product of $4,500 per person? Because an important part of that $4,500 consists of parasitic rather than productive growth. Productive growth means goods and services that are part of the level of living that can be used for further production. Parasitic growth means goods and services, however well paid for, that are not part of the level of living and cannot be used for further production. Military and allied activity are parasitic economic growth. They absorb a lion's share of the technical brains of this society. Lacking this stock of skilled manpower imposes pervasive shortages on the rest of the productive capability of the American economic system.

We have spent over $1,000 billion for military purposes since the Second World War, but have not purchased security. However, since 1961 we have purchased a state management system that has replaced the so-called military-industrial complex. The state management, owing to the energies of Kennedy, Johnson and McNamara, is like the central administrative organization of large multidivision firms. This central office, staffed with about 55,000 persons, operating out of Washington, D.C., dominates the largest network of submanagement and industrial resources in the world. As in most modern corporations, this management does not own the underlying facilities. The state management in the Pentagon exercises control and that is sufficient.

The operations of the state management and its normal institutionalized intensity for extending its decision power explain many things. For instance, although the continued piling up of nuclear and other overkill is militarily irrational and humanly meaningless, it is eminently serviceable to a management striving to sustain or enlarge its industrial sway. No industrial management operates to diminish its decision power, and this is no exception. There is another consideration that tells of tension within the United States. That can be summarized as an issue of economic development or race war.

The under-classes of American society, the impoverished whites, blacks, Spanish Americans, Indians and others now understand that economic underdevelopment need not be their lot. The combination of higher mortality rate and limited life span, high incidence of certain diseases through life, limited education, limited literacy, limited productivity and limited income is called economic underdevelopment everywhere in the world. To change this requires economic development and investment in what economists call human capital. Human capital means investment in the capability and opportunity for productive employment. Allowing for approximately 7½ million economically underdeveloped equivalent family units, each needing an average outlay of $50,000 over a 10 year period, the total requirement for economic development is $375 billion, or an annual average of $37 billion. Such an operation is unfeasible at the present time. Even if the Congress were to vote the funds, the hands and brains needed to carry out the requisite work are occupied elsewhere.

The pressure for more equality along racial and economic lines in the United States can only be met by making economic development possible. Otherwise this pressure leads to a collision course in many facets of life. How are the universities to greatly enlarge admissions? How can they make up for backwardness induced by poor public and secondary schools? With present resources, the admission of blacks and Spanish Americans on a large scale may only be effected by limiting the white admissions. Then we will be on the road to race confrontation even in the universities.

The same pattern prevails elsewhere, 48 percent of white America is in white collar occupations, while only 22 percent of nonwhite Americans is so engaged. In order to equalize economic opportunity, 26 percent of the nonwhites gainfully employed must move into white collar occupations. The workable issue is not how to divide up the present economic pie, but dividing up a larger pie so that the gain for one need not be the loss for another. In fact, the gain for one would be a gain for all. In order to have that option, instead of race confrontation, there must be a process of general economic development. However, that is thoroughly checkmated today by the priority given to military and related activity in this society.

Since 1961 the design of U.S. Armed Forces has been oriented to fighting three wars at once: a war (nuclear) in the NATO area, a war in the China area and a lesser military action in Latin America. This war plan does not constitute the defense of the United States. Rather, it is a basis for world-wide political hegemony by wielding military force.

At President Nixon's first press conference he suggested that what the nation needed in the sphere of defense was "sufficiency." Very well—what is "sufficiency?" In my view this should mean: (1) before disarmament is agreed, operation of a strategic deterrent force; (2) guarding the shores of the United States; and (3) capability for participating in international peace-keeping efforts. However, these criteria for military security exclude the following: (1) building up a nuclear first-strike capability against the Soviet Union or any other nation—it is precisely that capability which is being built up by enlarging the present nuclear delivery system as much as tenfold with a multiple warhead program called MIRV (Multiple Independently-Targetable Reentry Vehicles): and (2) the objective of conducting a program of Vietnam type wars. I judge these latter goals as contrary to the security of the United States. It is emphasized that after the substantial reductions recommended here are made, each for reason of merit, the Armed Forces of the United States would still consist of 2.3 million men operating masses of missile aircraft and naval forces of staggering power.

Incremental costs of the Vietnam war. A military expenditure of 20 billion per year pays for the incremental cost of the Vietnam war, that includes the additional ammunition, fuel matérial, etc. used up in fighting it. The Congress would instruct the President and the Department of Defense to terminate this war if they reduced the budget by this amount. ($20,000 mill.)

Reducing additions to strategic overkill. It is clear that no present or foreseeable research effort will make it possible for the armed forces of the United States, or any other nation, to destroy a person or a community more than once. Nevertheless, the nuclear forces and delivery systems of the United States have been built up with multiples of overkill. With present capability for delivering 11,000 nuclear warheads (of these 4,200 by intercontinental vehicles) and only 156 Soviet cities with populations of 100,000 or more, continuing the buildup of these forces is absurd.

New nuclear weapons production. The proposed budget for the Atomic Energy Commission includes funds for further production of nuclear materials and weapons which should be stopped as being militarily and humanly unreasonable. ($1,518 mill.)

Research, development, test and evaluation. A major part of new military research activity is oriented to new strategic weapons delivery systems, which adds to the proliferation of overkill forces. ($5,000 mill.)

Poseidon and Minuteman III. These "new generation" intercontinental missiles (with MIRV) would enlarge the U.S. stock of nuclear warheads by a factor of about 10, and perhaps allow for an increased calculated accuracy for a few hundred yards closer to target. This is bound to be perceived through Soviet eyes as an intended first-strike threat to their missile systems. ($1,000 mill.)

ABM. The proposed antiballistic missile system has been the subject of exhaustive debate. The technical workability of the system is under grave doubt on the grounds of complexity and the experience with an unsuccessful attempt to build an antiaircraft defense system. Although the antiaircraft system is much simpler, we know from a principal designer of this system (Dr. Jerome Wiesner of MIT) that it has failed. There is the further prospect that the construction of an ABM system will serve to escalate fear among nations and hence drive forward an already irrational arms race. ($904 mill.)

Chemical and Biological warfare. Since 1961 the United States has been producing and stockpiling increasing quantities of lethal chemical and biological warfare materials. This mass production means more overkill weapons systems. In addition, the very existence of these materials, in quantities, exposes the people of the United States to grave hazards because of possible accidents in the handling of lethal, self-propagating organisms. ($350 mill.)

Advanced Manned Strategic Aircraft. In the face of already existing massive overkill capability, the proposal to build additional and new highspeed bombers seems to be only another example of organizational and industrial empire-building. ($102 mill.)

Bomber defense system (SAGE). It has long been understood that the Soviets do not have meaningful long-range bomber capability. When this is coupled with the known defects in functioning of the SAGE-type system, there is no reason for incurring the large cost that operating it would involve, especially as it would add little to the defense of the United States. ($1,000 mill.)

Surface to air missiles. Former Pentagon staff have indicated that substantial savings could be made by holding back on major spending for ineffective antiaircraft missiles, and deferring production on apparently inadequate designs. ($850 mill.)

Overkill also exists in other than strategic or nuclear forms. The Federal Budget includes many items which add to our overkill capability in conventional wars. These items, some of which I shall enumerate below, must also undergo reductions in order to prevent waste and contain the proliferation of the military.

Vietnam war manpower. The Vietnam war uses about 639,000 soldiers, sailors and airmen, at an annual cost of $10,000 per man. As the Congress instructs the Department of Defense and the President to refrain from operating wars of intervention, these 639,000 men would not be required. ($6,390 mill.)

Surplus military manpower. Analysts in the Department of Defense have reported that substantial savings could be made in all the services by a 10 percent cut in "support" forces, which have been unjustifiably large compared with other armies of the world. In addition, manpower savings could be effected by reducing the large category of "transient" personnel. The result of these two reductions is $4.2 billion, using the $10,000 per man year figure. ($4,200 mill.)

Tactical aircraft programs. Specialists in the aviation field have indicated that elimination of overly elaborate and impractical electronic systems, and concentration on simpler (hence, more reliable) aircraft would make possible savings on a large scale. ($1,800 mill.)

Attack carriers. The United States now operates 15 attack carrier forces. Their justification is based on the 3-wars-at-once policy. Even a beginning of reasonable economy in the use of these forces permits substantial operating budget reductions. ($360 mill.)

Antisubmarine carrier forces. According to Pentagon specialists, these forces are known to have severely limited capability in their military function, casting grave doubt on the worth of continuing them. ($400 mill.)

Amphibious forces and Fast Deployment Logistics Ships (FDL). The amphibious forces are grossly overbuilt and presumably oriented to a Western hemisphere interventionist war mission. The FDL's are part of an expanded Vietnam wars program, and could be eliminated without reducing a massive military capability. ($500 mill.)

C5–A jet transport. Further production of this plane, which has been specifically designed to transport large numbers of troops for the Pentagon's worldwide policing and Vietnam wars program, should be dropped. ($500 mill.)

Military assistance. For some time it has been apparent that the U.S. military assistance program has been a major factor in encouraging and sustaining dictatorial and backward regimes in many countries. This outlay has no demonstrable relation to the defense of the United States. ($610 mill.)

New naval ship construction. We are informed in the federal budget for fiscal year 1970 that "The largest single 1970 increase proposed for General Purpose Forces is for a new ship construction program for our naval forces of $2.4 billion total obligational authority." Such enormous expenditures for naval forces are justifiable only in terms of the 3-wars-at-once military perspective. ($2,400 mill.)

Economies in training. A former Pentagon staffer (Office of Comptroller) recommended changes in training methods that would reduce costs appreciably. ($50 mill.)

Improved buying procedures. A series of straightforward steps can apparently produce major savings in Pentagon buying—by curtailing the expensive pattern of cost-overruns. ($2,700 mill.)

U.S. NATO forces. Pentagon staff indicate the feasibility of reducing forces in Europe by 125,000 and their backup by 50,000 men (at 10,000 per man year). ($1,750 mill.)

I would like to mention two more areas in which budget reductions should be effected—that is, military construction and the F–14 aircraft.

Military construction. The Budget for FY 1970 schedules diverse projects which require new military construction. Secretary of Defense Laird proposed a reduction of the $1,948 million military construction item by $634 million, leaving $1,314 million. This should be further reduced in order to limit the continued over-expansion of unnecessary military forces within the United States and abroad. ($1,000 mill.)

F–14 aircraft. Funds have been budgeted for the Navy's program for constructing a new class of fighter planes to be carried by its major aircraft carriers. These aircraft are of doubtful worth since there is no opposing force with comparable fleets of carriers against which they might operate. In addition, the enlargement of the carrier aircraft force involves a major addition to preparations for further Vietnam-type wars. This alone is the issue with respect to this aircraft (not whether the design is right, or the contractor competent). ($834 mill.)

IN CONCLUSION

I have now reviewed many items in the military budget for Fiscal Year 1970. I have shown how each one can be reduced or eliminated in order to sustain our military "sufficiency" without adding to our over-kill forces or continuing wasteful practices. These recommendations make possible savings of $54,200 million, leaving a still-immense military budget of $27 billion for a sufficiency U.S. defense force before disarmament. The difference between $27 and $81 billion is the overkill and the Vietnam war program, and the continued expansion of the Pentagon's decision-power. That is the issue.

CENTENNIAL YEAR FOR PURDUE UNIVERSITY

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, 1969 marks the 100th year of the founding of Purdue University, one of our Nation's largest and finest institutions of higher education. Established as a land-grant college in 1869 by an act of the Indiana legislature, Purdue has grown during the past century until it now enrolls approximately 25,000 students on its home campus and more than 12,000 others at four regional campuses throughout the State.

Today, Purdue University is widely recognized for its major contributions to and leadership in many fields. To mention only a few, it is noted for outstanding educational and research programs in such diverse areas as agriculture, engineering, basic science, industrial management, pharmacology, and home economics.

An excellent description of the significant role played by Purdue University in higher education was published in the October issue of Indiana Business and Industry. In the article, appropriate and deserved credit is paid to Dr. Frederick L. Hovde, president of Purdue for nearly 25 years, and under whose direction the university has made tremendous strides. As a tribute to the truly remarkable achievements made by this fine institution during its 100 years of history, I ask unanimous consent that the article entitled "Purdue—Its Heritage Is Strength, Stability for Indiana," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PURDUE—ITS HERITAGE IS STRENGTH, STABILITY FOR INDIANA

Purdue University's red-brick campus spreads out broadly over the 650 acres of a flat bluff against which the storied Wabash River nestles in its meander west and southward. The geometric ruggedness of its more than 115 principal buildings rises as single symbol of strength and stability from the fertile Hoosier soil.

Strength and stability loom centrally in the 100-year-old heritage of the state's land-grant institution. Founded at West Lafayette by act of the 1869 General Assembly—but really made possible through the largess of Lafayette businessman John Purdue, who gave his land, his money and his name—Purdue University is one of the solid rocks on which Indiana has been able to build, grow and prosper economically, socially and educationally.

Though you could list scores of individual Purdue accomplishments of direct value to the economic and social welfare of the state, nation and world, Purdue's principal product is an intangible one; Brainpower. Its continuing mission is just as intangible: Enlightenment and the preparation of people for life, socially as well as vocationally.

No one articulates the intangibles of a university as well as the man who has spent nearly one quarter of the university's first century as its president. Frederick L. Hovde, a smalltown North Dakotan who played football and studied chemical engineering at the University of Minnesota.

Excelling at both, he won a Rhodes scholarship and earned a master's degree at Oxford—and a small place in athletic history as the first American to make the Oxford rugby team. He already was embarked on a successful and distinguished career as an educator and scientist when in 1945, at age 37, he was picked as Purdue's seventh president.

Since, he has guided the university's growth and expansion through the crowded years of the GI Bill veterans of World War II, through the tumult and change in attitude and methodology wrought by the near-panic of Sputnik, and now through the perilous waters roiled by youthful impatience for social and political change on the campus.

"The purpose of the university," the president said in a recent commencement address, "is to educate. The purpose of the student is to learn. If both achieve their purposes, the result is an 'educated man' in so far as the process of formal instruction can produce such a man." Then, he said, ". . . during the next 25 years, if you pass the tests of experience and professional performance in your work, you may qualify as an educated man . . . (who) must be and is a man capable of the self-discipline required for the lifelong growth, development and refinement of the total being—mind, spirit and body."

The benefactors of the "educated man" defined by President Hovde have been the world generally and Indiana specifically. But there are tangible contributions to be mentioned, including a few obvious and historic ones: Purdue's early steam locomotive testing; development and research in which Purdue scientists transmitted an early, if not the earliest, TV picture; its cooperative work in network analysis with the Hoosier and other midwestern electric utilities; the work of one of its physicists, Dr. Karl Lark-Horovitz, whose research into the properties of germanium crystals led directly to the development of the transistor—and thus changed forever the scope of man's scientific horizons and his ability to investigate them; the generations of work by Purdue agriculturists helped revolutionize farming and gave mankind the technological ability to once and for all defeat world hunger.

The ways in which Purdue contributes usefulness to the world are countless and difficult to measure. Measure—if you can—the contribution of the university which produced the leader of man's first expedition to the moon, Neil A. Armstrong.

At the age of 100, Purdue, now with about 25,000 students at its West Lafayette campus and nearly 13,000 at four regional campuses, having graduated about 100,000 in its first century, finds itself unexcelled in its traditional educational missions.

Witness its School of Agriculture, which is second to none in the nation and which has made invaluable contributions to Hoosier farming and agri-business.

Witness the fact that Purdue still ranks first nationally in numbers of undergraduate engineers it trains.

Witness the fact that nowhere in the world on any given day are as many people involved in the study of the basic sciences as at West Lafayette.

Witness the fact that Purdue's School of Pharmacy and Pharmacal Sciences, the only offering of its kind at a state-supported institution in Indiana, has the largest graduate enrollment in the United States.

Beyond the somewhat philosophical impacts, Puurdue University exerts a tremendous impact on the economy generally. In the 12-county Greater Lafayette region it qualifies as the largest employer, but its dollar impact is a contribution of more than $72 million, including net payroll, student spending, purchase of university supplies and residence hall food, rents and so forth.

Some of the indirect effects of this economic contribution include donations of more than $100,000 annually to the United Fund by university employees. Purdue educational conferences which bring 100,000 persons each year to the Lafayette community, and athletic events which this year will bring nearly 500,000 others to the campus.

And the university's affiliate, the Purdue Research Foundation, has contributions all of its own. One of the top Tippecanoe County property taxpayers, it also has been instrumental in helping to finance utility installations and school buildings and providing land for several West Lafayette recreation areas.

And PRF's development of the Purdue University Industrial Research Park on the north edge of West Lafayette has brought nearly 20 firms employing about 1,500.

Most significant has been a more than 50% growth over the last five years by way of dollars added to the economy—and Purdue officials see a healthy continuing growth rate, all to the good of the Greater Lafayette area if, indeed, not for all of Indiana.

Direct and specific contributions by the university of interest to Indiana business and industry can be cited in this way:

CONTINUING EDUCATION

Many programs have been developed exclusively for business and industry and perhaps the best known are the supervision programs offered by the School of Technology's Department of Industrial Supervision headed by Prof. Thomas F. Hull. The programs are led by industrial educators and are tailored for supervisory personnel of individual industries to develop supervisors who not only know their trade or occupation but how to successfully supervise others at it.

A glance at the university calendar of the Division of Conferences and Continuation Services produces other examples of the university's direct service to business and industry: The annual air pollution control conference, the annual conference of the Industrial Communication Council, workshop for the industrial engineer in practice, the metal fabricating institute, dairy fieldman's conference, industrial coal conference, roofing superintendent conference—and the list goes on.

And this does not include the year-around programs of the Life Insurance Marketing Institute directed by Prof. Hal L. Nutt. LIMI began in the early 1940s as a unique Purdue program and is now nationally known for the education of trained life underwriters.

SCHOOL OF TECHNOLOGY

Founded in 1964, the School of Technology was given the mission of providing two-year—and now four-year graduate directly oriented to the manpower needs of Indiana and Midwest industry. Its programs in the engineering technologies, aviation technology and nursing have gone a long way toward meeting serious trained manpower shortages. An agency established in the school at its founding, the Office of Manpower Studies, directed by Prof. J. P. Lisack, may be the university's most viable link for dialogue between the academic community and Hoosier business and industry. Conducting his surveys with the clock-work efficiency and thoroughness that he learned as an Air Force colonel, Lisack time and again has produced the hard-to-get facts upon which the university can develop undergraduate programs to meet specific industrial manpower needs. Notable among his surveys of business and industry have been those which showed the critical need at all levels for trained data processing manpower, especially in Indiana metropolitan areas where the computers are outstripping the men needed to run them. Lisack also did an interesting study which told the medium-sized business or industry that careful analysis of profitable use should precede any stampede towards computerization.

More recently, the Office of Manpower Studies came up with the figures which dramatically illustrated one of America's real commercial air traffic hang-ups: A critical shortage of qualified air controllers and air traffic specialists and the need for college-level training in this field to insure a continuing supply of highly trained professionals. The result may be a new air traffic controller school at Purdue under the direction of the school's famed Department of Aviation Technology.

Another Lisack study on the need of foundry technicians was the basis for a joint industry-faculty committee which developed a new two-year foundry technology curricula in which graduates are awarded the associate of applied science degree. The program was a classic case of "interface" between representatives of industry and representatives of Purdue to develop curricula relevant to industry manpower needs.

SCHOOL OF INDUSTRIAL MANAGEMENT

Though it's only 11 years old, Purdue's School of Industrial Management, along with its young (7 years old) partner, the Krannert Graduate School of Industrial Administration, is ranked among the best business schools in the country. Frequent visitors from overseas attest to the fact that the school's heavy emphasis on quantitative methods and use of computers has won attention around the world.

Instead of emphasizing specialization in business areas such as accounting, both schools aim at cultivating students' background in broad management and economic concepts to leave them free to rise in the world of business in directions in which their talents and opportunities happen to mesh. The schools combine the case study methods of Harvard with the quantitative methods emphasis of such other schools like M.I.T. Purdue's pairing of management and economics in a business school is rare among American universities.

Along with this broad-base education for future executives, the schools' faculty is making notable contributions to the state and nation in terms of public service and new knowledge from significant research.

Perhaps no service has had more widespread effect than that of Prof. Robert W. Johnson, one of the country's leading experts on consumer credit. Along with his imaginative teaching as a senior professor of finance, Johnson worked with Federal Reserve Board officials in drafting Regulation Z to implement the new "truth in lending" act, which became effective July 1. Then he wrote a booklet, "The Truth About Credit," in easily understood form, to help consumers learn what protections the new law provides for them. Previously, he served five years as reporter-economist in drafting a uniform consumer credit code, being recommended to state legislatures as a solution to a hodgepodge of credit regulations among the states.

In the Krannert School, and earlier in Chicago, Prof. Joseph C. Ullman has made extensive surveys of such labor problems as hiring costs, unemployment and displacement. One study indicated displaced persons more readily accept a different type of job by talking out their problems with workers in the same boat. He's spending this year in Washington helping evaluate programs of the Department of Labor.

Ullman also was a leader among half a dozen Krannert School professors who dug into their own pockets for initial financing of a new Business Opportunity Program for ghetto boys who wouldn't ordinarily go on to college. Now in its second year, BOP gives these boys from working class families special aids, financial and academic, along with special encouragement and counseling. The program now receives financial support from a number of Indiana industries.

As an extension of the BOP venture, the Krannert faculty is moving toward expanded opportunities for graduate study by black students in such areas as industrial relations.

The chronic battle between water pollution and health hazards for humans and wildlife is being tackled in a research project headed by Prof. Andrew B. Whinston. Using engineers' data on stream flow and waste discharge in the west fork of the White River, Whinston will attempt, through mathematical models, to determine optimal arrangements for waste treatment—or even long-distance piping of wastes to better use the self-cleansing capabilities of rivers.

A new study of natural gas regulations directed by Prof. Keith C. Brown will eventually given President Nixon's science advisors guidelines for a new energy policy. And Prof. Eugene E. Cominskey is probing the thickets of reports to stockholders to demonstrate how various accounting procedures can yield a wide disparity in reported earnings. Pressure from independent auditors, he thinks, could narrow the allowable spread and give stockholders more readily comparable figures. Prof. William J. Breen has programmed computers to make investment decisions.

Prof. George Horwich was one of a small group of leading economists called to Washington to brief Treasury Secretary David Kennedy on the interaction of interest rates and funds.

HUMANITIES HELP BRIDGE SOME GAPS

Purdue's rapidly growing School of Humanities, Social Science and Education may be considered by some a deviation away from the traditional agriculture-engineering-science missions, but the humanities are making direct and valuable contributions to the Indiana economy.

For decades, Purdue has been considered a mecca for the study of industrial psychology, and modern industrial personnel practices in Indiana and elsewhere have their bases in work done by Purdue. It is true of other areas, too.

PURDUE'S COMMUNICATION

Research Center aims at helping management bridge communications gaps. Each year, the center, which is part of the Department of Communication, sends out copies of current research bulletins and other publications. The center works with businesses and other organizations on academic research programs, contract, research projects, and consulting assignments, according to Prof. W. Charles Redding, director.

Since it was formed in 1951, "the Communication Research Center has been in the forefront of academic research directly and explicitly concerned with human communication in business and industry in the United States," Redding says.

A new program begun last summer opens Purdue University's libraries to Hoosier businessmen and manufacturers. The program is intended to help the small businessman or manufacturer get the kinds of information that executives of larger firms get from their research staffs or consultants. Engineering, accounting and advertising are examples of the kinds of information which can be provided in response to executives' requests.

The Purdue University Placement Service does a lot more than arrange interviews between students and employers.

Each fall, the placement service conducts a college recruiting workshop. Beginning recruiters learn now to conduct interviews to gauge the worth of a student to their companies. Recruiters even get opportunities to polish their interviewing techniques by practicing with Purdue students.

Engineering—The smooth-running wheels of Indiana industry have been greased and cared for for many years by Purdue engineers. The reason is simple:

Purdue has been teaching engineering for more than 90 years—before the invention of the adding machine, the airplane, the electric lamp, even before the high-speed internal combustion engine.

So it boggles the mind to compare the one student registered in civil engineering in the fall of 1876 with the 7,500 young men and women today seeking degrees in nine diverse engineering disciplines now offered by Purdue.

Ninety years ago one student was awarded a degree in civil engineering—for all practical purposes comparable to a certificate for a 1969 short course. Today, the interests of students range from geosciences to nucleonics, astronautics to soil mechanics, thermodynamics to materials handling, heat transfer to stochastics.

Since a subject like stochastics—a study involving random mathematical probabilities—wasn't even developed as recently as 10 years ago, it is simply not possible to compare Purdue's engineering offerings, even as late as World War II, to today's program of education; nor the graduates of yesteryear with the present.

The problem is, as always, not keeping up with the needs of technologically based society, but staying ahead of them if possible. Thus, research and development—the production of new and useful knowledge—is also a part of the Purdue engineering scheme.

Do you know that Purdue developed a model road numbering system which has been adopted by hundreds of counties and townships across the nation? Probably not, but fire truck and ambulance drivers can quickly reach any intersection in these areas today because of this grid system.

The list of developments is virtually endless—by the time the most recent is reported, another demands attention:

Professors in fluid mechanics are building models of human organs to find out how they work; sanitary engineers are developing a harmless radioactive bombardment to kill pollutants in environmental wastes; highway planners are utilizing plastic foam to prevent frost heave in pavement; engineers are pooling their knowledge with animal scientists to learn the best living conditions for farm stock; other engineers, working side by side with audiologists, are helping the deaf to communicate.

From these random examples, it is evident that an increasing number of contributions from the Schools of Engineering are both people-oriented as well as thing-oriented. This reflects the high regard Purdue holds in producing engineers with a greater awareness of the socio-economic responsibilities involved in practicing their profession.

THE THERMOPHYSICAL

Properties Research Center (TPRC) at Purdue provides data of some 16 thermophysical properties of more than 50,000 different substances. Information is also available from exhaustive publications produced by this center. It is quite possible that refinements and increased efficiency of electric range ovens and surface elements could be traced to data supplied manufacturers by TPRC.

Information on file at TPRC can tell the scientist and engineer what substances are best for shielding spacecraft re-entering the earth's atmosphere, or what materials will keep hotcakes from sticking to the frypan.

Unique in Indiana is the R. W. Herrick Laboratories, where researchers in engineering and life sciences work together. They research the effects of climate and environment on diet, growth rate, fertility and blood chemistry in the study of husbandry, and the engineering application of the machines to environmental control in the home and industry. Psychologists, too, are called upon to investigate the effects of climate control on the health and comfort of humans.

And out of Purdue's School of Industrial Engineering come graduates, research and knowledge of direct use for industry. One of its faculty, Prof. Ruddell Reed, is considered a foremost authority in a field now receiving renewed and important attention from all quarters of the economy—materials handling. Reed's and Purdue's contribution in this specialty are highly sought.

Holding a high priority this year is the study of noise, listed along with water and air pollution as factors directly affecting man's environment, at home as well as at work. The work ranges from basic studies in understanding the mechanisms of sound generation to designing means of reducing the irritating and debilitating noise in everyday life.

Virtually everything that's noisy is of interest to engineers in the Herrick Laboratories—fans, compressors, sump pumps, furnaces, air-conditioners, refrigerators. They are equally interested in devices to dampen sound—mufflers, acoustical materials, shields, insulators. If you have noticed over the years that motors in the home or factory have become less noisy, it isn't because you have become conditioned; engineers have found ways to quiet them.

Research not only spins off services to Indiana and the nation, but serves the double purpose of keep professors at the cutting edge of new knowledge which, in turn, is displayed and demonstrated in the classroom. The oft-repeated phrase, "The best teacher is also a student," is a truism in higher education, because this is what it is all about—particularly at Purdue.

With the rising costs of food and labor, it's no wonder the check that seems high to the patron barely covers a restaurant manager's overhead these days.

The problem, however, is not insoluble as evidenced by hundreds of successful restaurants and motel-hotel operations in Indiana.

These problems—all involving the customer—have in fact given rise to Purdue University's new approach to educating food-management people, and it's paying off for some Hoosiers.

Said one Holiday Inn representative: "The graduates we have hired have been outstanding and are doing an excellent job." Others concur, saying they need management people who can improve skills and instill a sense of pride in those whom they supervise.

"But then training of food service people is not a one-way street," says Dean Eva L. Goble of Purdue's School of Home Economics. As she points out, "The restaurateurs work closely with Purdue, visiting annually with students, telling them of the complexities of business as well as the opportunities."

The school's Institutional Management Department, where men outnumber women three to one, relies heavily on industry representatives and alumni, who are now in jobs of responsibility, to keep them informed.

And as requests for advice and information from industry have increased, the department now provides a staff member whose responsibility is to offer direction and counsel to schools, hospitals and commercial restaurants.

SCHOOL OF PHARMACY

"The pharmacist has become the last available health professional for many people," Dean Varro E. Tyler, of the Purdue School of Pharmacy and Pharmacal Sciences, says.

"Not only does he prepare and dispense drugs, but he also is a counselor to the public on their safe and effective use He may advise a client to see a physician, and he keeps records of family medication—to see if the patient is taking other drugs which might conflict."

Established in 1884, the Purdue school is entering a new era this fall, with the completion of the new Pharmacy Building scheduled for mid-winter. The new $6.8 million facility, the largest pharmacy facility of its kind in the nation, will provide 148,000 square feet of floor space. In a state which ranks near the top in drug manufacture, Purdue's interest is typical.

During the last 85 years, the Purdue Pharmacy School has achieved an enviable reputation. More than 3,700 students have graduated, and Purdue ranks first in the country in graduate school enrollment, with about 165 students in the graduate program this fall. Approximately 460 undergraduates are enrolled.

With 80 colleges of pharmacy in the U.S. and Canada, 11% of their full time staff members received advanced degrees from Purdue and 15% of the 80 deans are Purdue graduates. For the six Canadian schools, 17% of the staff and 33% of the deans did their advanced work at Purdue.

Not only will the new building permit academic expansion, it will also consolidate under one roof pharmacy activities now conducted in six locations on campus.

"With the new building and its provisions for heretofore unavailable facilities here at Purdue, we expect to gain even greater advances in the fields of scientific education and research," Dean Tyler says. "We expect our graduates to assume an even larger leadership role in research, industry and education."

During the past year, some 15 per cent of all Indiana pharmacists were reached by closed circuit TV programs over the Purdue network to 10 viewing locations throughout the state. Frequent conferences and seminars are another phase of the continuing education program for practicing pharmacists in a field which changes so rapidly that most of the drugs in use today were unknown 10 years ago.

So great were the advances in pharmacy following World War II that Purdue expanded the curriculum to five years, in 1960, to qualify students for a B.S. degree. Freshmen normally enroll in a pre-pharmacy option in the School of Science.

SCHOOL OF SCIENCE

One of the Purdue plusses for business and industry is its School of Science, where no one academic department has all pure scientists or all applied researchers. Each has some primarily interested in basic research and others in applying the research results.

In the Purdue Department of Physics, staff work at opposite ends of the basic-applied spectrum is exemplified by those who examine what happens to atomic particles in the university's new 20 mev particle accelerator and those who investigate the properties of materials.

In the school's Mathematics Division, there are both the pure mathematician and the computer scientist. The IBM 7094 and CDC 6500 together comprise the largest computer capability in the state and are the heart of the Indiana Regional Computer Network, making available the benefits of this huge computer complex to seven other colleges and universities and four local high schools. A more recent link-up was between the 6500 and satellite computers at Purdue's four regional campuses at Hammond, Fort Wayne, Indianapolis and Westville.

Purdue believes that the intermingling of applied and basic scientists in the various departments is a vital factor in shortening the time gap between discovery and application. Dean Felix Haas notes that having both types of scientists in the same department is the ideal situation to profit from discovery.

SCHOOL OF VETERINARY SCIENCE

Indiana's agribusiness complex and the animal agriculture segment are served in many ways, by the Purdue Veterinary School.

Of the school's 326 graduates (the first class was graduated in 1963) 111 practice veterinary medicine in Indiana.

Purdue-graduated doctors of veterinary medicine—

Assist in the prevention and treatment of disease of food-producing animals and are responsible in Indiana for meat inspection at the state and federal level.

Serve urban residents in treating companion animals.

Work in the pharmaceutical industry in both human and animal biological production fields.

Aid in solving disease problems for the large feed-producing concerns in Indiana.

Are employed by municipal zoos in the larger Indiana metropolitan areas.

Regulate livestock movement and control animal disease for the Indiana Animal Health Board and the Federal Animal Health Division.

Those DVM's who go on to earn M.S. and Ph. D. degrees from the Purdue veterinary school conduct animal disease research beneficial to both livestock and companion animals. These people have key research posts with the federal government and such pharmaceutical firms as Eli Lilly, Dow Chemical, Commercial Solvents and Mead-Johnson.

Research at the veterinary school tackles applied problems which relate directly to the consumer or animal owner and is part of the school's continuing program.

And Purdue, through the Agricultural Experiment Station and the veterinary school, operates two animal disease diagnostic laboratories, the main one at West Lafayette and the branch, opened in September, on Purdue's Southern Indiana Forage Farm near Jasper.

PHILANTHROPIC FOUNDATIONS IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. McINTYRE. Mr. President, one of the vitally important sections of the tax reform bill now under consideration is that portion dealing with the treatment of private foundations and charitable institutions. Though the existence of abuses in the present system cannot be denied, we must, however, exercise extreme caution to insure that these organizations can continue their efforts which have vastly enriched the quality of life throughout our country's history.

A brief and concise explanation of the activities of our Nation's private foundations is set forth in a booklet entitled "Philanthropic Foundations in the United States." I ask unanimous consent that the pamphlet be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the pamphlet ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PHILANTHROPIC FOUNDATIONS IN THE UNITED STATES

PRIVATE GIVING FOR THE PUBLIC WELFARE

The following contributions to the quality of American life have one thing in common. They have all received crucial support from philanthropic foundations.

Thoroughgoing reform of medical education.

Free public libraries.

Scholarship programs to help talented students get a college education.

Control of yellow fever.

Robert H. Goddard's pioneering experiments in rocketry.

A pension system for college and university faculties.

Nationwide drive against loan-shark practices.

Legal aid and defense for the poor.

Greater educational and economic opportunity for Negroes.

Public television and the use of television as an educational tool.

Discovery of the "genetic code" mechanism that shapes all plant and animal cells.

Foundations are nonprofit, nongovernmental organizations set up as corporations or trusts, usually under state laws, to receive and distribute funds for the advancement of human welfare. Their funds typically come from the investment of their principal, or corpus, which consists of the gifts and bequests of their founders. They do not normally solicit contributions from the public. (There are some fund-raising organizations that use the name "foundation," but these are not foundations in the strict sense.)

Foundations are, therefore, instruments whereby private wealth becomes, in effect, a public endowment. The income they earn on their principal funds is given away each year for the support of worthwhile organizations, programs, and projects. Often they spend part of their capital as well. The specific sums given by foundations are known as grants, and most foundations are "grant-making" institutions. A few, however, use their funds for the support of programs of research and service that they themselves administer. These are known as "operating foundations."

While the philanthropic foundation has many special features, it is fundamentally an outgrowth of a deep-seated American tradition which John W. Gardner has called "private initiative for the public good." America has been notable for its reliance on voluntary, nongovernmental efforts to promote the general welfare.

Foundations are one component in the broader philanthropic enterprise. Voluntary contributions provide essential support for the nation's colleges and universities, its hospitals, museums, symphony orchestras, and virtually all religious institutions. Thousands of local agencies throughout the country concerned with recreational programs, care of the elderly, family service, and civic betterment also depend on private funds. The donations of millions of individual citizens sustain the work of such national organizations as the Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts, the 4–H Clubs, the Red Cross, the Y.M.C.A., Y.W.C.A., and Y.M.H.A., as well as organizations devoted to the conquest of disease—the American Heart Association, the American Cancer Society, and others.

In 1968, voluntary giving in the United States totaled $15.8 billion. Of this amount, $12.1 billion, or nearly 77 percent, came from individual givers, and the rest from foundations (9 percent), charitable bequests (8 percent), and business corporations (6 percent).[1]

Governmental expenditures in traditional fields of philanthropy—education, health, and social welfare—are growing, but so is private giving for the public good. In 1968 the American people reached the highest level of contributions ever achieved anywhere in the world. If to this is added the time that over 50 million citizens contributed to voluntary agencies in their communities, the record is even more remarkable.

RATIONALE OF PHILANTHROPY

Neither a rising standard of living nor expanded governmental services has reduced the need for private giving. Educational, recreational, and health programs are still not properly supported. The arts are undernourished. Widespread poverty persists. Automation and expanding technology have brought new problems as well as advantages in their wake. Looking beyond their own shores, Americans also want to help the poorer countries in their economic and social development and their struggle to reduce population growth and increase food supply.

But the justification for volutary effort goes beyond the need for adequate financial support. Theoretically it would be possible for government to provide all the funds now supplied by private donors. That approach has been adopted in many parts of the world, particularly in the totalitarian countries. Americans, however, have cherished the values of diversity and pluralism. They have not wanted total governmental control of such fields as education, welfare, health, and the arts. Private effort in these fields makes for greater freedom of choice and healthy competition in ideas and policies. As De Tocqueville pointed out, the reliance on voluntary organizations is one of the most important feature of the American tradition.

Privately supported organizations enhance the public welfare by their broad freedom to innovate. They can readily try out new ideas and adopt improved techniques and standards that become models for other institutions, governmental and private. For instance, several foundations led the way in providing better education for both the disadvantaged and the academically talented. Organizations financed with private funds frequently help governmental agencies improve their performance. Hundreds of private colleges and universities, for example, are providing in-service training for public school teachers in their areas; and in many cities voluntary, nonprofit agencies have been set up to assist municipal departments and agencies—the schools and public health, welfare, and police departments—to provide comprehensive attacks on the social problems of blighted neighborhoods.

In addition, leaders from the private sector often serve on independent study groups, financed by foundations and appointed to make recommendations on subjects of vital importance to the public. Recent examples are the Carnegie Commission on Educational Television and the National Commission on Community Health Services, which was supported by four foundations.

LEGAL INCENTIVES

Since the Colonial period, public policy in the United States has supported the conviction that private, as well as governmental, institutions should participate in defining and helping to meet social needs and problems. Thus "public service" in America does not always mean "governmental" service. American society bolsters this principle in two ways.

First, it provides tax incentives to individuals and business organizations to encourage them to contribute funds to private, nonprofit institutions and voluntary agencies. Individual and corporate gifts for charitable, religious, and educational purposes are deductible on tax returns. Inheritance and estate tax laws also encourage giving for philanthropic purposes.

Second, through their elected representatives, Americans have provided legislative incentives for the organization and growth of private, nonprofit institutions serving the public welfare, such as universities, hospitals, foundations, and research organizations. Nonprofit charitable, religious, and educational institutions are granted tax exemption because they serve the common good.

The laws, administrative rulings, and judicial decisions supporting these incentives are based on the principle that private institutions devoted to the public welfare relieve the government of burdens it would otherwise have to assume or, equally important, perform functions that government cannot or should not perform. Professor Milton Katz, of the Harvard Law School, has explained the tax exemption of foundations as follows:

The key to the modern philanthropic foundation is its nature as both a public and a private institution. The public-private amalgam is the key to the performance and promise of the philanthropic foundation. . . .

Some might ascribe the public component in the dual nature of the general philanthropic foundation to its enjoyment of tax exemption. To do so would mistake an effect for a cause. The foundation has been accorded tax exemption in recognition of its public-private nature. Its nature would remain unchanged even if tax exemption were withdrawn. The foundation is public because it devotes all its resources exclusively to educational, scientific, religious, charitable or other public purposes and applies none of its resources to the pecuniary advantage of any person (other than regular compensation for services rendered). It is private in the sense that it is nongovernmental and derives its resources from gifts by private donors (or income from the investment of such gifts). It is a privately organized public institution.[2]

HISTORY AND SCOPE OF FOUNDATIONS

Organized philanthropy has roots going back to pre-Christian times, and the legal basis of philanthropy in the United States can be traced to the English Statute of Charitable Uses, enacted in 1601. However, the pattern of the modern foundation may be attributed primarily to Andrew Carnegie and John D. Rockefeller, who developed the idea at the beginning of the twentieth century. The first major foundation was the General Education Board, established by Mr. Rockefeller in 1902. This was followed by the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching in 1905, Russell Sage Foundation in 1907, Carnegie Corporation of New York in 1911, and the Rockefeller Foundation in 1913.

By 1930 the essential characteristics of this new institution had been fairly well defined. The foundation in its purest form has substantial endowment, its governed by a board of trustees composed of men and women selected for their judgment and vision, has a competent professional staff, and sees its task as that of devising programs of grants addressed to the solution of basic problems. Heavy emphasis is placed on research, experimentation, and demonstration.

From the modest beginnings of the first decade of this century, the number of foundations has now increased to about 22,000, with estimated total assets of $20.5 billion, at market value, and annual expenditures of approximately $1.5 billion. Since foundations are required by law to disburse their income within a reasonable period after it is received and may not accumulate it, the funds spent by foundations represent virtually all of their income and some principal. As has been mentioned, foundation grants account for about 9 percent of voluntary giving in the United States.

Most foundations are small, but 29 have assets exceeding $100 million each. About 250 have resources of over $10 million and are classified as large foundations. Over 1,200 hold assets of $1 million to $10 million.

It is interesting to consider the size of the foundation enterprise in terms of economic yardsticks. The total annual grants of foundations amount to about 2/10 of 1 percent of Gross National Product. They are only 6/10 of 1 percent of the expenditures of government in the United States. According to a recent Securities and Exchange Commission report, foundations own 2.1 percent of common and preferred stock as compared, for example, with 66.5 percent held by individuals. While foundations have been growing in numbers and assets, the population has been increasing apace. So also have the nation's needs in health and education which amounted, to mention only two fields, to about $112 billion (13 percent of Gross National Product) in 1968.[3]

Thus in the perspective of overall public and private investment in the human development of a large and changing society, it is clear that the foundations have modest financial resources. Their importance lies not in their size but in their independence and in certain other advantages they possess as a special kind of institution.

DISTINCTIVE ROLE OF FOUNDATIONS

As independent organizations, foundations have broad freedom of judgment and decision within the limits set by law. They can formulate long-term objectives for their grant-making programs based on thorough studies of community and national problems. They can direct their work toward an intensive examination of the underlying causes of these problems in the hope that broad-scale action by other organizations and agencies will result.

The ability of foundations to perform this function rests on the following:

They can be selective, limiting their support to a few problem areas at a time and choosing the persons and institutions within them that show the most promise of making important advances.

They are free to pioneer in new fields and approaches. Through exploratory studies, experiments, and pilot ventures, they can exercise leadership in discovery and innovation.

They have flexibility, because their funds are relatively uncommitted. They do not have large payrolls and operating programs that have a first claim on their income. They can move rapidly into new fields, respond quickly to new needs, and act with precision. They are capable of what Gordon N. Ray, President of John Simon Guggenheim Memorial Foundation, has called "fine tuning." They can leave a given field when it is clear that other sources of support have become available.

They have the ability to persevere. Foundations are often referred to as organized philanthropy. More readily than other forms of philanthropy, they can plan their giving on a long-term basis. They can stay with a problem for a long period, placing their grants with utmost care to build on each advance.

These advantages enable well-administered foundations to achieve large results with modest funds. In an increasingly bureaucratic society, foundations can be centers of objective evaluation, of creativity, of flexibility of leadership based on ideas.

TYPES OF FOUNDATIONS

Foundations are such a diverse group of organizations that it is not easy to define the term "foundation." The most widely accepted definition is that followed by The Foundation Directory. A philanthropic foundation is defined there as a "nongovernmental, nonprofit organization having a principal fund of its own, managed by its own trustees or directors, and established to maintain or aid social, educational, charitable, religious, or other activities serving the common welfare." [4]

Foundations have traditionally been classified into five principal groups: general purpose, special purpose, company-sponsored, community, and family. These groups overlap to some extent, but they provide a rough framework by which to distinguish organizations that have rather different characteristics.

Most of the larger, well-known foundations are classified as general purpose. The approximately 370 foundations of this type operate under broad charters, usually have large endowments, are governed by distinguished boards of trustees, are administered by trained professional staffs, and address themselves to the basic problems of the fields in which they operate. Their interests are national and international. They hold about two-thirds of the assets of all foundations and account for more than half of the total amount of grants. They are also sometimes called "independent foundations," because they are not closely associated with a particular family or company or community. Most of the statements in this booklet about the distinctive purposes and role of foundations are made with the general-purpose or independent foundations in mind. In a sense they are the model or prototype of the modern foundation.

Examples are Carnegie Corporation, the Commonwealth Fund, the Danforth Foundation, the Field Foundation, the Ford Foundation, W. K. Kellogg Foundation, Charles F. Kettering Foundation, Russell Sage Foundation, the Rockefeller Foundation, Alfred P. Sloan Foundation, and Twentieth Century Fund.

Some 500 foundations, with about 10 percent of the assets, are special purpose. Many of them were created by will or trust instrument rather than by incorporation. They have very specialized objectives. Welder Wildlife Foundation, Sinton, Texas; Edwards Scholarship Fund, Boston; and Vera Institute of Justice and Milbank Memorial Fund, both of New York, are illustrations of this type. Many of the special-purpose foundations have made notable contributions.

There are about 1,500 company-sponsored foundations of significant size. Controlling approximately 6 percent of all foundation assets, they are closely associated with business and industrial corporations. Typically they receive annual appropriations from their sponsoring companies and are not heavily endowed. Often their programs of grants are directed primarily to communities in which the company has plants or offices. United community funds, higher education, hospitals, and more recently urban affairs receive special attention from most of the foundations of this type. Alcoa Foundation, Esso Education Foundation, the Sears-Roebuck Foundation, and United States Steel Foundation are among the larger company-sponsored foundations.

Some general-purpose foundations—Kellogg, Ford, and Lilly, for example—bear names identified with companies but are not company-sponsored foundations. In these cases the names come from the families that endowed them. They receive no contributions from the companies, though they may own company stock.

The community foundations are a small but important group. Some of them have exercised remarkable leadership in the improvement of their immediate geographical areas through surveys and experimental projects and in the support of essential community services. There are about 200 foundations in this class, representing some 3 percent of foundation assets. The larger of them are set up as trusts rather than corporations and are in effect clusters of small and medium-sized philanthropies under unified management. They are directed by committees broadly representative of their communities. They are closely associated with local banks and trust companies that handle their investments. Many of their funds are designated for quite specific purposes. The Cleveland Foundation is the oldest and largest of the community foundations; other well-known philanthropies of this type are the Chicago Community Trust, the New York Community Trust, the Permanent Charity

Fund of Boston, and the San Francisco Foundation.

About 15,000 of the 22,000 foundations in the United States are of the family type. That is, they receive their funds, either in the form of endowment or annual gifts, from an individual donor or members of his family who continue to be active in the management of the foundation. The great majority of these foundations are very small, operate quite informally, and have no professional staff. They account for about 15 percent of foundation assets. Their grants are typically made to well-established institutions and organizations in which the donors have a personal interest. Mary Reynolds Babcock Foundation, Winston-Salem, North Carolina; Louis W. and Maud Hill Family Foundation, St. Paul, Minnesota; the Kresge Foundation, Detroit, Michigan; Lilly Endowment, Indianapolis, Indiana; Richard King Mellon Foundation, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; the Moody Foundation, Galveston, Texas; Charles Stewart Mott Foundation, Flint, Michigan; and Woods Charitable Fund, Chicago, Illinois, and Lincoln, Nebraska, are among the larger family foundations.

Most of the general-purpose or independent foundations began as family foundations, and the line between the two groups is not sharp.

MANAGEMENT OF INDEPENDENT FOUNDATIONS

In view of the importance of the large general-purpose or independent foundations, some additional description of their organization and administration may be useful. As has been mentioned, they are governed by boards of trustees in much the same way as a university. The board is typically composed of leaders, elected for specified terms, from business, law, education, and similar fields. The trustees formulate the policies of a foundation; appoint its staff or at least the senior administrative officer (usually called the president or executive director); decide on the areas in which the foundation will make grants; and meet at regular intervals to review the program and authorize grants. A clearly defined program is essential if the foundation is to work effectively toward the objectives set by the trustees. Under state law the board has overall responsibility for management. It must in addition see that the foundation meets the requirements of federal law.

The trustees are also responsible for the sound investment and protection of the foundation's endowment or capital funds. The aim is to obtain as high a yield from investments as is consistent with safety and growth of principal. The foundation is, after all, a spending institution, and it is the business of the trustees to see that the investment policies provide adequate funds to carry out the program plans. Many foundations expend in grants more than their investment income; they dip into principal.

Often the donor makes his gift to the foundation in the form of stock in a single business of which he is an owner. The trustees will usually try to diversify the investment portfolio over a period of years, disposing of the original stock and investing funds in a broader range of securities.

The professional staff, who are typically experts in the fields in which the foundation works, investigate the grant applications that are received; study the possibilities of other types of grants that would be constructive; and make recommendations to the board. They travel widely, seeking out talented people, promising ideas, and forward-looking organizations in the foundation's fields of interest.

It is the responsibility of the staff to provide the board with all the information required by the trustees to assure themselves that the foundation is meeting the requirements of the law and using its funds efficiently in the public interest.

It is improper, both legally and morally, to use foundation funds to advance the business interests of the founders, trustees, or staff. Under the present laws governing the conduct of tax-exempt institutions, most such abuses can be corrected. In addition, foundation leaders have strongly supported proposed legislation aimed at eliminating the remaining financial abuses and insuring full public disclosure of foundation activities. Thus, foundation spokesmen have urged passage of legislation that would prohibit questionable business dealings between a foundation and its donor or donor-related parties; would require foundations to distribute their investment income within a reasonable period of time; and would prevent the preoccupation of foundations with business interests.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTABILITY

In common with other nonprofit organizations, foundations have both private and public characteristics. They are private in their right to independent initiative and decision-making, but they have legal and moral obligations to act explicitly and solely in the public interest. They are accountable to the public for their performance.

Annual foundation information returns (Form 990–A), filed with the Internal Revenue Service, include data on officers, grants, administrative expenses, income, capital, and investments, and are open to public inspection. Many foundations go far beyond this requirement. They publish comprehensive annual reports on their objectives and operations including detailed financial data, statements of policies, and descriptions of grants. A number of foundations issue reports and announce grants more frequently. Full public disclosure of information is perhaps the best way to assure that foundations are operating in the public interest.

Finally, foundations are open to examination by appropriate governmental authorities. The state attorneys general have supervisory powers, and Congress makes studies of foundations from time to time. Their activities are also subject to the scrutiny of the press. Their performance undergoes continuing evaluation by the academic and community institutions with which they work closely. Thus, colleges and universities, churches, social agencies, hospitals, cultural institutions, professional and research organizations, and a host of other nonprofit bodies are in constant touch with foundations and offer suggestions to them. These institutions are probably the best informed judges of the worth and effectiveness of foundation programs and ideas.

It has been said that philanthropy is an act of trust. It involves three parties—the giver, the receiver, and the public. The giver trusts the integrity and purpose of the receiver. The receiver, in turn, trusts the giver's obligation to respect his independence. And, lastly, the public trusts that this transaction is motivated solely by the desire to serve the common welfare.

FOUNDATION RECORD

Highlights of the contributions of foundations to human well-being in this century include the following:

They have been instrumental in establishing modern public health institutions and practices and have played a major part in the prevention of hookworm, malaria, yellow fever, and other endemic diseases, not only in the United States but throughout the world.

They took the lead in calling attention to the need for reform in medical education and have followed through by assisting in the development of the finest medical schools and medical research centers in the world. Foundation funds aided in the discovery of insulin, penicillin, and polio vaccines, and are providing continuing support for work on such diseases as cancer, heart disease, and arthritis.

They have helped to advance scientific agriculture. Beginning with demonstration farms to introduce better farming practices, they have subsequently financed work in plant genetics, plant pathology, and other sciences that have vastly increased crop yields. Foundations are also supporting agricultural research and extension in many of the world's less-developed countries, where farming is the main source of income.

Long before governments took official notice of the world population crisis, foundations began laying the groundwork for scientific and policy efforts toward birth control and are now a major source of support for domestic and worldwide biological and demographic research and for action programs aimed at regulating population growth.

In education, they have contributed broadly at all levels, from prekindergarten to postdoctoral study. In the early part of the century, they encouraged the establishment and expansion of elementary schools for children of all races, particularly in the rural South, and helped the nation achieve a system of universal secondary education.

They have strengthened the professional education of teachers, the development of educational testing, and research in child development and educational psychology.

In higher education, foundations have helped develop centers of excellence in all regions of the country. And to strengthen college teaching as a career, they began a system of faculty pensions, have assisted in the raising of salaries, and are financing thousands of graduate fellowships for prospective teachers.

In the post-World War II readjustment of the educational system to a period of exploding knowledge and soaring enrollments, foundations have helped carry out improvements in the recruitment and education of school and college faculty. They have helped improve the use of teachers' time and talent, particularly through the adoption of such modern techniques as instructional television and team teaching.

Individual student opportunity has long been a foundation goal. Foundations have expanded opportunities for the intellectually gifted to make the most of their talents and for those from deprived families to surmount motivational and cultural handicaps that limit their ability to learn.

Besides their efforts to improve the quality of the educational system, foundations have devoted large funds to fellowships and the advancement of knowledge. Individual scholars, university departments, and research agencies have received grants and fellowships for research and training in all branches of learning—not only in the medical and biological sciences but also in the physical and mathematical sciences, the social and behavioral sciences, the humanities, and such professional fields as law, business management, and engineering.

In addition to providing funds to strengthen university departments and schools, foundations support the work of such national organizations as the Social Science Research Council, the National Merit Scholarship Corporation, the Population Council, the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences, the American Council of Learned Societies, the National Bureau of Economic Research, Resources for the Future, and the Brookings Institution.

In the cultural field, foundations have contributed vastly to the growth of libraries and library science. Artistic institutions and groups—fine arts, museums, symphony orchestras, theater and opera companies—have also benefited from foundation support, as have many individual artists. Education in the arts has been aided, both at the professional level and as an aspect of general education.

Foundations have long been engaged in furthering adult education and in supporting programs to enable citizens to extend their knowledge of public affairs, including international relations.

Noncommercial television has developed as a new cultural resource largely through foundation support.

In social welfare, foundations have made a special impact by stressing ways to prevent social breakdown rather than merely alleviating its consequences. Through social research, social work education, and experiments to test out new ideas and approaches, they have helped public and private agencies to deal more effectively with the acute human problems of deprived urban and rural areas. Much recent state and national legislation concerned with delinquency, job training and counseling, and the attack on poverty at its source has taken account of foundation-supported experiments. Another area of social action spurred by foundation funds is the search for better ways to meet the needs of the nation's growing number of older citizens.

Foundations have pioneered in the advancement of legal rights for both the indigent and the consumer.

They have assisted major national and local civil-rights organizations and sympathetic religious, business, labor, and community groups in the effort to enable racial minorities to acquire social and economic opportunity and dignity in the mainstream of American life.

Finally, foundations have extended the American philanthropic tradition to other countries by helping their peoples develop the knowledge and skills to combat sickness, hunger, and ignorance. They are assisting the world's poorer countries in agriculture, medicine, health, public administration, technical training, family planning, and training in economics, business, and law. At the same time, particularly through grants to American colleges and universities for area studies of Asia, Africa, and Latin America, foundations are helping the United States obtain the knowledge of world affairs essential to its own international responsibilities.

ALLEGED ATROCITIES BY AMERICAN SOLDIERS IN VIETNAM

Mr. MONDALE. Mr. President, a shocked, dismayed, and confused public has been told of an incident at Song My Village in South Vietnam where American soldiers may have deliberately slaughtered innocent civilians—including women, children, and infants.

In the wake of such a revelation, filled with rumors and contradictory statements, we must be extraordinarily careful lest the accused be denied their rights of a firm and impartial trial. We cannot allow American soldiers to become a scapegoat for general rage and frustration over the war itself.

We must also be careful that we do not wrongfully implicate the vast majority of American servicemen for the criminal acts of a relative few. Although I strongly oppose this war and our current policies, I still maintain a great respect for the decency and morality of the American serviceman.

Having stated these warnings, however, I must add my voice to those who are calling for the fullest possible investigation into this and any other similar incident.

It would be easy and not without some truth to blame these acts upon the senseless and horrible war. But responsibility for acts during wartime must still lie with individuals.

Whatever justification we may have for this war—and I happen to believe that very little remains—must be based on principles of justice, morality, decency, and respect for the worth of individuals. Without such principles there can be absolutely no basis for our involvement in any nation at any time. Only a full investigation and just disposition of the charges now being made can affirm these principles and restore some credibility to American policy both at home and abroad.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a most timely and forthright editorial published in the Minneapolis Tribune, commenting upon this shocking incident.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MASSACRE IN SONG MY VILLAGE

Although much remains to be learned about the massacre in Song My village in South Vietnam by American soldiers, the evidence so far indicates that a horrible atrocity did occur on March 16, 1968. The latest evidence was the chilling statement of an ex-GI who told of firing into mothers hugging their children and begging to be spared.

Today, as we Americans celebrate another great feat in space and prepare for a traditional holiday in honor of America's bounties and goodness, we must also ponder the meaning of an event little different from the Communist atrocities at Hue. We ask ourselves how could we generous, peace-loving, God-fearing Americans—who recoiled in horror when the Nazis, on June 10, 1942, wiped out the Czech village of Lidice—commit an atrocity of similar proportions? Perhaps some of the answers can be found in the column by Anthony Lewis on today's editorial page.

The events in Song My—if published accounts are accurate—are a betrayal of what America stands for, betrayal of the good works so many thousands of Americans have undertaken in Vietnam. The events, if true, are a violation of the Geneva war conventions, as well as being a war crime under the Charter of the International Military Tribunal by which Nazi war criminals were brought to trial at Nuremberg.

Painful as the disclosures may be to all of us, the investigation of Song My must be pushed through to a conclusion, so that guilt or innocence of Song My participants may be determined, and so that, if guilty is the verdict, all Americans may learn how some Americans have acted in Vietnam. Many journalists and other observers have cited other atrocities by Americans in Vietnam, but never on the scale approaching Song My.

The killing of civilians long has been suspected as a prime cause for the high enemy body count reported weekly by the U.S. command in Vietnam. In any given period, say six months or a year, body count figures have always been much greater than changes in official estimates of enemy troop strength (even allowing for infiltration of fresh troops).

A review of our files shows this Associated Press account of the Song My action on the day it occurred: "SAIGON (AP)—U.S. infantrymen, in a hide-and-seek fight through the rice paddies and sand dunes along the central coast, killed 128 Viet Cong guerrillas today, the U.S. command said. A spokesmen said a company of the 11th Light Infantry Brigade, sweeping into an area that had been bombarded minutes earlier, tangled with guerrillas this morning. . . . A U.S. spokesman reported American casualties as two men killed and 10 wounded."

If the recent accounts of Americans present at Song My are correct, the account of the U.S. command was false. The dead at Song My were women, children and old men who were herded together—not guerrillas running through the rice paddies.

A few days later, the U.S. command reported 3,070 enemy deaths for the week that included Song My, then shortly thereafter "updated" the total to 3,642. How much of this total was made up of old men, women and children? How honest are U.S. military reports of lopsided victories in one-sided battles? Are some of them really more Song Mys?

Some of the public's reaction to Song My may turn into additional criticism of President Nixon's efforts to wind down the war. It should be noted, however, that Song My occurred under President Johnson and Gen. Westmoreland, then commander in Vietnam. His successor, Gen. Abrams, appears to have changed strategy and emphasis away from the kind of policies that may have caused Song My. We hope he has.

We believe America's combat involvement in Vietnam was a mistake. Song My is a tragic and shameful consequence of that mistake. The job is to extricate ourselves from that mistake, a job which now is in the hands of President Nixon. We believe most Americans will support a more rapid withdrawal from Vietnam, and we hope our President makes the decision to do this.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE RESEARCH

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, section 203 of the recently passed Military Procurement Authorization Act states:

None of the funds authorized to be appropriated by this Act may be used to carry out any research project or study unless such project or study has a direct and apparent relationship to a specific military function.

This provision was initiated by the distinguished majority leader and adopted by the Senate as a part of my amendment to cut back on several categories of Defense research. Subsequently, the amendment was adopted by the House Committee on Armed Services, so the item was not in dispute in conference.

Both the majority leader and I felt that the enactment of this provision would have a significant impact on the Department of Defense policies in support of non-mission-oriented research, for which some $400 million was spent last year. The purpose of the amendment was to get the Department of Defense out of the business of supporting academic research that is not directly related to military requirements, and break the trend toward greater reliance by university scientists on the largesse of the military. The increasing reliance by scientists for financial aid from the Defense Department is not healthy for the scientists, their universities, or our society. The Senator from Montana has suggested that a reasonable goal for carrying out section 203 would be to reduce Defense funding of academic research to "no more than 25 percent of that funded by the National Science Foundation by the end of fiscal year 1971." I agree.

But the Department of Defense has different ideas. It has decided to ignore the intent of Congress in enacting this provision. On October 8, following the publication of a news report about a Defense-financed research project to train birds to wage war, I wrote the Defense Department to ask for a report on the action it planned to take in response to section 203, and, specifically, how it viewed the bird project in the light of the intent of that provision.

The reply I received from Dr. John S. Foster, Jr., Director of Defense Research and Engineering, stated:

It has long been DOD policy to support only research which is relevant to military functions and operations. Most of our projects in the research and exploratory development budget categories (from which comes most of our university funding) are, in fact, relevant to many military operations. . . . I do not expect, therefore, that implementation of these sections will entail any new type of review or selection.

I ask unanimous consent to have this exchange of letters printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

It is unfortunate that Dr. Foster has chosen to flout the intent of Congress. I had hoped that the Defense Department would take steps to drastically reduce this type of research. It is now up to the Appropriations Committees to insure that the fiscal 1970 Defense research program is in keeping with the intent of section 203. I hope that the chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, the senior Senator from Georgia (Mr. RUSSELL), will have his committee take a very careful look at this program and insure that appropriate reductions are made.

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DIRECTOR OF DEFENSE RESEARCH AND ENGINEERING,
Washington, D.C., November 3, 1969.

Hon. J. W. FULBRIGHT,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Thank you for sending me the Washington Post article of 8 October 1969 concerning the Project Themis research at the University of Mississippi in the area of Biocontrol Systems.

Historically, animals have been used to perform a variety of tasks. For example: dogs and rescue operations in the Swiss Alps; geese for sentry duty (dates back to the Roman Legions); the carrier pigeons and porpoises to assist in undersea operations. More recently pigeons have been trained to cull out defective items from pharmaceutical and electronic small component inspection lines. Dogs have been trained to perform a variety of tasks that have proved helpful to our military personnel in Vietnam. Dogs can detect buried and above ground mines, booby traps and trip wires and warn of the presence of these devices. All of these applications have utilized some unique animal capacity to enhance man's operational capability or to save lives. It is our purpose in this research to extend and exploit such capabilities for use when our forces are exposed to situations such as those they now face. We believe that the potential of utilizing the unique capabilities of certain animals and birds should be investigated if by doing so human lives may be saved. I hope you will agree that this line of applied research has a direct relationship to specific military functions and operations.

We have been giving considerable thought to the implementation of Sections 203 of the House authorization bill and 205 of the Senate authorization bill which require that all Department of Defense research have a "direct and apparent relationship to a specific military function or operation." The research programs of the military departments and Defense agencies are under continual review by elements of DoD and receive, in addition, the critical scrutiny of my office. It has long been DoD policy to support only research which is relevant to military functions and operations. Most of our projects in the research and exploratory development budget categories (from which comes most of our university funding) are, in fact, relevant to many military operations. From time to time however, we eliminate support for research fields which are no longer relevant to DoD needs; high energy physics is a recent example. I do not expect, therefore, that implementation of these sections will entail any new type of review or selection. Nevertheless, Secretary Laird, Secretary Packard, and I have been instituting a number of new management approaches which will provide a basis for more coherent and explicit presentations to the Congress about the basis of our budget requests.

Sincerely,

G. L. TUCKER,
(For John S. Foster, Jr.)

OCTOBER 8, 1969.

Dr. JOHN S. FOSTER, Jr.,
Director, Defense Research and Engineering, Department of Defense, Washington, D.C.

DEAR DR. FOSTER: I noted the enclosed article in this morning's Washington Post concerning a contract with the University of Mississippi under Project Themis.

As you know, both the House and the Senate have added a provision to the military procurement bill which requires that all Department of Defense research have a "direct and apparent relationship to a specific military function or operation." I am interested in having your views on how this amendment will be implemented by the Department after it becomes law, along with some estimate of the types of contracts, and the amounts in dollars, that may be cut out in carrying out the intent of the Congress. I would also like to know if in your view the contract described in this article would be possible under the terms of the amendment.

Sincerely yours,

J. W. FULBRIGHT.

FLYING OFF TO COMBAT? BIRDS ALERTED FOR WAR

(By Thomas O'Toole)

Would you believe that war is for the birds?

So much so that hawks and doves might fight side by side or that parrots, ducks, chickens, pigeons and even mynah birds could be drafted to help defend the flag in some future war?

Whatever you might think of the scheme, the Pentagon is all for it. Consider the description of the $600,000 contract the Defense Department has with the Psychology Department of the University of Mississippi:

"This program is based," the contract reads, "on the supposition that birds will eventually replace humans for activities that are dangerous, difficult, expensive or boring."

Among the activities the Pentagon has in mind are "aerial photography, gunnery, steering of missiles, detection of mines and search and destroy operations."

Just how the Pentagon plans to get birds to do all these things is anybody's guess, but it does mean to try.

"Much of the research will relate to complex forms of stimulus control," the contract with the University of Mississippi reads, "for example, visual search, auditory pattern recognition, pursuit and tracking, controlled locomotion and operation of manipulanda while flying."

"This is not a development contract," explains a Pentagon spokesman. "What we're trying to do here is to see if birds can be trained to do certain things."

The Pentagon admits it won't be able to use all birds in its research but it would like to train most species of wild birds for combat flying.

"Especially crows, ravens, jays, hawks and vultures," the contract goes on, including "doves, parrots, mynahs, chickens and pigeons."

The use of warbirds is not a new one, though its past is hardly glorious.

The most serious attempt to use bird-like creatures was in a program called X-Ray, in which bats carrying incendiaries were to be flown into Tokyo during World War II. The idea was to get the bats to roost in the eaves of Tokyo's wooden buildings, where the bombs would go off when the bats flipped upside down to sleep.

"The trouble with that one," said one scientist who worked on Project X-Ray, "was that it almost burned down an Air Force base in New Mexico." X-ray never made it to Japan.

The latest scheme for warbirds came to roost when the Pentagon circulated a letter advertising for ornithologists to work on it.

"I read it, I re-read it, and I read it again," one scientist said, "and I still couldn't believe it. It's insane."

Critics notwithstanding, the Pentagon is going ahead with its bird scheme.

"This program is just getting started," it says. "Hopefully, it will go on for 10 to 20 years."

The project is supported by a three-year "Project Themis" contract, at $200,000 a year. Project Themis is a program aimed at beefing up basic research in universities that have not had strong science programs.

VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY PROJECT OF RECORDING DAILY TELEVISION NEWSCASTS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, recently the Vice President of the United States initiated a national debate on the power of network television over the views and opinions of the American people. This debate can and should be a healthy and continuing one and should not be construed as an attempt to impose governmental censorship, directly or indirectly, upon the news media.

Today the Library of Congress keeps on file copies or microfilm of every daily edition of all the great newspapers in the United States. No such record is being kept of what appears nightly to 40 million Americans on the network news. I propose that this enormous vacuum be filled.

On August 5, 1968, Vanderbilt University in Nashville, Tenn., began compiling videotapes of the Monday through Friday 30-minute evening newscasts of the three major television networks. In addition, the university is also taping occasional special programs, such as the Republican and Democratic National Conventions. Vanderbilt began the project at the instigation of Mr. Paul Simpson, an alumnus and resident of Nashville, who became concerned because there is at present no preservation anywhere in the country of these news broadcasts, not even by the networks themselves.

This project was begun after a committee appointed by University Chancellor Alexander Heard realized the widespread impact that these programs have on the American people and determined that the country was losing forever a unique record of the historical events of our time as well as a prime source for research by psychologists, sociologists, political scientists, and economists. The university believes that for a history-making and history-conscious nation the present oversight is an anachronism of almost inconceivable proportions.

In short, Vanderbilt has undertaken this project because the university believes it to be in the pubic interest that a permanent record of this information be maintained. A primary objective of Vanderbilt, which cannot incur the cost of this program indefinitely, is to demonstrate that a national agency could and should take over the task.

To this end, I believe that Congress should direct the Library of Congress to maintain an up-to-date file of tapes of every morning and evening network news show. These tapes could be obtained from the networks and then returned after being copied so that the burden of expense would be borne by the Government and not by the networks. Once master tapes of news broadcasts are secured, the Library of Congress could then produce "subject matter tapes" from them and make them available at cost to libraries and other interested parties around the country. This process would permit a scholarly investigation, for example, of developments with regard to the war in Vietnam or what effects television had on a third party presidential candidate.

As I mentioned, currently every great newspaper in America files editions with the Library of Congress. It is long past time that similar procedures were established for filing the tapes of network news—which is having an ever-increasing impact on American public opinion.

As the Vice President pointed out in his speech, it is through the medium of television that many great issues have been brought before the American people, and it is on the network news that the great debates of our time are being carried out.

Much of the cost of this project can be offset by providing "subject matter tapes" to libraries at cost. The remainder of the burden should be small; and it rightly should be borne by the National Government. We have already allowed too much of this important material to be lost through years of simple neglect.

APPEARANCE OF HON. GEORGE C. WALLACE ON "MEET THE PRESS" PROGRAM

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, George C. Wallace, former Governor of Alabama and more recently a formidable candidate for the office of President of the United States, appeared on the nationally televised "Meet the Press" program on Sunday, November 30, 1969.

Mr. President, Governor Wallace enjoys a rare distinction, shared with such notables as Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln, and Teddy Roosevelt, each of whom led significant new national political party movements in our Nation. The impact of the Wallace departure from traditional two party arrangements can be measured by his initial success in gaining a ballot position in every State of the Union and by the fact that Governor Wallace attracted nearly 10 million votes. Both of these accomplishments are all the more significant in the light of the overwhelming forces arrayed against Governor Wallace some of which are documented in Theodore White's 1968 version of "The Making of the President."

Mr. President, the political history of our Nation is replete with examples clearly indicating that when popular dissatisfaction with existing national party arrangements reaches the magnitude represented by the Wallace movement, then one of the existing parties must either accommodate to the principles of the disaffected or else it will disappear from the scene and share the fate of other once powerful but now almost forgotten national political parties.

Mr. President, the views and opinions on important national issues of one who heads a historic party reappraisal in our Nation deserves the thoughtful consideration of Senators and the public in general. With this object in mind, I ask unanimous consent that a transcript of the "Meet the Press" program be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the transcript was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEET THE PRESS, NOVEMBER 30, 1969

Produced by Lawrence E. Spivak.

Guest: George C. Wallace, former Governor of Alabama.

Moderator: Edwin Newman, NBC News.

Panel: James J. Kilpatrick, Washington Star Syndicate; Robert Semple, Jr., the New York Times; John Chancellor, NBC News; Lawrence E. Spivak, regular panel member.

Mr. NEWMAN. Our guest today on Meet the Press is George C. Wallace, former Governor of Alabama and a Presidential candidate in 1968. Mr. Wallace has just returned from his first visit to South Vietnam and a number of other Asian countries.

Mr. SPIVAK. Governor Wallace, before you left you said this was going to be a "fact-finding trip." What facts did you learn about the war that you hadn't already known before you left?

Mr. WALLACE. I found after talking to Asian and American military leaders and those in the civilian branch of the government that the war is winnable, that this war can be won in Vietnam, and if it is not won in Vietnam, then in my judgment all Southeast Asia is going Communist.

I also found that—to those who say we must get out that there is no way for the American troops to get out unless we do win the war.

Mr. SPIVAK. Governor, as you know the President has begun to withdraw troops and the stories are that that will be escalated as we go along.

Are you in favor of further troop withdrawal based on what you saw and heard there?

Mr. WALLACE. I agree with the President's speech. The President said we would not abandon our allies in Asia. He said if the North Vietnamese escalate the conflict, he would respond in kind, which left some options. Exactly how this plan will be implemented has not been made known to the public.

I did find in Vietnam among the military and those in civilian capacities, those in Governmental capacities, that the war is winnable, that they feel that they can win the war. They worry about political reaction in this country. The Vietnamization of the war, which is a term applied by President Nixon, which means, of course, turning the ground combat over to the Vietnamese. In that part of the world they are thinking about three to five years. In this country I think they are thinking about one year.

But Vietnamization of the war is not going to end the fighting because we are fighting in South Vietnam. There the civilian population has attacked each other every day, and so the North Vietnamese go to bed each night perfectly free from rocketing, assasination attempts. So in withdrawing the troops and the Vietnamization of the war, it means that the war is going to continue to go on.

Mr. SPIVAK. Governor, based on what you saw and heard in South Vietnam and throughout Asia, do you think it is going to be wise or even possible to withdraw all our combat forces by the end of 1970?

Mr. WALLACE. There is going to be no way to withdraw combat forces until the enemy is crushed. They are not going to let you withdraw while they are in force in South Vietnam and while they are heavily armed, so it would take less casualties, observers tell me, to win the war, than to withdraw. If they are still in force, we will withdraw sort of as we did at Dunkirk in World War II and not only suffer the humiliation of a defeat, but at the same time lose our Asian friends, probably Europe would become neutralist, and we would lose the Mid-East.

Mr. SPIVAK. Do I take it then based on what you say that you are against a planned withdrawal by the end of 1970, as things are today?

Mr. WALLACE. No, sir, I am not against a withdrawal——

Mr. SPIVAK. All combat forces by the end of 1970?

Mr. WALLACE. No, sir, I am not against the withdrawal of all combat forces by 1970, but I say before the combat forces can be withdrawn, the enemy must be defeated.

Mr. KILPATRICK. Governor Wallace, we notice that the Post Office Box number of the Wallace Campaign in Montgomery has been changed from P.O. Box 1968 to P.O. Box 1972. What significance should we read into that?

Mr. WALLACE. A member of my staff made that change. I don't know what significance it has other than to say that our movement continues and if necessary will be involved in 1972. I am not sure at this time. It will all depend upon the events that transpire between now and 1972 and whether this Administration carries out the commitments they made to the American people. It depends upon whether or not the war is concluded successfully in Vietnam, the restoration of local democratic institutions of the people of the states, a reduction in taxes on the low and middle income people of our country and the restoration of law and order.

Mr. KILPATRICK. Governor, what is your general appraisal of Mr. Nixon's Administration after its first 11 months in these areas or other areas?

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Nixon, of course, has been in just about a year, which is not enough time to judge whether or not you would be a candidate in 1972. I do know that this Administration is saying and taking some positions that we took in the campaign in '68. I wish that I had copyrighted, got a patent on my speeches in 1968. If I had done so, I would be drawing some immense royalties from Mr. Nixon and especially Mr. Agnew.

Mr. KILPATRICK. Do you feel this is an effort on their part especially to curry favor in the South and among the constituency that you had?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, sir; and I am glad to say that the movement that originated in Alabama is making it possible for them to adopt what they call a "southern strategy." But at the moment it is mostly talk. The next is action. We like the talk, some of the things that have been said. Mr. Agnew says he is against bussing school children, for instance, and yet bussing continues. We find they still talk about the plight of the low and middle income wage earner in the country. Yet high taxes still continue, and inflation continues to spiral upwardly. So, some of the things they say sound all right, but they must replace some of their talk with action, and I hope that that is the case.

Mr. SEMPLE. Governor, back in early September you urged the parents of Alabama to defy school desegregation orders and enroll their children wherever they chose.

That was before the recent Supreme Court decision making instant integration, in effect, the law of the land. How would you address your followers on the subject of the Supreme Court decision at this time?

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Semple, I did not advocate that anyone disobey the law. I said that the 1968 Appropriations Act in the Congress, Educational Appropriation Act, said that no part of this Act should be implied—gave the right to close any school, to bus any pupil, to bring about racial balance. It violated the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

I said that you should exercise freedom of choice which had been upheld by the federal courts, but of course the federal courts then destroyed freedom of choice. I only advocated that parents take advantage of what the courts had upheld in the past, the right of a parent to choose the school that their child attended. But of course that has been stricken down by the Nixon Administration.

I was against the imposition of even freedom of choice upon the school systems of the states, because I felt it was no concern of the federal government—regarding the policies of any school system in any state. But since they upheld freedom of choice and the people had accepted it so to speak, then they said they didn't choose properly and they struck it down. They closed hundreds of schools, they bussed children across states and counties. The point I am making is that this is disrupting the public school system not only in Alabama but throughout the country, and unless this ceases and unless there is turned back to the people of Alabama and the states the right to control the public school systems of their states, then that will bear upon whether I become a candidate in 1972.

Mr. SEMPLE. Part of my original question was, what options are open to you now, to local and state officials, now that the Supreme Court has stricken all freedom of choice and has forced even this Administration to move much faster?

Mr. WALLACE. Since the President himself, I understood in the campaign, advocated freedom of choice, since Mr. Agnew advocated freedom of choice, then this Administration, to carry out its commitment to the people can support the Constitutional Amendment that has been introduced by Senator Jim Allen and others of Alabama in the Congress. They can support Congressional action to turn back the public school system to the states.

Mr. CHANCELLOR. Governor, I'd like to ask you a couple of questions on Vietnam based on some of the things you have said here. You say that the feeling in this country is that the Vietnamization policy might take only a year or so but that in Vietnam someone told you that three to five years was a sort of an accurate time frame. Were those Vietnamese or Americans who told you that?

Mr. WALLACE. The impression that I received from people in this government, in the military of the United States and of our Asian allies, was that it is going to take longer than one year to Vietnamize the war, and even then they say that would not stop the fighting.

I heard servicemen from the private up say that this war could be won. This war can be won and the only way we are going to get out is to win the war.

In other words, if we withdraw all the combat ground forces then unless the enemy's will to carry on the war has been destroyed, unless his staging areas have been destroyed, unless his source of supply has been destroyed, then he is going to continue his destruction of American and Asian lives, who are our allies. I have found there is no way to get out of Vietnam unless you win the war, and that the war can be won.

Mr. CHANCELLOR. We know you are not a military expert, Governor, but how long do you suppose it would take? If Vietnamization is going to take three to five years, how long would it take to win the war?

Mr. WALLACE. As you say, I am not a military expert, but the military people who talked to me say it could be won in a lot less time than we have been there already, and they feel that—I got the impression that within the next year, if they were allowed to use conventional forces against the source of supply of the enemy, that they could destroy the effectiveness of the North Vietnamese armed forces and destroy the supply of material to the Viet Cong in South Vietnam.

Mr. CHANCELLOR. Does that mean bombing Haiphong? Does that mean going into Cambodia?

Mr. WALLACE. Of course, Cambodia and Laos are part of old French Indochina, and it is all the same war. So I would say you are going to have to destroy the enemy in Cambodia and in Laos because those countries have been unable to keep them out. There are about 40,000 of the North Vietnamese regulars, I understand, in Cambodia and also in Laos.

So I would say, let the military decide that. We have tried every other plan under the sun, but we still have fighting and killing. I was told that the most merciful way to end this war is to destroy the North Vietnamese source of supply, which means less North Vietnamese would be killed and less Americans would be killed.

Mr. CHANCELLOR. Then given these two plans of slow Vietnamization or fast victory, do you believe that the war is going to be an issue in the '72 campaign?

Mr. WALLACE. Do I believe it will be an issue in the '72 campaign? I am sure that this would probably be an issue in the '72 campaign. If Mr. Nixon can win this war with honor and not desert our Asian allies, as he has said, then, of course, that is to his credit.

But if this war ends after having lost 40,000 American servicemen and thousands wounded and maimed and all the treasure we have spent, not counting the lives of our allies, then I am sure it will be an issue in that regard.

Again, let me emphasize what I heard, that if we were to withdraw, we would lose about as many men or just as many withdrawing as we would winning the war. Because as long as they are in force, you cannot withdraw because they will be shooting at the last boatload. How can you get out if they are there in sufficient numbers and force to destroy you when you start to leave?

So if we are going to have anyone killed, I would rather for them to be killed defeating the enemy than running away from the enemy.

Mr. SPIVAK. Governor, you have made it clear that you are for winning the war. What do you mean by "winning the war"?

Mr. WALLACE. Destroying the effectiveness of the North Vietnamese armed forces and destroying their ability to make war, isolating the battlefield, so to speak, and having them unable to carry on an effective, aggressive military campaign against the people of South Vietnam and the American armed forces.

Mr. SPIVAK. You mean actually defeat the enemy on the military field?

Mr. WALLACE. That is correct.

Mr. SPIVAK. Governor, may I take you to Alabama for a minute. When he was in Alabama recently, Vice President Agnew praised Governor Brewer and said that Alabama is—in his words—"fortunate to have him as Governor."

What do you think about the job Governor Brewer has done? You know that job pretty well. What do you think?

Mr. WALLACE. I am sure Governor Brewer is doing a good job. I would say if you are getting around to the point of whether I am going to run for Governor or not, let me say that the people in 1966 in electing my wife did so for the purpose of making it possible for me to run in '68, in order to try to throw the Federal Government off our backs and to get some relief from centralized federal control of our everyday lives. She was elected; I ran. As a consequence of our movement, we find Mr. Agnew coming to Alabama with Postmaster General Blount. We find the Humphrey-Muskie supporters in Alabama, including Dr. Cashion, the head of the Democratic Committee in Alabama, and some politicians in our state and some of our big businessmen in the State, already meeting these diverse elements and groups saying, "We must destroy Governor Wallace's political future; if he runs for governor, we must defeat him."

I didn't realize that this country boy from Alabama was going to have these strong forces arrayed against me in case I decided to become involved, so they have offered a challenge. If I were to run for Governor and win, it would mean that Mr. Nixon and Mr. Agnew must put into action some of the statements they are making. In other words, they could not just continue to talk, they must act. If I lost, they could continue to talk and wouldn't have to act, because our movement would be dead.

And Mr. Nixon cannot win the next presidential race unless he carries our part of the country and he cannot carry our part of the country unless those criteria I mentioned a moment ago: taxes, law, and order, local democratic institutions and a solution to the war in Viet Nam. I pray and hope he is successful in all regards because it would be good for our country.

Mr. SPIVAK. Governor, on the basis of what he has done so far, could you support Governor Brewer for re-election?

Mr. WALLACE. On the basis—it will all depend upon whether I become a candidate.

Mr. SPIVAK. If you had to decide today? If you had to decide, today, and you knew what the governor had done and you knew what the state of the country was, you knew what Nixon had done, what would your decision be?

Mr. WALLACE. Oh, yes, I could decide to support him. I could decide to support any number of people.

Mr. SPIVAK. Would you decide to run yourself as things are today?

Mr. WALLACE. If I decide to run for governor, I am not going to be running against anybody. I am going to be running to carry on a movement because the people of our state wanted to utilize the governor's office in 1968 to help throw them off our backs, as I said a moment ago. And if we ran again, it would be the people wanting, in my judgment, to use that office to get some relief from centralized control over our lives in Alabama, a reduction of taxes, a conclusion of the war in Viet Nam and a restoration of law and order.

Mr. KILPATRICK. To return to Vietnam for just a moment, Mr. Governor, in his speech of May 14 President Nixon said of Vietnam, "We have ruled out attempting to impose a purely military solution on the battlefield." Do I understand you to say that you want to rule that back in?

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Nixon made some very strong statements prior to the election which indicated he wanted a military victory, and I think that is one reason that the people of our country got very disenchanted about the war. They couldn't negotiate it to conclusion, and now they have said we are not looking for a military victory. But I think he recouped in his speech of November 3rd when he said, "If they escalate, we will respond."

I say that the only way to get out of Vietnam is to win the war in Vietnam. It can be won with the loss of less lives than to continue this war of attrition that we cannot continue long at.

Mr. KILPATRICK. By that you mean a military solution?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, a military solution.

Mr. KILPATRICK. And do we understand that this was the recommendation that you gleaned from high-ranking American military officials in South Vietnam?

Mr. WALLACE. Every high-ranking American military official and government official, and Asian, also, that discussed the matter with me—all of them didn't discuss it, so I am going to leave—all of them didn't discuss it in that context.

Mr. KILPATRICK. But those who did, urged a reescalation?

Mr. WALLACE. Those who did—and they were the overwhelming majority of those that I talked to said, this war is winnable. They talk "win" in that part of the world, but they talk "no win" in this part of the world.

Mr. KILPATRICK. Could you identify some of the officers who made that——

Mr. WALLACE. No, sir, I would rather not identify them. As you newsmen say, I would like not to reveal my sources of information, but they talked very frankly to me.

Mr. SEMPLE. Governor, the President seems to be having enough trouble keeping the public behind his plan for gradual disengagement from Vietnam. Do you seriously think that the public would support a reescalation of the war?

Mr. WALLACE. Of course one reason the public has been disenchanged with the war is that we have been there so long. We couldn't negotiate it to conclusion, and they didn't bring it to a military conclusion. So they said, "What are we doing there; we are not going to continue to expend lives and money for a non-winnable war."

When you say escalation, you are going to have escalate to get out, so I'd rather escalate to win than to escalate to get out.

Mr. NEWMAN. About four minutes left, gentlemen.

Mr. SEMPLE. Turning to another subject, Governor, I'd like to ask you about some of the specific criteria by which you would judge the Nixon Administration's performance in office. Take taxes, for example: Do you approve of what he has done on tax reform so far?

Mr. WALLACE. On the tax reform so far?

Mr. SEMPLE. Yes.

Mr. WALLACE. Of course the Tax Reform Bill is very complicated, but in my judgment it is not too much. Each taxpayer should be given a $1,200 exemption instead of a $600, and the multi-billion and multi-million dollar tax exempt foundations ought to be taxed. There are so many inequities in the tax structure that leave the multi-rich free and tax the average businessman and farmer and working man that it is just almost unbearable. There is tax revolt in the air, and I am not satisfied with that, no.

Mr. CHANCELLOR. Governor, what would you have done last year if neither Hubert Humphrey nor Richard Nixon had won a majority of the votes in the Electoral College and the election had gone in the House of Representatives?

Mr. WALLACE. It would never have gone in the House of Representatives in my judgment. We would have settled it in the Electoral College.

Mr. CHANCELLOR. How would you have done that?

Mr. WALLACE. I am not sure exactly how the vote would have gone. I was very much against Mr. Humphrey, but that is a very hypothetical question. I can say that whoever became President under those circumstances would have been a better President.

Mr. CHANCELLOR. Can we infer then, Governor, that had it come to that, you would have thrown your support to Mr. Nixon and not to Mr. Humphrey? You have just about said that.

Mr. WALLACE. You can infer anything you would like to infer under that limited question, but I can say whoever became President would have been a better President.

Mr. CHANCELLOR. Will you be speaking for candidates around the country in the 1970 elections?

Mr. WALLACE. No, sir, I will not be speaking for candidates around the country. I could be a candidate myself, although I am not sure whether that is necessary to continue our movement or not. But if I decide that it is, of course I would be involved myself.

Mr. NEWMAN. Two minutes.

Mr. SPIVAK. I am curious about this. You didn't think it was necessary to take a trip to Vietnam when you were running for President and discussing the issues in 1968.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, I did think——

Mr. SPIVAK. Well, you didn't go.

Mr. WALLACE. You know my wife was very ill with cancer and died in May of 1968, and then we had to make ballot position in the states. I had planned a trip prior to that, but because of her illness, I was unable to go, and that is the reason that I have made the trip this time. I think anybody in public life, national or statewide, should be interested in closehand observation in our heavy involvement there.

There is another point that I want to make, that we ought to make Japan and the members of the free world help us at least monetarily in this involvement in Southeast Asia, because Japan is getting rich while we are doing the fighting in that part of the world.

Mr. SPIVAK. Governor, it seems pretty clear that our negotiations in Paris on Vietnam and the war are stalemated. If you were President, what would you do today about the Paris negotiations?

Mr. WALLACE. I probably would have a negotiator there, but in my judgment the negotiations are fraudulent. The North Vietnamese never intended to negotiate, and so I wouldn't pay much attention to the negotiations since they have gone this long. I would try to win the war militarily.

Mr. KILPATRICK. In his best selling book, Kevin Phillips says your constituents are mostly Democrats on their way into the Republican Party, and he denies that your party or your movement is a permanent entrant on the national scene. Do you expect your American Independent Party to be a permanent part of the American political scene?

Mr. WALLACE. If this Administration does not comply to the criteria I mentioned a moment ago, it will be permanent.

Mr. NEWMAN. At this point I must interrupt. Our time is up.

Thank you, Mr. Wallace, for being with us today on "Meet the Press."

AN AMERICAN COMBAT PLATOON CALLS FOR PEACE IN VIETNAM

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, in recent weeks we have been subjected to an unprecedented barrage of claims purporting to show that the American people really do support our continued presence in Vietnam. To an unfortunate extent, public debate has focused on the popularity of our present course, or the unpopularity of dissent rather than the merit of our policy.

Not only have claims been made as to the shape of American public opinion, but members of the administration have said again and again that it is the soldiers fighting in Vietnam who are most injured by our efforts to secure peace in that tragic land.

Most recently, an American officer who served in Vietnam has been paraded about Capitol Hill questioning the patriotism of some Senators and indicating that members of the Armed Forces support our continued adventure in Southeast Asia.

I simply wish to read a letter signed by 31 members of an Army airborne platoon, now serving in combat in Vietnam. The members of 3d platoon, Company D, 2d battalion, 502d Regiment, 1st Brigade of the 101st Airborne Division has asked me to read this letter in the Senate, a letter in which they say "We are tired of listening to empty and unfilled promises to end the war." "We want peace," they say, "and we want it now."

This letter, I submit, shows that men in Vietnam as well as Americans at home, understand the futility of our course in Southeast Asia.

The letter arrived with a covering letter from Pfc. Ted Mowrer which I shall first read:

NOVEMBER 6, 1969.

DEAR SENATOR MCGOVERN: I am a member of the platoon that is sending you the enclosed letter. For quite some time I have been wanting to write to one of the Senators who is working to get us out of Viet Nam. But I hesitated, feeling that a letter from only one person would not have the impact and effect that was necessary. Then I decided to write one letter and have members of my platoon sign it. The one we sent you is the result. Not surprisingly, to me at least, everyone in the platoon, excluding the platoon leader, a second lieutenant, has signed it. I feel that probably the whole company, and even a great majority of our battalion, would have signed a similar letter.

I chose you to send the letter to because I know that for a long time you have been trying to convince your fellow senators and the Administration that we should get out of Viet Nam.

We would appreciate it if you could read our letter in the Senate so that the other senators and the whole nation would know how we feel. Too many rumors are being circulated to the effect that the efforts to get us out of Viet Nam and the peace demonstrations are disappointing the G.I.'s. This is not true and we want America to know that it is not. However, we realize that it may not be possible for you to read the letter in the Senate. Please do what you feel is best.

Please reply as soon as possible and let us know of developments to end the war, and if there is anything else we can do to help.

Thank you very much.

Sincerely,

TED H. MOWRER.

OCTOBER 28, 1969.

Hon. GEORGE MCGOVERN,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

OUR DEAR SENATOR MCGOVERN, CONGRESSMEN, AND FELLOW AMERICANS: The third platoon asks you to give audience and consideration to the opinions and attitudes of some front-line G.I.'s here in Viet Nam. We invite you to listen to us who are fighting the war which is causing so much debate in America. We are decidedly and entirely in favor of peace in Viet Nam and systematic and rapid withdrawal of American troops from this country. We support and appreciate the tireless efforts of those who strive so diligently to advance the cause of peace. We were especially heartened by the Moratorium Day observance this month. We are pleased that the force against the war has reached this extent on such a wide base of public opinion. We were not disappointed and disillusioned, as some have claimed, by this demonstration of disenchantment with U.S. policy in Viet Nam and those who perpetuate this policy. We, in fact, would like you to consider this letter as our contribution in observance of the Moratorium.

We are sick of bloodshed, tired of body counts and lists of war dead and casualties. We are tired of listening to empty and unfulfilled promises to end the war. We want peace, and we want it now. America has been in Viet Nam too long; it is time to leave. We hope that President Nixon and our national leaders will hear and consider our plea to end the war.

These are our feelings; now America knows how one group of men feels on the other side of the Pacific. And we are sure there are many more who feel the same way. We want to encourage those of you who are working for peace to continue your efforts. We thank you for what you have done in the past.

Thank you for listening to us.

With hope for peace for all men in the very near future, we are

Peacefully yours,

Third Platoon: Pfc. Ted H. Mowrer, Sp4. John A. von Mertschinsky, Pfc. Kenneth C. McKim, Pfc. John O. Mendey, Jr., Pfc. Carl M. Morris, Pfc. Mark W. Trace, Pfc. Bruce W. Shaw, Sp4. David B. Patterson, Pfc Edward Dickout.

Sp4. James E. Shetler, Pfc. Juan A. Trevino, Pfc. Larry C. Howerd, Pfc. Roger Harris, Pfc. Albert Martell, Jr., Pfc. Ernesto Perez, Pfc. Jaime Lopez, Pfc. Asdrubal Trujillo Diaz, Sp4. Robert D. Winders, Pfc. Fred Seniours, Pfc. Roland W. Blair.

REDUCTION OF FUNDS FOR EDUCATION

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, last spring, the administration recommended an Office of Education budget of $3,180,278,000 for fiscal 1970. That is $437,122,000 less than the amount appropriated by Congress in fiscal 1969. For California, this reduction represents a loss of $101,118,271 or one-third of our Federal share in fiscal 1969.

In July, the House of Representatives spurned the administration's recommendations and restored most of the proposed cuts, when it passed H.R. 13111, the appropriations bill for the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. That measure is still pending before the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

In the meantime, funds for the Office of Education have been provided by joint resolutions continuing appropriations. The first joint resolution, which expired on October 31, provided funds on the basis of either the appropriation level for fiscal 1969 or the administration's budget recommendations, whichever was lower. Consequently, from July 1 to October 31, education programs for which the administration recommended a lower budget operated at the lower level, and programs for which it made no budget recommendation were, in effect, repealed. On October 28, the House again showed its concern over the low priority assigned to federally assisted education programs. On that day, by an overwhelming vote the House approved House Joint Resolution 966, a second joint resolution continuing appropriations which incorporates the provisions of H.R. 13111, insofar as they relate to the Office of Education. On November 13, the Senate joined the House in its concern when it passed the House measure by a voice vote. It was signed into law on November 14.

Mr. President, one would think that the enactment of this measure would provide immediate relief to school districts which had endured severe financial hardships under the terms of the first joint resolution. However, I am distressed to learn that this is not the case, for, despite the clear intent of Congress, the Bureau of the Budget has directed the Office of Education to limit expenditures to those authorized by the restrictive provisions of the first joint resolution.

I have written President Nixon, urging him to overturn the erroneous decision of the Bureau of the Budget and to implement the will of the Congress. I ask unanimous consent that my letter to him be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOVEMBER 25, 1969.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am distressed to learn that the Bureau of the Budget has directed the Office of Education not to spend the additional funds provided by P.L. 91–117, the current joint resolution continuing appropriations for the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare and other agencies.

In approving this measure, Congress took the unusual step of incorporating into this legislation the provisions of H.R. 13111, insofar as these relate to the Office of Education. H.R. 13111, which is pending before the Senate Appropriations Committee, substantially increases appropriations for federally assisted education programs over the amounts you recommended last April. Congress was prompted to take this step by the urgent need to provide immediate relief to school districts which have come to depend upon federal funds to meet increasing education costs. These funds are essential both for our children and for the individual property owner who is staggering under the constantly growing burden of supporting our schools.

Despite clear Congressional intent to the contrary, the Bureau of the Budget has taken the position that Office of Education expenditures must be limited to those authorized under the previous joint resolution which expired on October 31. It bases this contention on language contained in Senate Report No. 91–529 which admonishes the Bureau of the Budget to exercise caution in utilizing the authority granted in P.L. 91–117 in order not to jeopardize the integrity of federally assisted education programs as they may be finally approved by Congress.

This language, however, in no way supports the Bureau's position. Had Congress wanted federal aid to education to remain at the low level provided by the previous joint resolution, it merely would have extended that resolution. Congress, however, decided otherwise and took the unusual step of approving a rate of obligation for the Office of Education equal to the amount provided in H.R. 13111 as it passed the House of Representatives in July. It specifically and deliberately chose not to continue funds for federal education programs at the lowest of several rates of obligation, as is normally the practice.

Mr. President, I need not emphasize the importance of federal aid to education. You recognized this much when you stated last fall that "when we talk about cutting the expenses of government—either federal, state, or local—the one area we can't shortchange is education."

The reason for your commitment is readily apparent. You stated it most eloquently when you said: "When I look at American education, I do not see schools, but children, and young men and women—young Americans who deserve the chance to make a life for themselves and ensure the progress of their country. If we fail in this, no success we have is worth the keeping."

Mr. President, the Congress concurs in this judgment. It is precisely for this reason that I urge you to exercise your authority to overturn this arrogant and erroneous decision of the Bureau of the Budget and to implement the will of Congress.

Sincerely,

ALAN CRANSTON.

NEED FOR INCREASED FEDERAL FUNDING FOR EDUCATION AND TRAINING OF PERSONNEL

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement I made today before a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations presided over by the Senator from Washington on the need for increased Federal funding for education and the training of teachers as well as for restoration of cutbacks for the training of medical personnel.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION AND TEACHER TRAINING NEED INCREASED FUNDS

(By Senator MARK HATFIELD)

I know your hearings have been long and arduous and you are anxious to mark up the bill. However, I want to make several points which I hope you will give some weight to in your determination of priorities for extra money in this appropriations bill particularly as it applies to the needs of education.

I supported the continuing resolution to allow the Office of Education to spend an extra billion for education, not because I felt this was the best and most orderly way to conduct the business of the Congress. It is not.

I supported it to point up to the Administration that it was the will of the majority of Congress that these funds be spent. We are making a tragic mistake in not funding these education programs at much higher levels of appropriations. To cut back education in the name of fighting inflation is folly.

I will confine myself to just two areas—the need for doubling the Administration's budget figure on vocational education, and the need to increase the amount for the training of teachers, not only for vocational skills but all down the line. These are neglected areas for federal funding.

We spend much more for remedial and rehabilitation efforts, for welfare and for custodial care in juvenile homes and prisons per person than these preventive programs. For instance, Job Corps (a fine program and I support it) was funded at a level higher than vocational education in 1969, and it cost upwards of $6400 a boy or girl for a maximum of about 35,000 youngsters. Custodial care is around $4800. Yet we are losing young people from the junior and senior high schools (almost a million a year) because we are not educating them for jobs.

Why should there be a doubling of appropriations for vocational education? Let me read you an excerpt from the 1969 National Advisory Council report on Vocational Education.

I concur with the conclusions of this Council. I have seen conditions in the city schools of Washington, D.C. and have talked with Principals (Percy Ellis, Shaw Junior High) struggling against overwhelming odds. We have similar problems in the Northwest, in Seattle and Portland.

I quote:

"The violence that wracks our cities has its roots in unemployment and unequal opportunity. Those who have no jobs in an affluent community lash out in anger and frustration . . . racial unrest, violence and the unemployment of youth have their roots in inadequate education.

"Each year the ranks of the school dropouts increase by three-quarters of a million young men and women. They enter the job market without the skills and attitudes employers require. They and the millions of others who are underemployed—among these the students who are graduates of our high schools, but who are inadequately prepared for anything—these are tragic evidence of the present inadequacy of our educational system."

"The failure of our schools to educate to the level of adequate employability nearly 25% of the young men and women who turn 18 each year is a waste of money, as well as human resources. The Nation supports a galaxy of remedial programs, some of which have cost as much as $12,000 for every man or woman placed on a job. Those who remain unemployed may cost us $4,000 or more per year in welfare support for themselves and their children who will repeat the dreary costly cycle."

"We believe that the reform of American schools the Nation so desperately needs will not come about if the Federal government continues to invest nearly $4 in remedial manpower programs for each $1 it invests in preventive vocational programs."

"(The Government also invests $14 in its universities for every $1 in vocational education.)

"If the Federal Government will substantially support the additional initial cost of educating youth for employment, we believe that the financial, personal and social costs of unemployment can be dramatically reduced."

The Council recommends, Mr. Chairman, that substantial federal funds be allocated to support curriculum development, teacher training and pilot programs in vocational education. I agree with them that no federal investment will bring a higher return on our tax dollars.

The State of Oregon is bestirring itself to make this a reality for the majority of our young people who graduate from high school without job skills and who do not go on to college. I should like to attach a newspaper article for the record which describes a new method of job training in an opportunities skills center outside Portland in which the students from 3 high schools learn a wide variety of trade and technical skills needed to meet the demands of the space age.

Over a three-year period my State needs at least $30 million to carry out its plans for such skills centers, for revamping vocational education in the high schools and for post-secondary education in the community colleges. The Federal Government spends only $2½ million for vocational education to help Oregon meet its need to drastically reform its methods of job training.

Our Superintendent of Public Instruction in Oregon says the figure should be $10 million. (The State itself is spending about $6 million and the localities $4 million for operating expenses and $7.5 million for capital expenditures).

Under the Administration 1970 budget, Oregon would receive $3 million for vocational education. But if the Senate concurs in the House action to allow extra appropriations, Oregon would receive $4.4 million. This would at least come close to meeting half the State's federal funding needs.

Last year Congress authorized for fiscal 1970 over $500 million for basic grants for vocational education (and over $700,000,000 total) which clearly expressed the will of Congress for vocational education spending.

Yet the Administration's total vocational education budget was only $279, requested for 1970—less than the rehabilitative Job Corps budget. The House Appropriations Committee raised this inadequate figure to $357 million. Then on July 31st the House increased the amount to $488 million, which is more nearly in line with the will of Congress, although still underfunded if one considers the overwhelming needs.

In 1968 $265 million was appropriated for vocational education with almost $10 million included for work-study. These funds are necessary for on-the-job training for thousands of youngsters who will stay in school only if they are given an opportunity to work and study at the same time. Funds should be available in this bill for work-study.

Let me quote Dr. Dale Parnell, Oregon's Superintendent of Public Instruction as an added incentive to increase these funds for vocational education:

"We still treat high school kids as if they were all going into one of the 5000 college-degree oriented occupations . . . There are 5000 occupations which require a college degree and 20,000 which do not."

"Most vocational education courses are conducted with federal funds," he said, "and it is never possible to predict how much money will be available. We must take the pressure off the property taxpayer." I agree.

Property taxpayers all across this country are in revolt. We were threatened with at least one school closing in Oregon, and bond issues were repeatedly turned down. I note from the papers that schools are threatened with closings in Pennsylvania, and it has already happened elsewhere. This needs federal attention.

May I urge that you gentlemen be generous with this funding—it is needed in every corner of this Nation.

May I urge, as well that you be generous with funds for teacher training—the Education Professions Development Act—funding which concentrates on the need for training pre-school and elementary and secondary education teachers, as well as vocational education teachers.

We have up to this point in time been most beneficient with our tax dollars with research grants to the colleges and universities and their individual professors.

We need to concentrate more money now on training the teachers in areas of greatest need. I recommend that, instead of allowing only $80 million for these training programs, that you increase the funds. I further urge the committee to add the extra $20 million which Senator George Murphy is recommending for vocational education teacher training. I may also support other amendments as well to raise this teacher training section to higher amounts.

I truly deplore the Administration action in making heavy cutbacks in this Office of Education budget, not only for vocational education and teacher training, but for library books as well. And to do it in the name of "fighting inflation" is heartbreaking when you realize that all our young people will suffer from these cuts, middle income, lower income and especially the poverty stricken.

I do not "wholeheartedly support this priority" of the Administration as Commissioner Allen does. We should be cutting into the military budget. We should have had more than nine votes in this body against the military procurement bill, which authorized $20 billion for weaponry—money which could be diverted, at least part of it, to meet this Nation's education needs.

We have thousands upon thousands of youngsters dropping out of school and into a life of drug addiction and crime, and you cannot convince me that the total answer is more police on the streets and bigger and better jails.

I have Oregon parents, service people living in Southeast Washington whose children are the victims of these "outsiders", the dropouts from schools. It is a major crisis and a city-wide scandal, and the teachers and parents are demanding armed guards in the schools. This is happening all over this country in every major city—even my own city of Portland—and the answer surely is not just police protection. Is not part of the answer to provide decent education for all the young people—dropouts as well?

I believe that this crisis in the city and rural schools is a grave internal threat to this country's security, and we in the Congress are being challenged as never before to provide the means for local school authorities and leaders to answer that challenge.

In a November 11th Senate speech, I cited evidence in wires and letters from Oregon educators, proving the need for at least double the amounts of federal funding for everything from pre-school training to community college needs to grants and loans for college students. Since property taxpayers are telling State and Federal politicians across the land that they have borne the burden of supporting the schools for too long, we in Congress should pick it up. For the most part, the local communities in Oregon have done a most noble and commendable job.

Lest you believe that I think by granting this extra billion for education's needs in the 1970 budget this will be adequate, let me hasten to say we should, in truth, be funding at levels far beyond it.

There are hints coming from Commissioner Allen that education will see great things in the 1971 budget. I pray that this is so; but we need the money now.

It seems to me that we in the Congress should be preparing ourvelves to vote substantial sums of money for education over and above the $4.2 billion for the Office of Education in 1970.

We should be thinking in terms of persuading the Administration to accept legislation similar to that proposed by the National Education Association. This would provide a basic grant of $100 per school age child, or about $5.25 billion a year, (plus $2 billion more for the poorer areas). This money could be used by the school districts for increasing teachers' salaries, for needed early childhood education, for lowering class size curriculum changes, and so on.

Listen to George Fischer, President of NEA. It carries a warning we and the Administration should heed:

"Voter approval of only 25.7 percent of the money requested in bond issues during the second quarter of 1969 has created a situation where the affluent, in ever-increasing numbers are removing their children to private schools, leaving the middle and lower-income students in the public schools.

"If this practice continues, we will soon have a class society that is inimical to American tradition."

You know well that this is happening in these city schools across the Nation, and it must be stopped if we are to prevent more violence and unrest in this land.

We have taken a lot of pride in our educational system, and we should. Down through the years we have asked the schools to educate, not only an elite, but the great masses. It was a great day in our history when we established the concept of a free basic public education for all.

As Commissioner of Education Allen said in a recent speech: "When we anticipated the need for greater effort to feed our rapidly expanding population, we established a network of State agricultural colleges. When, during World War I, we faced a shortage of skilled labor, we asked our schools to train young people in vocational subjects."

"Then when it appeared that the Soviets might be pulling ahead of us in technology, we established new priorities for training engineers and scientists. On the whole, our educational system has served our Nation well . . ."

I agree with the Commissioner that we need to increase our attention to the education of the poor, particularly the minority groups. We ought also to concentrate our efforts on the needs of the ordinary youngster, 60% of them, who graduate from high school without the necessary skills they need to compete in this world.

We have answered the challenge in the past; we must do it again.

A $4.2 billion budget will not do the job, but perhaps it's all we can hope for with this war-budget right now. I trust you gentlemen will support the higher figure, and use your best persuasive powers to convince a reluctant Administration to spend the extra money.

Mr. Chairman: In his November 14 memorandum to the Heads of Executive Departments and Agencies, President Nixon expressed his concern that certain agencies, specifically the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, would ". . . commit the government to make expenditures at a rate inconsistent with our . . . efforts . . . to restrict inflation." He also stated that his Administration was committed to do ". . . everything within its power to fight the . . . pressures which are eroding the purchasing power of the American people." Prior to that, on July 11, the President, supported by HEW Secretary Finch, recognized an equally pressing problem as he warned the nation of an "impending . . . major crisis in health care unless something is done about it immediately."

I believe each of these positions is sound, but each must be implemented in an entirely different way. On one hand, we need trained health professionals to respond to our national demand for health care. On the other, we contribute to inflationary tendencies if we appropriate the large sums needed to educate and train these people.

Faced with these problems, I feel that we can best solve the perplexities presented by at least a partial re-alignment and re-evaluation of our expenditures in terms of national priorities. I urge that a particularly high value be assigned to the right of an individual to receive medical attention.

The Administration maintains, and rightly so, that excessive federal spending can only contribute to the cause of inflation. Yet the demand for medical personnel and facilities increases, and the basically inelastic supply of health services forces the cost of such services higher and higher. This increase in prices most dramatically affects our Nation's poor and middle income who find it increasingly difficult to obtain proper medical attention for any more than emergency needs.

It is, then, precisely the inflationary pressures on the economy which have precipitated the imminent crisis in health care. The major question really is this: If the decrease in financial support for our national health programs increases our health crisis, is this more serious than exacerbating inflation? I think it is.

In 1960, for example, the nation boasted 245,000 active non-federal physicians, a ratio of 1 to every 734 population. In 1968, the number of physicians had increased to 285,000, and the ratio had decreased to 1 to every 708 population. The trend is encouraging but with the advent of Medicare and Medicaid, the need for more doctors—particularly in rural areas—is becoming acute.

In 1960, we had a total of 82,000 dentists, or 1 to every 2,195 population. In 1968, the number of dentists had increased to 92,000, and the ratio had dropped to rate of 1 to every 2,186 population.

The inflationary tendency during this period is even more remarkable. In 1960, an average day in a hospital cost $32.23. In 1969, however, this figure has exploded to $70.00 per day, or well over twice the cost of nine years ago. This figure surely substantiates the President's fear of inflation. But it also warns us that the availability of medical services has not kept pace with the increased demand for such services. We cannot neglect this problem.

Since the prime factor in delivering health services to those who need medical attention is health manpower, I find it extremely difficult to understand why, in his budget for Public Law 9490 (The Health Manpower Act of 1968), the President has cut 83 million from the 322 million authorized for fiscal 1970. This Act, incorporating the Health Professions Educational Improvement Program of 1963, provides the matrix for operating grants, construction grants, and loans for medical students which are offered by the Federal Government. If we deny this type of assistance to our medical institutions, we can expect an even greater decrease in the number of medical professionals available, and a concomitant ratio decrease in the number of facilities available to our people.

There are already serious indications that many promising students have become disenchanted with the total elasticity of federal aid to their education. Many who rely on the Federal Government for financial assistance may now find themselves in the untenable position of entering their second, third, or fourth year of medical study without the prospect of sufficient funds to finish their education.

This is not aided by the Administration's proposal to cut 20 million from the health professions student loans. And the high 8.5 percent prime interest rate makes it increasingly difficult for students to obtain commercial loans even at the authorized government-guaranteed rate of 7 percent. The total impact of this action could well be that of forcing a number of students to withdraw from their medical education programs. We simply cannot afford this.

Quite simply, a lack of congressional response to these students' requirements will do more harm to the national health crisis than it will good to brake inflation. In fact, inflation in the coming decade will be increased by it.

This point is dramatically illustrated by Professor John E. Baldwin from the University of Oregon. Professor Baldwin states:

"Without support, we have been faced with the hard financial necessity of dismantling the skilled core of scientific capability and the momentum or productive work we have gathered and attained since 1966. I have had to fire my two most senior research collaborators and turn down requests from new graduate students asking me to serve as their thesis research advisor; my graduate students are continuing experimental work with chemicals paid for through selling selections from our glassware stock. We're living on and dissipating our material and human capital."

Dr. Robert A. Campbell, Associate Professor of Pediatrics at the University of Oregon Medical School, places a moral value on the lack of federal consistency in funding student research:

"I would be most appreciative if you would take the time to make it clear to those whose serve on committees related to health research fields that there are many of us who cannot honorably recruit young people for careers in these fields if periodically their economic livelihood is in jeopardy due to budgetary changes in our federal spending. The kinds or work most of these young people are doing is the slow, painstaking, useless kind of work that Ben Franklin talked about when he said, "There is nothing more useless than a baby.' They are caring for the infant science of human biology and are going to nature it so long as we give them adequate support and recognition for their capabilities and dedication."

I would like to draw the Committee's attention to another section of the Health Manpower Act which, if not properly funded, may place many of our medical institutions in an embarrassing and precarious position. Sections 771a(1) and 771b(1) require that any institution which received an educational improvement grant in fiscal 1969 must increase its first year-new student enrollment by either 2½% or 5 students, whichever is larger, in order to qualify for a continued grant in fiscal 1970. With an increased enrollment, it would seem that the guaranteed federal funding should be increased accordingly. But this is not the case.

Dr. Louis G. Terkla, Dean of the University of Oregon Dental School, cogently points out the disaster which can hit an institution which has fulfilled this requirement:

"These Acts (Health Manpower Act) appropriated construction and educational improvement monies for health professional schools, and awards were made to institutions that agreed to increase their entering class sizes. The University of Oregon Dental School holds such an award, granted in 1966 and continued through 1969. To qualify, we increased our entering freshman class from 80 to 85 students beginning in the fall of 1969. The award provided funds for 12.5 full-time equivalent faculty, some equipment, and $8,000 per year in travel, and for remodeling of the facility to accommodate the additional students. The school was designed for 80 students per class. When the Health Manpower Act of 1968 was passed, it legislated that those schools with an educational improvement grant award must once again increase the entering class by 2½% or five students, whichever is larger, in order to qualify for continuation of the award in 1970. However, they can only guarantee an award in 1970 that will be no less than the award in 1969. Discussion with the National Institutes of Health staff has convinced us that we have been forced into the position of enrolling more students without receiving additional money to teach them, to make space for them, and to equip their work stations. Requests for waiver will be looked upon unfavorably and if denied, the institution will lose its grant award for that year. Since our program is geared to the first 5-student increase and we are dependent upon the award to pay the salaries of 12.5 full-time equivalents, our back is to the wall. In effect, it is a form of blackmail—either to increase our enrollment a second time at no extra cost to the government, or lose the financial support that we are now dependent upon. This dilemma is bad enough in terms of dollars, but it is compounded by the fact that additional students must be admitted against a slashed financial aid program.

"Unless the appropriations are increased, the Health Professions Educational Assistance Program has the potential of (1) creating serious fiscal problems for health professional schools, (2) causing deterioration in the quality of educational programs that will be reflected in poorer health care for the public, and (3) defeating the major purposes for which the legislation was created. Frankly, if State funds were available, this institution would retrench and cut its enrollment back to the original 80 students per entering class."

Mr. Chairman, many schools with increased enrollment are relying on the outcome of this appropriations bill. Should we fail to provide the increased funds in deference to military and space programs, which, in terms of expenditures, certainly tend to be more inflationary that the public health programs, we will have done a grave injustice to the problem of medical education in this country.

The most disturbing aspect of a possible decrease in medical funding programs seems to me the reversion to the antedeluvian principle that money will be the final criterion in deciding whether or not an individual will obtain medical attention. If we continue to allow the cost of medical attention to rise by decreasing the number of medical facilities, we shall only exclude the poorer segments of the population from the treatment which is their right, not their privilege.

I most strongly urge each member of this Committee to consider the national exercise of this right as his personal responsibility. I submit that, at this stage of our national development, programs which contribute to the national good should be given the highest priority, and programs which benefit the average citizen peripherally at best, such as military expansion and space exploration, should be subjected to a more realistic scrutiny by members of Congress and by the Administration. I request each member of this Committee to carefully consider the values at stake, and to appropriate a maximum and realistic sum to provide for the continued support of our medical institutions.

At this point, I should like to include in the RECORD several letters received from Oregon medical institutions. I also feel that each of us here will find distinct parallels between the plight faced by the medical schools in my State, and the problem faced throughout the country.

THE RENUNCIATION OF BACTERIOLOGICAL WARFARE: A STEP TOWARD ARMS LIMITATION

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, last week President Nixon announced that this Nation will never engage in germ warfare, that it will unilaterally destroy its stockpile of bacteriological weapons, and that it will henceforth limit its research in this field to defensive measures.

President Nixon must be given credit for a wise decision and for one of the most significant initiatives ever taken by the head of a great power toward reducing the arsenal of weapons of mass destruction.

This was certainly not an easy decision to make.

Other Presidents have wrestled with the same problems. Like all of us, they found the mere prospect of bacteriological warfare repugnant, even as a retaliatory measure. But in the absence of any assurance from the other side that they were prepared to stop stockpiling such weapons and to destroy existing stockpiles, no former President was prepared to take the risk of unilateral renunciation.

President Nixon has now decided to take that risk in the interest of peace.

We can afford to take this risk, because the Soviets know, just as we do, that a deadly epidemic unleased in any major nation might ultimately spread throughout the world.

Furthermore, we can afford to take this risk because we would always reserve the option to reply to such an attack by using other weapons in our arsenal.

It is encouraging that in the President's call for the ratification of the Geneva Protocol on Chemical and Biological Warfare, he has reserved our right to employ nondeadly chemicals, as we are now doing in Vietnam.

In dealing with domestic disturbances, law enforcement authorities in many nations employ tear gas as a minimum force weapon.

If tear gas were not used, if guns and clubs were employed instead, domestic disturbances would result in a greater number of casualties and casualties far more serious than occur in such incidents today.

If tear gas can be used in military situations instead of guns, it is in the interest of humanity to do so. I fail to understand the reasoning of those who, in the name of humanitarianism, want us to renounce military use of nonlethal gases which are used in every modern nation for riot control.

It is my hope that, in response to the President's request, the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Senate as a whole will move to ratify the Geneva protocol as expeditiously as possible. This ratification will be a milestone in America's search for peace.

DENIAL OF TAX-EXEMPT STATUS TO CERTAIN ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. FANNIN. Mr. President, I recently introduced a bill to deny tax-exempt status to organizations which would otherwise be tax exempt where they engage in activities in support of a political party or any candidate for public office or to carry on any voter registration.

Labor organizations have made the claim that no such measure as this is necessary because this area is already covered by the Corrupt Practices Act.

Mr. President, the Congressional Quarterly recently commented on "Loopholes in the Corrupt Practices Act of 1925." The article points out the ineffectiveness of this act in curbing political activities.

I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOOPHOLES IN THE CORRUPT PRACTICES ACT OF 1925

With the exception of some of the introductory material in this report, all the campaign receipts and expenditure figures are based on reports filed in accordance with the Corrupt Practices Act of 1925—a law filled with loopholes.

First, the Corrupt Practices Act does not require reports of contributions or expenditures in either Presidential or Congressional primary campaigns, or in connection with campaigns for a party's Presidential nomination—even though these efforts involve millions of dollars of expenses.

Secondly, though the law requires Senate and House candidates to report all spending made with their "knowledge or consent," most candidates interpret this to cover only their so-called "personal" campaign expenditures. Many candidates report they had absolutely no expenditures whatever, or spent just a few hundred dollars on their campaigns, only a fraction of what any observer knew their real campaign costs were.

Having reported no spending or just nominal sums as their personal spending, the great majority of candidates take refuge in the legal fiction that the committees working in their behalf did so without their "knowledge or consent." Those committees, in turn, are not required to file because the Corrupt Practices Act specifically excludes political committees which work within a single state.

Thirdly, national-level political committees can hide their transfers of campaign money to candidates by simply reporting transfers of gross sums to state committees which are allied with the national group. The state committees, in turn, transfer the money to individual candidates, but the names of the recipients never appear on the nationally filed reports. This practice is traditional for labor union political funds and has more recently been adopted by groups like the American Medical Political Action Committee.

Fourth, political committees can hide the actual purposes of their reported expenditures by simply listing the purpose as "payment for professional services" or a similarly meaningless phrase.

Fifth, the actual identity of contributors can often be hidden by failing to give full names or giving addresses so incomplete that they make positive identification of the givers impossible.

Even with its loopholes, the Corrupt Practices Act is not enforced. The Act stipulates fines of up to $10,000 and/or two years in prison for willful noncompliance. Yet there has never been a single prosecution for failure to comply with the reporting requirements of the Corrupt Practices Act. The stated policy of the Justice Department, last spelled out by Attorney General Herbert Brownell in 1954 and confirmed by the Justice Department in a 1963 letter to Congressional Quarterly (which had inquired about failure to prosecute 54 U.S. House candidates who failed to file any reports whatever in 1962), is "not to institute investigations into possible violations of (the Act) in the absence of a request from the Clerk of the House of Representatives or Secretary of the Senate." Neither the Clerk nor the Secretary (both elected officials of their respective bodies) ever have referred any possible violations to the Justice Department.

In 1966 and again in 1967, President Johnson proposed wide-ranging campaign spending reform bills. An even more comprehensive measure was written in the House Administration Committee. (For 1966 action, see 1966 Almanac p. 484; for current status, 1967 Weekly Report p. 1155.)

REGULATION OF THE OCEAN FLOOR

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I invite the attention of Senators to the lead editorial in this morning's New York Times, entitled "Regulating the Ocean Floor."

The editorial comment points up the current negotiations now underway in the United Nations with respect to developing a legal framework for the exploitation of the seabed and deep ocean floor, and it contains the observation—correctly, I believe—

There is a growing danger that a race for universal riches on or below the ocean floor may precipitate a new era of colonial competition and that unregulated claims to deep seabed territory may compromise territorial rights of all nations to freedom of the sea.

To underscore these very real and interrelated dangers, the Times editorial then outlines the inadequacies of existing international law of the sea, particularly the Geneva Convention on the Continental Shelf, and urges the United States to support the resolution aimed at ascertaining the views of the members of the United Nations with regard to a new international conference on the Continental Shelf question.

In this connection, I am sure that Senators will recall that on Wednesday last I submitted a sense-of-the-Senate resolution calling upon the President to make a formal request to the Secretary General of the United Nations that the Shelf Convention be reopened in accordance with article XIII. I should hope that the resolution would be read in conjunction with the Times editorial, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REGULATING THE OCEAN FLOOR

The United Nations will vote tomorrow on a number of proposals concerning the peaceful uses of the seabed. This is a matter of urgent international concern because rapid technological development is making it possible to exploit an ever-increasing portion of the two-thirds of the earth's surface over which there is no clear national or international jurisdiction.

There is growing danger that a race for mineral riches on or below the ocean floor may precipitate a new era of colonial competition and that uregulated claims to deep seabed territory may compromise traditional rights of all nations to freedom of the sea. There is also a strong feeling among developing countries that the wealth of the sea floor should be shared and not left entirely to the more advanced nations that are best able to extract these untapped resources.

Although American spokesmen have endorsed the broad concept of international control over the deep seabed and the sharing of its benefits, the United States has not come forward with specific proposals to achieve these goals. Despite the urgency of the problem, Washington has supported a go-slow policy in U.N. deliberations on this subject. The current resolution delays development of an international rule of law and it may lead to a de facto situation contrary to over-all American interest.

Under the Geneva Convention of 1958 on the continental shelf, coastal states have exclusive rights to the resources of the seabed out to a depth of 200 meters (656 feet) or, beyond that limit, "to where the depth of the superjacent waters admits of the exploitation of the natural resources." Now technology, apparently unanticipated in 1958, now permits exploitation far beyond the 200-meter mark and thus renders the 1958 boundary limitless.

American oil interests, already drilling at 1,300 feet, are well satisfied with this ambiguous situation. But legal experts, such as Columbia University's Louis Henkin, have pointed out that unlimited claims to sovereignty over its offshore seabed by the United States could lead to similar claims by others to the seas above the ocean floor off their coasts. This certainly would not be compatible with American naval and maritime interests, nor with those of American fishermen who drag in foreign waters—off Peru, for example.

It would be appropriate for the United States to support a Maltese resolution which calls on the Secretary General to initiate discussions pointing to a new international conference to update the 1958 Geneva Convention on the continental shelf. In addition, we believe the United States should support any action by the current General Assembly that would speed up the development of at least a minimal international regime to supervise the orderly exploitation of seabed resources beyond whatever national limits may be set.

TESTIMONY OF SGT. ALBERT CHANG

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, Sgt. Albert Chang, one of my constituents, whose home is in Kaneohe, Hawaii, recently appeared before the Senate Government Operations Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations. He testified concerning his experiences in the money changing black market in Vietnam.

Although I was not present to hear his testimony, I am told by the subcommittee that Sergeant Chang's presentation was extremely frank and open and that he was very helpful.

In my opinion, he did a courageous thing in coming from Fort Shafter, Honolulu, where he is at present assigned, to testify in Washington on this matter.

His life has been threatened. I feel it is lamentable, indeed, that for such an act of service to his country he now lives in fear of his life.

Mr. President, Sergeant Chang's action is something of which to be proud and I hope it will win the respect and appreciation of his fellow citizens. I believe his testimony should be brought to public attention; therefore, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF ALBERT CHANG

My name is Albert Chang. I am a Sergeant First Class in the United States Army. I am a photographer presently assigned to the U.S. Army Pacific at Fort Shafter, Hawaii.

I am 47 years old. I am a native of the Island of Maui in Hawaii.

I have been in the Army a total of 24 years. I served as a soldier in World War Two and as a combat photographer in the Korean War and in Vietnam.

My decorations include the Bronze Star, the Army Commendation Medal with four clusters, the Purple Heart, the Good Conduct Medal with five loops, the American Defense Medal, Pacific Asiatic Theater Medal, the World War Two Victory Medal, the Army of Occupation Medal (Korea and Japan), the National Defense Service Medal, Korean Wharang Distinguished Service Medal with Gold Star, Korean Service Medal with five campaign stars, United Nations Service Medal, Vietnamese Campaign Medal with two campaign stars, the Vietnamese Service Medal and the Unit Citation medal with one cluster.

My remarks today relate to my service and work in Vietnam.

I was first assigned to Vietnam in January of 1962. I was a combat photographer with the Pacific Mission of Stars and Stripes. My work took me to all combat areas of Vietnam. I was later to be wounded four times, twice very seriously.

In December 1962, my tour was concluded and I returned to the U.S. Army Pacific headquarters at Fort Shafter.

I volunteered to return to Vietnam and was assigned to Vietnam in July 1964. This time I was working out of the MACV Public Information Office as a combat photographer.

I returned to Hawaii in December of 1964. I was about to complete my 20 years of service and had decided to retire from the Army. I retired in March of 1965.

I worked for National Geographic Magazine as a combat photographer in Vietnam for about six months, from April 1965 to November 1965.

Then I went to work for the Associated Press as a combat photographer in Vietnam.

The dates of my employment with the AP in Vietnam were from November 1965 to August 1968.

The Vietnam offices of the AP are in the Eden Building located on the Le Loi Street near the Rex Hotel in downtown Saigon.

Our offices were on the fourth floor.

On the second floor of the Eden Building was an Indian money changer. He used the name "Dima." I don't think that was his real name.

Dima was about 40 years old, a good looking man, always well dressed. He spoke excellent English and was very courteous to his clients.

His office was tastefully furnished and he made no effort to present himself as something other than what he was. He was a money changer and nothing else. Two other men, whom Dima described as his brothers, worked for him.

"Bank of India" was a nickname that Dima's American customers gave him and his office.

My work required that I be away from Saigon and in combat areas most of the time. However, I would be able to return to Saigon for short periods—usually for a day or two—three or four times a month, sometimes more.

During these brief visits, I observed the Dima operation. I found it distressing.

The Indians were making thousands—possibly millions—of dollars in their money changing transactions while many of my friends were getting shot at and killed in combat. The whole thing was upsetting and I made up my mind to try to do something about it.

My first move was to win the confidence of Dima and his associates. I had a friend—an American newsman who engaged in the black market through Dima—introduce me to him and vouch for my reliability. Dima accepted me and I began signing over checks to him of about $100 or $200, on an average of once a month.

The dates of my transactions with Dima were approximately January 1967 through August 1968.

During that period, I wrote Dima about 18 checks.

I will briefly describe the system of currency manipulation which Dima used.

I would write him a personal check for $100 or $200 to be drawn on my account at the First National City Bank in New York. That is where the AP deposited my payroll checks.

I would leave the payee line blank as per Dima's instructions.

Dima did not vary from that system in all my transactions with him. Nor did I ever hear from other persons doing business with him that he varied from that system.

Dima never seemed concerned about the risk involved in his transactions. He would tell us, "Don't worry about getting caught. I have people who will make certain we are not caught."

The profits I would receive from Dima on my investment would vary. It would depend on what the black market was for piasters on the day I negotiated with him.

During most of my dealings with Dima, the official rate, piasters to U.S. dollars, was 118 to one. That is, had I cashed checks at, say, the Chase Manhattan Bank, Saigon Branch, I would have received 118 piasters for every dollar. That was the legal rate.

However, by cashing my checks with Dima, I would receive anywhere from 135 piasters to the dollar to as much as 190. It all depended on what the black market in dollars was on the day I went to Dima.

Anyway, I would give Dima a $100 or $200 check with the payee line left blank. He would immediately repay me in piasters at the black market rate.

I entered into these transactions with Dima so that I could ultimately expose his operations. I did not profit personally from any of these activities. After Dima would pay me, I would take for myself the piasters which I was entitled to under the official rate of 118 piasters to one dollar and give the remainder to charitable organizations in Saigon. One of the organizations I frequently gave these black market piasters to was the Bo Dap Orphanage in the Gia Dinh sector of Saigon.

Actually, the profit on a $100 or $200 check was not much money no matter how lucrative the market for dollars was that day. I was a smalltime operator.

But there were many of us so-called small time operators—hundreds of them—doing business with Dima. I believed that there were many so-called big time spenders doing business with Dima too.

I would go down to Dima's office some days and talk with him and watch the people come in and change their money with him. Dima was always every evasive with me. It was difficult to pin him down on anything specific. I did conclude, though, that his clientele was large and it included many persons, both civilian contractors and military officers, in high places. It was because of his powerful customers that he felt he was immune from the Vietnamese law.

Because of these conversations with Dima and because I was one of his regular customers, he and I became friendly. He trusted me. So I had achieved my first goal in exposing him. I had won his confidence.

I did not go to the Vietnamese Customs office, which had charge of policing currency violators, or to the U.S. Army CID because I was afraid to. It was common knowledge that Dima was being protected by people in high places—but I didn't know who was protecting him. Therefore, I wasn't sure what authorities I could trust.

Frankly, I was afraid for my life. There was no doubt in my mind that had Dima known I was spying on him—or that I might turn him in—he would have had me murdered. You can have someone killed in Vietnam for as little as $50 and Dima, I felt, was not above having it done. After all, he was the only illegal money changer in Saigon that I knew about who never got raided by Vietnamese Customs. The papers were full of stories about Indian money changers being raided. But never Dima. I do not think this was a coincidence.

I wanted to expose Dima—but I wanted to do it right, to make sure he was put out of business for good. At the same time, I wanted to stay healthy myself. So I waited, hoping that the opportunity would present itself for me to give my evidence and information to authorities who would crack down on him.

In the meantime—this would have been in March of 1968—I was hit in the chest by shrapnel in a battle I was covering at the 25th Div. It was the fourth time I had been wounded in Vietnam and I decided it would, hopefully, be my last. I had been through three wars. I decided to leave war zones for good. But I still wanted to get Dima.

I told him I was returning to Hawaii soon. Dima asked me to check in with him just before I left. He wanted me to do him a favor.

The favor he wanted me to do turned out to be this: He asked me to smuggle about five large envelopes of checks to Hawaii and to mail them from Hawaii. The envelopes were addressed to the Marine Midland Grace T. of New York, Marine Midland Building, 140 Broadway, New York, New York 10015; and to Manfra, Tordella and Brooks, Inc., 44 Whitehall Street, New York, New York 10004.

I said I would take the envelopes to Hawaii and mail them for him. This was the evidence I was waiting for. Once I arrived in Hawaii, I wrote a letter to the Commanding General, Headquarters, MACV, J–1 Division, and included with it the envelopes Dima had given me containing the checks.

I did not sign my name to the letter or put a return address on the envelopes.

In the letter, I explained who Dima was, how his operation worked, and other information about his illegal activities in currency manipulation.

I felt that with this letter and with the checks as evidence, Dima could be arrested and then put out of business.

I did not mail four of the checks to the U.S. Army; however, I kept them for another purpose I will discuss later.

I have since learned that my letter and the checks arrived in Saigon September 14, 1968. I do not know what action was taken because of this information since I have not returned to Vietnam.

I terminated my employment with the AP in August in Saigon shortly before I left for Hawaii.

Upon arriving, I went to work as a photographer with the Honolulu Advertiser, a daily newspaper there.

I stayed with the Advertiser four months. Then I asked the Army to recall me into the service. I felt guilty about not being with the troops at the front lines in Vietnam. The knowledge that they were fighting and I was back in the states—in civilian life—depressed me. I was making a poor adjustment to civilian life and I wanted to be back in the Army.

Added to this was the fact that my son, an Army Captain, was in Vietnam, serving with the 25th Division.

In November of 1968—while with the Advertiser—a handcarried letter from Dima was delivered to me. It was carried by a newspaper friend of mine from Saigon.

In the letter, Dima indicated he knew I had not mailed the envelopes to the New York financial establishments. He urged me to mail the envelopes back to him in Saigon. That was all the letter said.

I did not answer the letter.

Then, in December of 1968, a second letter from Dima arrived. This letter was postmarked Hong Kong and arrived through the regular mail.

In this second letter, Dima indicated he knew I had given detailed information of his activities to the government and that I had also turned over the black market checks to the authorities.

Dima said he would "get me" no matter how long it would take. He did not use the word murder or kill. But there was no doubt that's what he meant. I was worried, of course. I destroyed that letter along with the first letter.

The four checks I had kept from the original envelopes I brought back from Saigon amounted to $4,000.

I took those checks and deposited them in my account. My purpose was to donate that $4,000 to funds at the 25th and 1st Divisions. The funds are for college scholarships for the children of men killed in action.

As a photographer covering the 25th and 1st Divisions, I had done some promotional work for these scholarship funds and I felt great compassion for the children of Americans who had died in this war.

Additionally, I wanted to get back—if that is the right word—at Dima and those people making money from the black market. My taking $4,000 for the scholarship funds from their pockets was a way to punish them, I guess, for their illegal activity.

But later I had second thoughts. I sent the money back to Dima by bank draft. I sent two checks for $2,000 each.

I sent the first check in December of 1968 or January of 1969. The second check was sent in March of 1969. I cannot find the first cancelled check. But I have the second. I have it here.

I felt bad about having taken this $4,000. It was for a good cause—the scholarship fund. Yet it was a form of stealing—even though it was stealing from a lawbreaker, Dima.

But it was still theft and I had never done anything like that before.

I have not heard from Dima directly since the second letter, the one that arrived in December.

In July of 1969, I was interviewed in Hawaii by Mr. Duffy of the Subcommittee staff. I told him what I have just told the Subcommittee.

Shortly after my interview with Mr. Duffy, I received a telephone call—it was a local call, placed in Honolulu—from an American whose voice I could not identify.

I don't know how this caller got my home phone number since my number is unlisted. Anyway, the caller seemed to be speaking for Dima. He told me basically what Dima had said in the December letter.

He said they would "get me." He did not say murder or kill. But that's what he meant.

In August of this year, CID investigators interviewed me in Hawaii. I told them what I had told Mr. Duffy and what I have told you today.

I have not heard from Dima or anyone else involving these matters since then—except for my conversation with Mr. Duffy.

SENATOR BYRD OF WEST VIRGINIA REVEALS REVERSAL OF U.S. RHODESIAN POLICY

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, on November 26, 1969, I made a statement for West Virginia radio stations concerning the need for changing this country's foreign policy on Rhodesia.

I ask unanimous consent that the transcript of that statement be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the transcript was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RHODESIAN SANCTIONS

Some time ago I said in a speech that the United States needs to review and update its foreign policies in the 1970's in every part of the world. I believe that one of the first subjects for such a review should be our position regarding Rhodesia.

Last month, the people of Rhodesia marked the fourth anniversary of their independence from Great Britain.

Next month will mark the end of the third year of United States' economic sanctions against Rhodesia with no let-up in sight.

The irony of those sanctions—which were supposed to bring the Rhodesian "rebels" to their knees—is that the United States stands virtually alone in honoring the sanctions.

The sanctions—promulgated by the United Nations ostensibly because Rhodesia posed a threat to international peace—actually represent an unsuccessful power play on the part of Great Britain to topple the government of Ian Smith and restore British political prerogatives in Rhodesia.

I think that former Secretary of State Dean Acheson summed up our Rhodesian policy pretty well last year when he said . . . and I quote . . . "the United States is engaged in an international conspiracy, instigated by Britain and blessed by the United Nations, to overthrow the government of a country that has done us no harm and threatens no one."

And so, my fellow West Virginians, I feel that the fact of the matter is that Rhodesia is being made to suffer because it suits the purposes of our ally, Great Britain, and because certain nations take issue with Rhodesia's internal racial policies. In the latter regard, the United States is hardly in a position to throw stones.

The power play against Rhodesia has failed miserably. Rhodesia's economy is healthy today, perhaps even booming. The nation's gross national product in 1965, the year of its independence, was $986 million. This year, it is expected to reach $1.2 billion. Although other UN nations aren't supposed to be trading with Rhodesia, it is reported that foreign goods, from Japanese radios to European cars, are in abundant supply.

In continuing to honor the sanctions against Rhodesia, the United States is, in a manner of speaking, cutting off its own nose. Whereas we used to turn to Rhodesia for a large share of high-grade chromite ore at $25 a ton, we now buy the same ore from Soviet Russia at nearly twice the price. There is reliable evidence to indicate that some of the ore the Russians sell to us at a profit is bought by the Russians themselves from Rhodesia.

It is bad enough from an economic and strategic standpoint that we should have to depend on Russia for this chromite ore which is needed in production of steel and other militarily and industrially vital materials.

It is worse from a moral standpoint to depend on Russia. For if we become a party to punishing Rhodesia because of that country's internal racial policies (which are none of our business), then it is hypocritical for us to continue to trade with the totalitarian Soviet Union which has virtually enslaved entire populations.

It was recently pointed out that there is no such thing as majority rule in other African countries such as Kenya, Zambia, Ethiopia, Somalia, and Tanzania.

Yet, we do not impose economic sanctions against any of those nations. I do not suggest that we have any right to meddle in the internal affairs of those countries. But, by the same token, I do not think that we should continue our single-handed crusade against Rhodesia. It is a crusade that we agreed to in order to please our friends in Britain, even though our British friends continued their trade with North Vietnam notwithstanding the war in which Hanoi has long been engaged against us. We never should have gotten into such a hypocritical position to start with. Now that we stand alone, we should make a speedy reversal of our Rhodesian policy and make certain that we don't get ourselves into such a foolish position again.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALLEN in the chair). Under the previous order the period for the transaction of routine morning business expires at 11:15 a.m. and the unfinished business is to be laid before the Senate.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the morning hour be extended for 10 additional minutes.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I wonder if we might proceed to lay the unfinished business before the Senate and then yield time to the Senator from the controlled time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas withdraw his request?

Mr. DOLE. I withdraw my request.

TAX REFORM ACT OF 1969

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the order of Wednesday, November 26, 1969, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H.R. 13270), the Tax Reform Act of 1969.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will resume the consideration of the bill.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. ELLENDER).

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I yield, on behalf of the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. ELLENDER), 5 minutes to the Senator from Kansas, and it is my understanding that the able minority whip will likewise yield 5 minutes to the Senator.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I wish to ask how much time the Senator from Kansas would like to have.

Mr. DOLE. About 5 minutes.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, it was my understanding that the Senator wanted 10 minutes, but I yield 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Kansas for not to exceed 10 minutes, the time to be charged equally to both sides.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PRESERVING THE DIGNITY OF AMERICAN FIGHTING MEN

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, one of the regrettable developments resulted from the efforts of some individuals who wish to exploit the Mylai tragedy of March 1968, is that it has evolved into an attack on the dignity of the U.S. armed services.

There is an effort by some to imply that violent attacks similar to the isolated incident which took place at Mylai, frequently occur in those areas in Vietnam occupied by U.S. military forces. The Mylai issue has become the latest tool for those strongly opposed to the administration's Vietnam policy and its program to terminate the war. It appears to be the intention of these individuals to represent the Mylai tragedy as a symbol of all present and future acts undertaken by the administration in Vietnam.

Statements given through the news media tell the public that U.S. forces are indiscriminately slaughtering the innocent and guilty alike in conducting their military operations. I consider such statements not only careless but injurious to the character of the American fighting man.

I, in no way, condone or rationalize the willful slaughter of civilian noncombatants, and if the accused in the Mylai affair are found guilty, they should be dealt with as prescribed by law.

Rather than concern for prosecution and punishment of the guilty there appears to be a calculated attempt to utilize the Mylai affair to insinuate that it represents the norm in the daily conduct of U.S. military operations in Vietnam.

Mr. President, I know this insinuation to be untrue. A member of my staff requested and received a briefing from the Office of the U.S. Army Planning and Operations Division. He was particularly interested in the education and training of U.S. military procedures to assure the proper humane treatment and handling of civilians and prisoners of war in Vietnam. A synopsis of this briefing contained the following highlights:

All U.S. military personnel receive indoctrination as to the aforementioned subject prior to and after their arrival in Vietnam. They are reminded that the Vietcong can capitalize on examples of bad conduct by U.S. military personnel, and that the defeat of the enemy can be enhanced through an understanding and generosity displayed toward the people of South Vietnam.

Every member of the U.S. Forces in Vietnam personally receives instructions as to the treatment of civilians and prisoners of war and in addition, is instructed as to what constitutes a war crime. For example, in regard to prisoners the articles each member of the U.S. Armed Forces receives contain these highlights:

1. In the disarming, searching, and guarding of prisoners of war, military law requires that the prisoners be treated humanely;

2. Injury inflicted upon a captive is a criminal offense;

3. A sick and wounded captive must receive the best treatment available;

4. All suspects, civilians and other persons detained must be protected against violence, insults, and reprisals of any kind.

BASIS OF CURRENT U.S. MILITARY LAW ON WAR CRIMES

Mr. President, in regard to matters pertaining to the definition and investigation of war crimes, current U.S. military legal services are based upon six sources: First, the Geneva conventions of 1949; second, the Hague conventions of 1907; third, the Uniform Code of Military Justice; fourth, FM27–10; fifth, MACV directive 20–4 (0); and sixth, MACV directive 190–3.

It is inconceivable that anyone should regard what took place in the village of Mylai in March of 1968, as in any way representative of the general conduct of American forces in South Vietnam. The general conduct of the American serviceman in Vietnam, participating in an unpopular war and in the face of extreme hardships and frustrations, which have characterized this protracted, bloody conflict, has been notably outstanding.

Mr. President, I wish to make these additional comments concerning developments surrounding the Mylai incident.

There is the possibility that this incident will result in further disunity among the American people, especially if the incident is successfully applied to be representative of American policy in Vietnam. The Mylai incident must not be extended beyond its proper perspective and applied to other areas for partisan or personal pursuits. It is not the function of the Senate of the United States, at this point in the course of events concerning the incident, to provide judgment in any respect. Recent statements by the news media offer continued evidence of a lack of concern for individuals accused of crimes to be afforded a fair trial unprejudiced by prejudgment.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas yield?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I wish to commend the Senator from Kansas for his statement, which provides some important and valuable information for the RECORD. It is information of which all of us should be aware.

In particular, I wish to underscore the Senator's comments that the Mylai incident, as it has been reported, is by no means typical of the conduct of U.S. troops.

In May of 1966 I had the opportunity to visit South Vietnam for about a week. I recall a number of instances when I was particularly impressed by the attitude of American troops toward Vietnamese civilians.

For example, I recall being with a Marine outfit and visiting a hospital which the members of this unit had set up in the field.

At great sacrifice to themselves, these marines and doctors who were assigned primarily to care for U.S. troops, were spending their spare time treating Vietnamese civilians, and particularly children who were brought from considerable distances for treatment of injuries and diseases of all kinds.

Finally, it was a moving experience to see the attitude, the kindness, and the humaneness with which our American troops were treating the Vietnamese civilians.

I hope and pray that the news media will put the Mylai incident in perspective; that they will make sure the American people realize this was an isolated incident which is not at all typical of the general conduct of our troops in Vietnam.

Again, I commend the distinguished Senator from Kansas for making what I consider to be a very important statement.

Mr. DOLE. The Senator from Michigan has put his finger on the heart of the matter. The Mylai incident is a rare exception. It is not the norm. The norm is, as the Senator has pointed out, in the good deeds our American soldiers have rendered everywhere in the world, not just in Vietnam. That has been the symbol of the American fighting man for as long as I can remember. For as long as I can remember, it has been the outstanding generosity of the American fighting man which has exemplified his spirit. Thus, I would hope that we would not capitalize on what might be a rare exception in American history.

Let us punish those who are guilty, but let us not prejudge them.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas yield?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. HANSEN. I, too, would like to compliment the distinguished Senator from Kansas for the contribution he has made this morning.

In listening to the radio and television and reading the newspapers, I gathered that there has been worldwide distress and infuriation expressed over this incident, but it is not all directed toward the servicemen who have been involved in it. Part of that distress and infuriation is directed at the news media for the way they have handled the situation.

It does seem to me that there is some reason to agree with those who express indignation over the handling of this incident by the news media, which have been insensitive to the feelings of the viewing and reading public.

Things do happen which none of us condones. Certainly no one in the Army condones this incident.

Every effort will be made, as the distinguished Senator from Kansas has pointed out, to see that whatever the facts are, they will be brought before the court and will be handled according to law.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the Senator from Wyoming. I would only say there are some who feel that the only news is bad news, which is not true, of course.

TRIBUTE TO REPRESENTATIVE RICHARD D. McCARTHY—THE VALUE OF PERSEVERANCE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, President Nixon's momentous decision last week to ask the Senate to ratify the 1925 Geneva accord that prohibits its signers from first using poison gas attests to the value of perseverance for the Democratic Representative from New York, RICHARD D. McCARTHY. McCARTHY's untiring efforts to turn this Nation away from the madness of chemical and biological warfare have been, at last, somewhat recognized by President Nixon's announcement.

For those of us who have labored for those things we consider important and in the best interest of this Nation, Congressman McCARTHY's efforts and success are a light at the end of the tunnel. His statement on these recent developments is one we should all pay attention to:

I think this proves that we can achieve necessary change within the American system. It just requires accuracy but basically perseverance.

Bravo to Congressman McCARTHY's perseverance. May we all take a lesson from his experience.

I ask unanimous consent that the article from Sunday's Washington Post be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BAN ON GERM WAR PLEASES OPPONENT

(By Robert A. Hunt)

"I think this proves that we can achieve necessary change within the American system. It just requires accuracy but basically perseverance."

The speaker was Rep. Richard Dean McCarthy, a 42-year-old New York Democrat who, spurred by a "quite horrified" wife, launched a congressional drive last February against germ and gas warfare.

He was jubilant over President Nixon's order last Tuesday to destroy existing stockpiles of bacteriological weapons, as well as over Mr. Nixon's pledge that this country would not engage in germ warfare, will confine research to defensive measures and the President's call for Senate ratification of a 1925 treaty to ban initial use of gas or germs as weapons of war.

McCarthy still harbors reservations that Mr. Nixon didn't rule out tear gas and herbicides that the United States has been using in Vietnam. While feeling the tear gas issue poses a threat to Senate ratification of the protocol, "I don't think it is insoluble."

INTERPRETATION NEEDED

The one-time Buffalo Evening News reporter, in an interview, suggested that some international understanding and uniform interpretation is needed "on just what the Geneva protocol prohibits, because there is ambiguity."

It was this 1925 agreement, which the United States played a major role in shaping but which the Senate never acted upon, that bans first use of "asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases and of bacteriological methods of warfare."

Senate Democratic leaders have pledged action on the protocol in a month.

"I believe the U.S. should not attempt to exclude tear gas from the coverage of the protocol," McCarthy said, "and I don't think we should be destroying food supplies with herbicides."

McCarthy said, however, "I think the issues can be resolved if the proper spirit is shown. We should approach them with a positive frame of mind."

In 1930, McCarthy said, a dozen signatory nations to the protocol said they felt tear gas was covered under the prohibitions.

And in a speech earlier this month at Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, McCarthy said a GI's letter described how tear gas was used to drive the North Vietnamese into the open where a number then were killed.

CITES TV PROGRAM

How did McCarthy's interest in the chemical and biological warfare—CBW—subject start?

"Last Feb. 4 we were watching an NBC television program devoted to germ and gas warfare," he said. "It showed dead sheep in Utah, experiments with gas, and was pretty horrifying. My wife sent the five kids to bed because she didn't want them to see it. She was quite horrified, turned to me and said: 'You're a congressman. What do you know about this?' I told her I knew nothing but the next day I began to find out."

McCarthy set up plans for an Army briefing on the CBW issue for members of Congress on March 4. He kept on working.

"They refused to admit staff people without a secret clearance on file at the Defense Department," he recalled.

However, McCarthy said: "They told us very little we didn't know already and actually used it as a pitch for more money on CBW."

Then McCarthy drew up a series of questions, sent them off to the Defense and State Departments among others.

"I got them back in April and they were a mass of contradictions," McCarthy said.

At about this point, McCarthy called for U.S. ratification of the Geneva protocol as well as the British convention which bans all germ warfare, more restrictions on transportation, testing and disposal of such materials, and an end to secrecy surrounding the program.

Congress then wrote in requirements that the Defense Department find that open-air testing of gas weapons is necessary in the interests of national security, that governors be given particulars of such tests, plus certain requirements on transporting the deadly articles.

With mail coming in to back up his position, McCarthy made a series of speeches around the country on gern warfare.

TARGET OF CRITICISM

"At first there was a lot of criticism and I was accused of backing unilateral disarmament," he said. "There was some skepticism, including the White House, but I think the President's announcement vindicates our basic approach."

McCarthy's office got an advance indication that a presidential announcement was on the way while he was in London taking part in an international CBW conference.

The official verification came while he and his wife, Gail, were over the Atlantic on the way home.

"The plane captain came looking for me. He had a message saying the President was to submit the protocol to the Senate. My wife and I were ecstatic," he said.

McCarthy, who served in the South Pacific in the Navy from 1945–46 and in the Far East with the Army in 1950–52, also got an added bonus on the timing of the Nixon decision. His germ warfare book, "The Ultimate Folly," was published the next day.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, with the time to be equally divided and charged against both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

The Chair hears none, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TAX REFORM ACT OF 1969

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 13270), the Tax Reform Act of 1969.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as may be necessary to make my opening remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Louisiana.

ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, before I proceed, I would like to add, by unanimous consent, the name of the senior Senator from Alaska (Mr. STEVENS) as a cosponsor of the amendment now before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I regret that there are so few Senators present to listen to this important debate. I think it is vital that we permit the law regarding the percentage-depletion allowance to remain as is.

We have been debating one of the broadest reaching tax reform measures in the history of this country.

In order to make certain that we do not make erroneous decisions on issues which are both highly controversial in the political sense and highly significant in an economic sense, we should try to dissect each issue in terms not only of its immediate impact upon the tax take of the U.S. Treasury or upon any particular class of taxpayers, but also in terms of its long-range impact on the American taxpayer and the economic balance of the entire nation.

The first issue before us today is one of crucial importance to the State I represent. It is of no less importance to the Nation as a whole, even to States that do not produce oil and gas, and as such it demands very careful and dispassionate study. The issue is that of the percentage depletion allowance, as it affects the taxability of income from the production of petroleum.

In brief, percentage depletion allows both the landowner and the producer to deduct 27½ percent of gross income from net income before computing Federal Income taxes. Since the deduction cannot exceed 50 percent of net income, however, it can never of itself remove all tax liability. In effect, it does no more than to cause the income from mineral production to be treated like income from capital gains.

In the case of petroleum, the theory is that the deduction returns to the owner the value of the oil in the ground—much as provisions for "depreciation" return to other groups of taxpayers the value of machinery which is used or worn out in the course of a business operation.

In other industries, Mr. President, when we apply depreciation to equipment and to buildings at so much per year, the total depreciation can replace the building or the machine on which the depreciation is taken; and in the case of a God-given resource such as oil, which we cannot replace, the same logic should apply. That is why I wish more Senators who oppose this amendment were present to listen to the discussion. Actually, there is considerable weight of evidence that the 27½-percent rate is too low to achieve the stated purpose and vis-a-vis the landowner should be increased rather than decreased.

As it applies to the producer, percentage depletion works as follows: If the company's gross income from a well during a given calendar year is $100,000 and its production costs are $40,000, it net income is $60,000. The percentage depletion allows him to subtract 27½ percent of the gross income, in this case $27,500, from the $60,000 net income figure. Taxable income would be $32,500 rather than

ECONOMIC INCENTIVE NECESSARY

This economic incentive is geared to help overcome the fact that only one exploratory well in nine finds any oil, and only one in 46 finds a commercially profitable accumulation.

In other words, Mr. President, the operator must drill 10 wells to find one that will produce. Only one of 46 or 47 drillings will repay all costs to the owner. Those are things that should be thought through, particularly, as I shall point out later, when the Department of the Interior states that within the next 10 years we are going to need 5 million more barrels of oil per day than we are now producing.

For at least two major reasons, the tendency will be to find less rather than more productive wells. First, extensive exploration over the past several decades has left fewer and fewer fields to be found in the United States. The gamble or the risk factor involved in finding any production becomes higher and higher. Second, the cost of finding and developing petroleum is becoming greater and greater, not only because of the scarcity of the product, but because of constantly rising costs of labor and machinery.

Only by providing realistic incentives can we hope to prevent what is an increasingly bad situation from becoming an intolerable one in terms of the desirable levels of domestic production and in terms of our long-range need for petroleum reserves.

OTHER MINERALS AFFECTED

It should be remembered that this means of providing a financial incentive as an encouragement to an active search for and production of oil and gas is not peculiar to this mineral. As a matter of fact, income realized from the production of almost all minerals is similarly treated.

The only difference is one of degree. Because of its strategic importance and because it is literally the fuel on which the major portion of our economy runs, petroleum enjoys a slightly preferred status vis-a-vis other minerals to the amount of depletion allowances it is accorded.

I have offered the pending amendment, No. 290, which would preserve the law as it now reads, and as it has read for over 40 years. As I shall try to explain, my amendment seeks to avoid a removal of proper incentives at a time when the interests of the American economy and the American consumer demand more, not less, encouragement to the oil industry in its search for new reserves—both of oil and natural gas.

The committee amendment to H.R. 13270 proposes to reduce the depletion allowance as it affects petroleum from 27½ to 23 percent. Over the strenuous objections of its distinguished chairman, my colleague, Senator RUSSELL LONG, the committee also recommended reduction in the percentage depletion allowances of most if not all other minerals.

Although my amendment merely seeks to preserve the present status of the law as it applies to petroleum, I hope to support and to vote for similar amendments which seek to preserve proper incentives for the continued discovery and development of other minerals upon which this country's economic and strategic posture depends.

LIBERALS VERSUS CONSERVATIVES: A FALSE ISSUE

Unfortunately, this issue, like many others, has become in the minds of too many Senators, a proper battleground on which to wage the fight of liberal versus conservative.

As the Wall Street Journal of September 5 quotes a staff aide of one of my colleagues who wants the depletion allowance substantially reduced:

> The oil industry no longer has Bob Kerr, Sam Rayburn and Lyndon Johnson in Washington to help it. The Senate Liberals are itching to get the oil industry this year.

It is not put in terms of facts and figures, or of long-range consequences on Joe Taxpayer and to the economy as a whole. It is not put in terms of its effects on the balance of payments or of the impact it might have on the strength of the dollar. It is put in terms of who will "get" whom.

In recent years, I have seen this unhealthy factor cloud the minds of lawmakers in such a way that they either consciously refuse to consider, or subconsciously are unable to weigh the real, the truly pertinent factors which ought to be taken into account.

Rather than decide an issue on its merits, too many of us tend to fall into line on one side or the other of a controversy by reason of the "Liberal" or "Conservative" labels which have been ascribed by the press, by the political parties or by an endless number of pressure groups and influence peddlers.

It becomes a political sin for a "liberal" Senator to vote the "conservative" line on any major issue. Similarly, the conservative lawmaker is bound by influences of image and pressure politics to avoid voting "liberal" on issues once that position has been so classified.

In too many instances—and I myself am certainly not guiltless—we become so wrapped up in the entanglements of a particular political philosophy, or sometimes a pseudo-philosophy, that we view proponents of the other point of view with a vicious sort of contempt. This is an attitude not born of an honest difference in interpretation of the same basic facts. Rather, it is born of an increasing inability to talk calmly in terms of facts, or even to agree on what the facts are that should be considered and interpreted.

The result is a narrow-minded attitude which causes us either consciously or subconsciously to view any member pleading his case under the opposing banner as a heretic, a bigot, a Communist, a dunce, or a nobody. Certainly, we say to ourselves, there is no need to listen to the arguments of that other fellow. If he is not in my philosophical "camp" on this issue, his arguments certainly cannot bear much logic; his "facts" must be fabrication; his motives must surely be dangerous.

Of course, as I have said, none of us are free of guilt in this regard. I certainly am not. May I point out, however, as my colleagues well know, I have on several issues become a maverick to my generally conservative philosophy when my observations have shown me that that point of view would result in a vote out of step with the best interests of my constituents and of the country, and in contradiction of the facts. Essentially, I suppose that is what I am looking for today; a handful of colleagues who, for good and sound reasons, will become mavericks to the "liberal" strings which bind them to a false cause—or who at least will not take part in a movement whose cause has been proven erroneous.

Some elements of the press and most active proponents of a reduction in the depletion allowance have created the image that this is a "'liberal" cause and that it is a progressive, constructive, and equitable thing to do. Since big businesses and big taxpayers appear to be the ones who will be immediately hurt, the bill is viewed as a good way to undercut the conservatives.

DANGEROUS CONSEQUENCES IGNORED

The effort to reduce the depletion allowance has become a "sock it to the rich" movement and too few of the proponents seem willing—much less anxious—to consider the possibility that the long-range effects of their holy crusade might be to "sock it to all of us"—the middle class, the poor, the economy as a whole.

They seem to ignore the possibility that in their overzealous efforts to slay the dragon, they might be trampling to death the damsel in distress—that is, the American consumer.

A handful of examples have been cited which describe millionaires who, partly by reason of the depletion allowance, pay little or no Federal income tax. These are the dragons who must be slain.

On the other hand, little or no attention is accorded the long list of repugnant consequences which might result from a substantial limitation of the incentives which provided the oil and gas industry in the form of the depletion allowance.

Of course, no major economic decision, or its repercussions take place in a vacuum. Since there are bound to be effects of some sort in an economy which is geared to rules of supply and demand, we should ask ourselves a basic question: Of what benefits and of what elements of security will we be depriving ourselves—as consumers—by claiming for ourselves—as a government—those dollars which are now being given the oil industry in economic incentives via the depletion allowance?

At the risk of offending some of our more modern thinkers and avant garde economists, I contend that the basic rule still prevails which says that, "You don't get nothin' for nothin'." Let me put the fundamental question another way: What price and what consequences are we going to pay for trading away to the U.S. Treasury a crucial economic incentive of our most strategic industry in order to "kill a few dragons" and to increase our tax take by a small fraction of 1 percent per year?

The exchange cannot be made without consequences. It will either result in a specific benefit to the Nation or it will backfire and damage the Nation. We had, therefore, better look to the rules of cause and effect, of supply and demand, of action and reaction to make certain what benefits—or injuries—this major change in economic policy might bring.

In this case, it should be made clear that the proposed reduction in the depletion allowance from 27½ percent to 23, 20, 17, or some other figure, would represent a very large relative alteration in the economics of the industry in question.

Reduction of the tax incentive of any industry by as much as 20, 30, or even 45 percent, as one Senator proposes, is bound to have tremendous repercussions, not only within the industry but across the whole Nation—particularly in the case of an industry whose impact is so great on the overall economy.

How will such a change affect the consuming public? Do not the proponents of drastic change have the specific and positive burden of proof that the change will not harm the public? In this case how will it affect the average wage earner, the average farmer, the average commuter, the average traveler, who has to buy gasoline for his automobile two or three times a week?

The $400 to $500 million tax expected to be realized by the reduction from 27½ to 20 percent—or a lesser amount to be realized from a lesser reduction—may prove to be an outrageously expensive tax to collect if its impact, both domestically and internationally ends up costing the American consumer and the overall economy several times that amount in terms of unwanted and even disastrous economic consequences.

AMERICA'S DEPENDENCE ON PETROLEUM

It should be realized that we are dealing here with one of the most crucial of industries. The petroleum industry in one form or another is closer to the American public than any other.

Petroleum, natural gas and their by-products are today and will remain for many years our primary fuel because of their relative low-cost and their great convenience, as compared to other fuels. Petroleum and its by products now provide three-fourths of the energy consumed in this country.

This percentage has been increasing rather than decreasing. It was only 64 percent 15 years ago. Now it is 75 percent.

American industry relies very heavily on petroleum as a direct source of power.

Nine out of 10 American households are heated by oil or gas, or by electricity generated from oil or gas.

Commercial transportation is fueled almost totally by the petroleum industry.

A considerable amount of our electric power, about 30 percent is generated by oil or gas.

Almost all American workers go to work in vehicles which are powered directly or indirectly by oil—82 percent of them in private cars.

These statistics are cited in an effort to impress upon consumer-oriented Senators the fact that they should pay closer attention to the consumer impact of what they propose to do.

It is my contention that some of my liberal colleagues have blinded themselves to the woeful consequences which might, and possibly will, befall the American consumer as a result of disrupting the economic incentives by which the oil industry is able to supply on a reasonable basis vast amounts of a vital product at a reasonable price without undue reliance on foreign sources.

I ask my colleagues to notice that I have mentioned at least three essential elements of the valuable service for which we are paying as a nation when we provide the incentives contained in the depletion allowance. The industry must supply this admittedly vital, essential product in vast amounts, at low cost, mainly from domestic sources.

If any one of these three factors is disrupted or denied, the American consumer and the American economy will suffer greatly, either from lack of energy, from excessive and inflationary costs, from the unreliability of foreign sources in times of crisis, or from the effects of an unfavorable balance of payments.

What if, as a result of the drastically altered tax structure which some Senators propose, the farmer, the workingman, the white collar commuter, the countless numbers of industrial users, the maritime industry, and everyone else ends up paying 3 or 4 or 5 cents more per gallon for gasoline and for diesel fuel? Then they, the proponents, will have done a great disservice to the very people in whose best interests they are pretending to act.

BALANCE OF PAYMENTS

What if, as a result of prejudicial attitudes and of that powerful urge to vote in terms of labels and images rather than facts, the Senate fails to devote proper attention to the long-range question of balance of payments? If the domestic industry loses its incentive and thus its ability to keep domestic production at a high level and at a reasonable price, obviously we will have to turn to imports.

Greatly expanded imports will mean a further imbalance on our trade posture and, eventually, a further disruption in the value of the dollar. All of this bodes great danger to the American laboring man, the American businessman, the American consumer and to the whole competitive posture of our economy in years to come.

Even now we are importing a billion dollars worth of petroleum products a year and the trend, unfortunately, is toward higher levels—at the expense of a healthy balance-of-payments posture.

Again the proponents, in the name of justice and equity and tax reform, will have brought havoc upon the people and the economy in whose behalf they are—in good faith, I am sure—pretending to act.

BURDEN OF PROOF

It seems to me, therefore, that those few Senators who actively propose this change in the law bear toward the rest of us a most serious burden of proof that this change will not result in any such destructive effects on the consumer or the economy, or both.

If such a burden of proof does not properly rest on the shoulders of the proponents of a reduction of the percentage depletion allowance, they have not yet made a credible attempt to support it with convincing facts and figures.

Where are the economic studies from objective sources which offer reasonable assurance that the proposed change will not result in higher prices to the consumer for gasoline, for heating oil, for natural gas?

Where are the economic studies which assure the Senator who is not an expert on this subject that the economy and the dollar could stand the balance-of-payments impact of vastly increased imports which would be necessary if decreased domestic supplies threatened to drive consumer prices up?

Where are the statistical studies which tell that the status of domestic exploration, production and reserves are on a favorable trend vis-a-vis consumption estimates for the next decade or two?

Where are the engineering studies which indicate that we can pipe in natural gas from South America or from the Middle East when our own reserves shrink to the point where it is either unavailable to homeowners or is far more expensive to them than it is today?

Where are the financial studies which assure us that capital investment will not flee the petroleum industry in search of a better return, thereby depriving this vital industry of the $70 billion in capital investments it is expected to require during the next decade to keep pace with consumer demands?

Where are the evidences of an international climate that is predictable enough and stable enough to afford us a guaranteed source of supply from foreign reserves?

LACK OF PROOF

Mr. President, I suggest that no such evidence has been presented to the Senate. No such assurances can possibly be offered because all the answers to the pertinent questions seem to indicate the need for more, not less, encouragement to the industry to beef up its posture relative to the demands which will be made on it by the consumer and by the economy in the years to come.

If the oil industry as a whole were booming beyond control, and if oil and gas reserves were increasing in such a way as to require no encouragement and no incentives to continue a healthy growth, those who seek a reduction in the depletion allowance might have a valid point in suggesting a reduction in the depletion allowance.

DANGEROUS TRENDS OF THE 1960'S

However, statistics of the industry indicate otherwise. For instance, although the industry completed an all-time high of 58,000 wells in 1956, it completed about only half that many, 31,000, last year. Although this particular comparison tends to show the picture in a particularly gloomy light as far as new completions is concerned, I have made it in order to impress on my colleagues the seriousness of what can and most certainly will happen if we remove the proper incentives from those parts of the petroleum industry which explore for oil. If this startling trend is able to take place in spite of the incentives offered, what further backslide can we expect to occur when these incentives are removed?

More realistically, perhaps we should compare total well completions for the decade of the 1950's to total well completions of the 1960's. We see that it is 508,494 during the 1950's and only 407,-325 during the 1960's. This represents a decline of about 20 percent despite the fact that the search and discovery expenditures during this decade have been greater than during the decade of the fifties.

A highly significant factor within these total figures on well completions is the number of so-called rank wildcat wells drilled in an attempt to find new fields. This category does not include "field wildcat" wells which are drilled in the vicinity of known fields. These are dry holes in an area where oil has already been discovered.

During the decade of the fifties there were 71,324 such wells drilled, and during the decade of the sixties that figure slipped to 62,150.

Thus we find a decrease of about 15 percent in that particular kind of exploratory activity which is geared to discovering brandnew areas of production. The same general situation—slightly worse, in fact—is evident when we compare the combined number of rank and field wildcat wells completed during the 1950's—108,455—to those completed in the 1960's—91,925—the latter figure including a recent estimate for 1969. Here we find a decrease in completions of about 18 percent.

Mr. President, I wish Senators would listen to these facts. There are now three Senators in the Chamber—four Senators, including the Presiding Officer.

For the past 9 consecutive years, the domestic crude oil production has exceeded additions to the reserves; and last year natural gas production exceeded additions to the reserves for the first time in our history. In other words, prior to last year annual additions to our reserves were higher than the annual amounts we consumed, but now even gas fields are petering out; that is, the amount annually consumed is greater than the amount of reserves we find from year to year.

This is a frightening trend which must be reversed. Yet there are many among us who charge headlong in support of a tax measure which will tend to accentuate rather than to cure this trend.

CONSUMPTION ESTIMATES

In the light of these developments and as a result of an exhaustive study on the subject, the Department of the Interior has called for stepped-up explorations, increased completions, and expanded reserves to meet the projected consumption estimates of the next decade. The Department expects consumption to increase from the present 13.8 million barrels a day to 19 million barrels a day in 1980—a growth factor of almost 40 percent.

Although these estimates for 1980 call for at least 5 million additional barrels per day, it should be noted that last year existing wells in the United States had the capacity to produce about 3 million more barrels a day than was actually permitted to be produced.

In other words, if we let the wells go their full capacity we could barely meet our present domestic requirements.

In my opinion this is not a secure position in which to be. If our production capacity does no better than to stay 3 million barrels a day ahead of domestic consumption, we will soon not be able to meet our domestic needs from domestic production—even in a time of crisis. It is obvious that if the industry does not expand upon that capacity, we will have to rely on massive imports whether we like it or not.

In effect, the Department of the Interior says that the oil industry needs to discover about 70 billion barrels of new reserves by 1980 in order to maintain a satisfactory posture of reserves versus production. The magnitude of this assignment can be understood only if one stops to realize that since 1960 only about 35 billion barrels have been added to our reserves.

How then can the Congress vote to decrease the tax incentive of the industry by a factor of 20, 30, or 40 percent while the administrative branch is telling the same industry that it must find double the reserves in the next 10 years as it has been able to locate in the past 10?

THE QUESTION OF "EQUITY"

Finally, Mr. President, if the petroleum industry were obviously and indisputably not paying its fair share of taxes as compared to other American industry, there might be legitimate cause for concern—in the name of "equity," let us say. However, it seems that the petroleum industry does, indeed, pay its fair share.

There are, of course, several theories as to how the oil industry's tax burden should be compared to the tax burden of other industries. Proponents of reduction in the depletion allowance take the narrow and self-serving view that we should consider only Federal income taxes and only as a percent of net income.

They contend that other taxes paid by the industry just should not be counted. Exactly what such a narrow, restrictive notion has to do with the concept of equity, I do not know. There are several other broader means of drawing comparisons, which by their very nature are more "equitable."

Under proponents' computations it turns out that the oil industry pays 24 percent of net income in Federal income taxes, as compared to 40 percent for all U.S. industry and 42 percent for all manufacturing industry.

However, as a staff study of the Senate Finance Committee shows, the oil industry's burden jumps to 42.9 percent of net income if we include foreign, severance, property, and production taxes. It seems only "equitable" that these taxes to which the petroleum industry is particularly—and often uniquely—vulnerable should be considered in our comparisons. If we do weigh this total tax load as a percent of net income, the petroleum industry is paying taxes at a rate of at least equal to other American industry.

RETURN ON CAPITAL INVESTMENT: A GOOD GAGE

The same result is apparent if we consider the oil industry's earnings as a percent of net assets, that is, as a percent return on invested capital. Here we find that for the 2-year period 1967–68 the oil industry earned 12.8 percent, and all U.S. manufacturing paid, at the same level, 12.8 percent. Last year, earnings were 12.9 percent, just under the 13.1 percent earned by its capital investment by all U.S. industry. Under still another method, considering all taxes other than motor fuel and excise taxes, we find that in the latest year for which statistics are available, 1966, the oil industry paid an amount equal to 5.8 percent of its gross domestic revenues, compared to the average of only 4.8 percent for all manufacturing industries. In 1965 the figures were 4.8 percent for oil to 4.3 percent for all manufacturing. In 1964 it was 5.4 percent to 4.6 percent, again indicating a heavier tax burden upon the petroleum industry.

So, Mr. President, we find that under four of the five methods logically possible, the oil industry endures a tax burden equal to or heavier than the average for all U.S. manufacturers. The one method which does not show that result is the narrow overly restrictive and totally inequitable concept that we should consider only Federal income taxes only as a percent of net income.

Proponents of this reduction in the depletion allowance speak in terms of tax "equity," which implies a weighing of the broadest possible economic considerations as a means of coming up with a fair result. I certainly do not see this element in proponents' arbitrary plan to weigh only one type of taxation against only the net part of the oil industry's income.

NEED FOR MORE INCENTIVE, NOT LESS

Earlier, Mr. President, I pointed out that the petroleum industry will have to find at least twice as much oil during the next decade as it did in the last decade to maintain a satisfactory ratio of reserves to production. The trends in well drillings, well completions, additions to reserves all seem to indicate that the industry needs more, not less, economic incentives to accomplish this feat.

Mr. President, the overtones and the consequences of a reduction in the depletion allowance run very deep. I urge my colleagues to support my amendment, which would merely preserve the law as it has existed for many years and protect the consuming public and the economy from the damaging effects of denying the petroleum industry the incentives to do its job properly.

Mr. President, as I pointed out earlier, if the House action is followed—that is, if we change the figure from 27½ percent to 20 percent—the additional tax that would be paid by the oil industry would amount to $400 million to $500 million.

But one thing the proponents of such a change fail to say is that the oil industry is spending $4.3 billion in exploration and development of oil and gas. What would that mean to labor and to the machine maker? The oil workers are paid pretty high wages all over the country. The machines are also produced by workers who get high wages. The loss of income taxes from those who work in the petroleum industry and from those who work in supporting industries which produce the necessary equipment to explore for oil might well equal the $400 or $500 million that the Government would take in additional income taxes.

Let us not forget that our economy today is in bad shape. For the first time in our history we have been importing more than we export. We are going down the scale. If we have to embark on vastly expanded purchases of foreign oils in order to supply the demands of our economy, it will be a great blow to our posture regarding balance of payments.

Today we consume about 13.8 million barrels of oil a day. Of that amount 10.8 million barrels are produced in our country. The rest, about 3 million barrels, is imported.

As the Department of the Interior has estimated, we must find 5 million more barrels per day for the next decade. Where are we going to get it, except from abroad, unless the oil and gas industry is permitted not only to continue to explore but to expand its exploratory activities for these vital resources to our economy? If we looked at the problem from that standpoint, instead of trying to beat down a few people who might get by without paying a fair share of taxes, I think we would be able to debate the issue without so much emotionalism. As to the few in the oil industry who evade taxes, the bill as now drafted will take care of that situation.

As I pointed out in my main statement, the depletion allowance cannot exceed 50 percent of the net income. That is another way by which the producers must pay taxes. In other words, the producer cannot escape taxes altogether.

I am very hopeful that Senators will pay close attention to what I have said, in the hope that the present depletion allowance can be maintained.

Mr. President, I should like to reemphasize this point about production—and these production figures are for various areas throughout the country: In the decade of the 1950's, 71,324 rank wildcat wells were drilled, as against 62,150 for the present decade. The number dropped 15 percent. The number of rank and file wildcat wells completed during the decade of the 1950's was 108,455, as compared to 91,000 for the present decade, or a drop of 18 percent. Similarly, total completions slipped about 20 percent from 508,494 to 407,325.

Mr. President, how can we hope to meet our needs unless the incentive is there to stimulate the production of our own oil in our own country? I repeat, Mr. President, I am very hopeful that the Senate will sustain my amendment.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield for a question.

Mr. LONG. The Senator knows, does he not, that during the past 50 years, from 1919 up to the present day, the price of retail gasoline, excluding the excise taxes that Federal, State and local governments have levied on the product, in terms of constant dollars, has dropped so that it now is less than one-half of what it was 50 years ago. In other words, the price of the product, excluding the excise tax on gasoline sold at the pump, is actually pretty much the same as it was 50 years ago—very nearly the same—although the price of everything else has more than doubled.

Now the price of gasoline could not have been kept that way had there not been adequate incentives for someone to go out and find the gas and oil and develop it so that it would be available to all.

I should also like to direct the Senator's attention to the fact that there is a study available to me—I have it here—made by the Chase Manhattan Bank, of 28 oil companies with a combined gross income of $60,311,000,000 which shows that after they get through paying taxes to the Federal Government, to State and local governments, and to foreign governments, their total tax bill is $14,250,000,000.

Then when one sees how much the shareholders have left after they have paid their taxes, it is $1,870,000,000. So, on gross revenue, these companies are only making about 3 cents on the dollar for the benefit of their shareholders. They are paying out in taxes almost $10 for every dollar that the shareholders are permitted to keep. In the last analysis, a company has not made money just because it shows a figure on its profit and loss statement. The money has not been made until it declares a dividend to get something to the person who owns the company and who hopes to make some profit out of it as a result of the investment.

When one takes 10 times as much in taxes from an industry as it permits the industry to keep after taxes, he should be very grateful to that industry particularly when it has managed to keep the price of its product down when the price of everything else has more than doubled.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I congratulate my senior colleague on the very fine presentation he has made here today. In the committee, I voted for the same position the Senator advocates now.

It is unfortunate that some people seek to represent the oil industry as one which is not paying its fair share of taxes, because, as a practical matter, the oil and gas industry pays more taxes at the State and local level, by far, than the average manufacturing industry. If we take into account the production taxes and property taxes that this industry pays, and make the same allowance for other industries, it works out that the oil and gas industry, pays in production taxes, State, and local taxes, and Federal income taxes, all taken together, more than the average for all manufacturing industries. If you add the burden that the product must carry—that is, the excise tax on the product sold at the pump—then the total burden borne by this industry is even more substantial. Although some may wish to discount that factor I do not think that industries in other States would be willing to bear the same type of excise tax that this industry bears in Louisiana, where there is a tax of roughly 9 percent of value on production as well as a rather high excise tax on the product sold at the pump. No one in the electrical business or the heavy machine tool industry, or any other manufacturing industry, wants to carry that kind of a tax burden on his production, which amounts to about 50 percent of the value of the product.

So, if one considers the excise tax burden on the product in addition to the other taxes, he finds that gasoline carries a heavier tax burden—which the manufacturers must add to the cost of their product and pass on to the consumer if they are to make a profit—than that borne by any other products except tobacco and alcohol. With regard to both of those products, as the Senator knows, there is a health or a moral consideration which does not exist with regard to oil and gas products, which are something we must have in order to continue to exist as a nation. It is something we have to have in order to enjoy all the other blessings of this great country of ours.

So here is an essential commodity, one required for our national survival, one of our most important strategic commodities—in many respects the most important—something that is a necessity. The price increase of it over the last 50 years has been kept to one-half the average price increase on all other commodities in terms of constant dollars. In other words, it is selling today for half the price it was selling for 50 years ago, not counting the excise tax added to the product since that time, so that, on balance, as the Senator has so well pointed out, there is no real case for further increasing the tax on this product or this industry.

Mr. ELLENDER. What bothers me more than anything else, I must say to my colleague, is this estimate that was made by the Department of the Interior. We are now consuming about 14 million barrels of oil per day, and 3 million barrels of that come from abroad. The estimate for 1980 is 19 million barrels a day. There is a difference there of 5 million barrels. Where will that oil come from, unless we produce it here or buy it abroad? That is what I am bothered about. If we have to purchase 5 million additional barrels of oil per day in the future to take care of our requirements, just imagine the effect that will have on our balance of payments and the labor situation here in our own country.

As I have pointed out, if the House figures are accepted, the additional tax realized by the Government will be between $400 million and $500 million; and, as I have pointed out, the amount of money spent to develop more oil fields and conduct the necessary research for them, to the companies, is in excess of $4 billion a year. I contend that the income tax to be derived from that expenditure balances off the $400 million or $500 million that we can hope to gain by cutting back the allowance from 27.5 percent to 20 percent. I say it is just shortsightedness. We do not want to become dependent on foreign oil, if we can help it.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. DOLE. While I concur generally in what the Senator from Louisiana has said, I would point out that Kansas is also a great oil-producing State. I believe most of those in the oil industry realize that if we are going to have tax reform, it will be painful to those who are reformed. I believe most of those in the oil industry in my State would probably agree, though reluctantly, that some change in the depletion allowance will occur before this bill is finally enacted.

I would guess, if we look at the entire tax reform package realistically, there are other provisions in the Senate version and in the House version of the bill which are more damaging to the oil industry than raising or lowering the depletion allowance. I am certain that the Senator from Louisiana is aware of that.

There is one specific provision that adds an additional tax on intangible drilling costs, which is much more harmful to the oil industry, or at least I am so informed, than would be keeping the depletion allowance at 23 percent. In fact, if there were some assurance that we could keep the Senate bill at 23 percent on the depletion allowance, and strike out the 5-percent additional tax on special tax privileges, which includes the depletion allowance, I think most people in the oil industry, while they would not be satisfied, would accept what we did.

I hope we can also proceed to look at some of the other provisions in the bill where we might obtain some relief.

Mr. ELLENDER. Well, I expect to, and of course I have, but we are dealing now with the 27.5 percent depletion. As I have stated, I think it ought to be maintained, for the reasons I have stated.

Mr. DOLE. But I do not think it is a conservative or liberal issue. I think it depends on where you live in America.

Mr. ELLENDER. I agree that it is not a liberal or a conservative issue. I regret deeply that the press and some of the activist proponents of a reduction in the allowance have attempted to make it so. This has been done, I suppose, to make it initially impossible for a Senator who considers himself a "liberal" to support my amendment. I agree with the Senator from Kansas that it is a false issue. But, as I have stated, whether we are considering a State that does not produce oil or gas, or one that does, either the consumer of oil and gas will suffer by having to pay higher prices or the whole economy will suffer by having to depend on foreign imports. That is one thing that we must take into consideration.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Delaware yield me 20 minutes?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I yield 20 minutes to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I rise to speak in opposition to the Ellender amendment. This is one of the most complex tax bills the Congress has ever drafted. There is no question that much of it is not understood. It is not understood by many of the tax experts. It is not understood fully even by well-informed Members of Congress. It is not understood by economic experts, and it is certainly not widely understood by the millions of American citizens who comprise the general public.

But there is one section of this bill that the general taxpaying public does understand, and understand well.

If we should ask the first hundred people we met on the street in downtown Milwaukee or Wilmington, Del., or Sioux City, Iowa, or even in New Orleans, to name the most notorious loophole—the least justifiable loophole in our tax law, 85 to 90 would promptly say: the oil depletion allowance.

The 27½-percent oil depletion allowance—rightly or wrongly, fairly or unfairly, has become a symbol of privilege and inequity in our tax laws.

Even the magazine recognized as spokesman for big business, Fortune, has called it the most notorious loophole in our tax laws.

Now, of course, there is a difference of opinion on the equity or inequity of this provision and that is what this debate is all about.

But no one can gainsay that this single provision has become the heart of the controversy—the living, breathing symbol of the need for tax reform for a great majority of the American people.

The fact is, Mr. President, if this body should pass the Ellender amendment, if we should knock out the Finance Committee's reduction of the depletion allowance, this bill would be considered a mockery, and I mean just that—mockery—a hypocritical, meaningless mockery by most Americans.

I can hear it now in Union Halls, in Kiwanis meetings, at women's clubs, party rallies, anywhere a Senator meets his constituents—the cry—if we should pass this amendment:

"What do you mean a tax reform bill? Did you Senators not keep the oil depletion allowance right up there at 27½ percent?"

My point is not simply that the passage of this amendment would be an inequitable act. My point is whether you may think the amendment is right or wrong. The American people will not agree that we have passed a tax reform bill if we refuse to reduce the depletion allowance. They would believe that this bill is a phony, a fake, a pretense.

And Mr. President, why should they not believe exactly that? After all what is the taxpayers' revolt?

It was a reaction that began after Treasury Secretary Joe Barr—who had only about 20 days in office—appeared before our Joint Economic Committee last January and told us that there were Americans with immense incomes, incomes over a million dollars a year, who paid no income taxes.

Secretary Barr documented that charge. It shocked the American people. Our taxpayers are recognized as the most honest in the world, and they are hit with what is close to the stiffest income tax in the world.

They pay it because they know this is the price of a free country. They pay it because they believe everyone who earns a significant income must share in the support of this country. They pay it because they generally believe in the principle of ability-to-pay.

So it is not hard to understand that when they see others not paying, they are enraged.

Mr. President, consider that the Ellender amendment, by pushing the depletion allowance back up to 27.5 percent, would reduce the revenues provided in the bill by $175 million. That is $175 million less tax relief or $175 million less for education or for health.

Consider that the lowest tax bracket for individuals who earn a mere $600 a year in taxable income is 14 percent. Yet, the largest oil companies with earnings in the billions of dollars a year paid an average of 7.7 percent in 1968 to the Federal Government, about half the income tax rate of the man struggling at the poverty level.

Mr. President, that is a disgrace. We have heard all the rhetoric about how important the oil industry is to the United States and how vital it is to our national security. Yet, when the facts are examined we find that our present tax handouts to the oil industry are probably the most inefficient way to encourage this new exploration and development we are supposedly trying to encourage.

Mr. President, I will go into that a bit in a few minutes. However, I think it is a fundamental answer to the very strong argument made by the Senators from Louisiana that we need more production and need more oil.

We have had this fantastic tax bonanza which has been granted to the industry. It was supposed to encourage production. That was its excuse. Everyone recognizes this loophole as being notorious. It has been in effect since 1926.

But what have been the production results of this bonanza? Are we getting the kind of oil production we need? No. Why? Because this is not the way in which to do it. Every expert agrees that it is not the right way in which to secure more effective oil exploration.

It is costing us now $10 in tax reduction for every $1 of oil reserves that have been developed because of the depletion allowance.

First, our present tax structure gives greater incentives to explore abroad than here at home. If national security is really a justification, how can we justify that situation, particularly when we erect a barrier to the importation of all this cheap foreign oil we have encouraged our companies to develop. This is probably the most ironic anomalies created by the Federal Government at the behest of a special interest group. On the one hand, the ordinary taxpayer subsidizes the major oil companies by paying taxes that should be paid by the oil industry and, then, on the other hand, rather than let the consumer have the benefit of this cheap oil he has paid for we prevent this oil from reaching him by erecting an import barrier.

Let us examine the extent of these tax benefits enjoyed by the oil industry. After examining the tax structure of the oil industry, one of the Nation's leading economists, estimated that the oil industry enjoyed an absolute subsidy in the form of tax privileges. It would be cheaper he said for the Federal Government to allow the oil industry to completely expense all its costs than to continue the present tax subsidies. For example, the average well in the United States costs about $260,000. This generates the following tax deductions:

Currently expensed capital expenditures	$161,160
Depreciation deductions	32,840
Depletion deductions	83,000
Total	277,000

In other words, those who invest $260,000 in an oil well, get back $277,000 in tax benefits. That means even without making any money from selling the oil, the investor is going to make $17,000 on his investment in the well. Amazing? Yes. Unfair? Yes. Unjustified? Yes, emphatically.

Even assuming for the sake of argument that the oil industry does need special incentives to explore for oil and thus protect our national security, the present system is one of the most inefficient means that could be devised.

The figure I gave a minute ago that it cost $10 in tax benefits for every $1 of proven oil reserves developed is from CONSAD, a report commissioned by the Treasury.

The CONSAD report commissioned by the Treasury Department pointed out that our tax laws were costing the American taxpayer over $10 for every $1 of additional reserves of oil and gas, even at the inflated American price for oil. The CONSAD report which was presented to the Ways and Means Committee and the Finance Committee was the first unbiased economic analysis of our oil tax laws. Although it has been attacked by the oil companies, those who have a pocketbook interest in denying its findings, its conclusions still remain unchallenged.

Mr. President, how can we justify paying the oil companies $10 for every $1 of additional reserves they discover? We cannot. How can we justify using up our expensive domestic oil in the name of national security when there is so much cheap foreign oil available?

That is another argument that always puzzles me. The oil people always argue that we must not bring the oil from abroad, but that we have to use our oil. Now our oil is a limited finite resource. If we use it up, we deplete our supply. We use it up in perpetuity. How can we justify a system imposing an income tax of 14 percent on individuals earning a mere $600 when oil companies who earned over $8 billion in 1968 paid less than 8 percent of their income in Federal income taxes. We cannot. We cannot.

The oil depletion allowance is the most conspicuous example of tax favoritism. It is widely known and widely condemned as an unjustifiable tax loophole benefiting the very wealthy at the expense of the average taxpayer. A cut in the depletion rate for oil and gas to 20 percent is a very moderate proposal.

Mr. President, the Finance Committee's cut in the oil depletion allowance to 23 percent is not enough. It will only raise an additional $175 million a year in revenue. A cut to 20 percent, on the other hand, will raise over $400 million a year.

But even a cut to 20 percent in the oil depletion allowance is but a drop in the bucket. If just the largest oil companies with their gigantic profits paid the same percentage of their income in Federal income taxes as other manufacturing concerns, 43 percent, we would get about $3.5 billion in new revenue.

Mr. President, this puts into perspective the significance of the Ellender amendment that would deny even this slight reduction in the immense tax bonanza, this loophole, this giveaway enjoyed by oil.

Mr. President, let me answer the distinguished Senator from Louisiana who says that we do not have a competent study of how this would affect the capacity of oil companies to earn money.

Merrill Lynch, the biggest brokerage concern in the country, which certainly is not a liberal concern with an ax to grind, has made a careful study of the effect of reducing the oil depletion allowance from 27½ percent to 20 percent. They found that in the case of Sohio, which is one of the big companies, the reduction in profits would be approximately 2 percent. Esso and Texaco would take a reduction of 3 to 4 percent. Atlantic's earnings would fall by 8 percent. That is the firm that paid almost no income taxes for 5 years recently, although they were making over $100 million each year. Gulf's earnings would go down 4¼ percent, Mobil's 4¼ percent, Shell Oil's 7½ percent, and so forth.

Less than 1 year's growth of earnings at recent rates seems to be involved for each company. These companies have been increasing their earnings very sharply, record earnings, each year.

Furthermore, there is no reason to suspect that there is going to be any increase in prices to the consumer by rejecting this amendment and adopting the Williams amendment. That depends entirely on how we handle the oil import program. At present, this matter is being studied by the Rules Committee. We expect recommendations to come from that committee, and the tentative recommendation of that committee is that we modify the oil import program sharply, with the result that it will have a substantial beneficial effect in reducing the price of oil and gas to the consumer, regardless of how we act on the depletion allowance today.

Mr. President, it is interesting to consider the cutback in production which the Senator from Louisiana has charged will follow depletion allowance reduction. He has argued that if the Williams amendment is adopted, it will result in a prompt and serious reduction in production.

I should like to quote not a dispassionate economist but one of the Nation's top oil men, Mr. Emilio G. Collado, the executive vice president of Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, who has estimated that there will be no effect whatever in oil production by a 20-percent depletion allowance until 1974, and then the cutback will be very small. In fact, in my view, it will be close to insignificant.

Furthermore, there are many other methods, one of which I presented to the Committee on Finance, of providing a far more efficient way to encourage oil production than to rely on the oil depletion allowance, which is costing the general American taxpayers $10 for every $1 of oil reserves brought in.

With respect to the argument of the Senator from Louisiana that the industry is not booming, the fact is that the combined net profit of the 12 largest oil companies in 1968 was a fraction under $5 billion. Each of the 12 companies set new profit records in each of the last 4 years. Think of that Mr. President. Is this an industry that would be hurt by a slight reduction in their net income? Just 4 years ago, the profits of those 12 companies totaled $3.7 billion; so they have enjoyed an increase of $1.3 billion, or 33½ percent, in the last 4 years. I could go into more detail on that, but I think the argument is overwhelming that this is a booming industry and is enjoying enormous profits.

With respect to the argument of the distinguished Senator from Louisiana that we must not reduce the oil depletion allowance when we need reserves, I have indicated one finding by CONSAD, the Treasury Department commissioned study. Let me point out the argument given by the Treasury Department in its report to the Committee on Finance. It had this to say on the percentage depletion:

> Percentage depletion is a relatively inefficient method of encouraging exploration and the resultant discovery of new domestic reserves of liquid petroleum. This is in part due to the low sensitivity of desired reserve levels to the price subsidy represented by percentage depletion, and in part to the inefficiency of the allowance for this purpose, since over 40% of it paid for foreign production and non-operating interests in domestic production.

It should be remembered that the Treasury Department is the Nixon Treasury, appointed by President Nixon, who has indicated that he favors a high depletion allowance. Nobody can argue that they are biased at the top against the oil industry or against a tax depletion allowance for the oil industry.

I quote further:

The investigations reviewed during the course of the study were in substantial agreement that the current situation was one of economic inefficiency, and that any changes—

Meaning any reduction in the depletion allowance—were almost certain to be beneficial to the economy in the long run.

This is from the CONSAD report.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time, and I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAVEL in the chair). Who yields time?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. President, I hope that the Ellender amendment will be rejected.

For the past 12 months we have heard many wonderful speeches in the Senate about the interest of the Members of the Senate in tax reform, and I have been looking forward to the time when we would have a bill before the Senate dealing with this subject. I have expressed the hope many times that the enthusiasm for tax reform would carry over until such time as we call the roll. Today we are going to start voting, and we will soon know to what extent these speeches will develop into votes.

As the Senator from Wisconsin has pointed out, the question of reducing the depletion allowance is the number one question in the minds of the American people that will determine whether or not we are really going to have some tax reform.

It has been pointed out that the 27½-percent depletion allowance has been in effect for 40 years. It has been in effect for 40 years, but I point out that 40 years ago, when the 27½-percent depletion rate was first approved by Congress, the top rate for corporations and individuals was around 15 percent. Certainly there is a bigger difference in the 27½-percent depletion rate for oil or any mineral when you have a 14-percentage rate than there is when the rates run up as high as 50 percent on corporations and as high as 70 or 77 percent under today's rules for individuals. Certainly this is one inequity which needs to be dealt with.

The argument has been made about the billions that already have been paid in taxes by the oil industry. I call the attention of those who have made that argument to the fact that most of those so-called billions paid by the oil industry are not really paid by the oil industry. They represent collections by the oil industry as taxes on the gasoline that is sold to consumers in the various States. It is a Federal gas tax, and that tax is paid by the consumers of gas and oil, just the same as withholding taxes collected by the oil companies are actually paid by their employees.

I do not give any industry credit for taxes it collects from someone else. But when we consider the tax it pays on its own earned income, as the Senator from Wisconsin pointed out earlier, the average rate falls back to around 8 percent, which is about all they are paying under existing rates.

Certainly at a time when all Americans are being asked to shoulder their proportionate part of the cost of operating the Government it is not unreasonable to expect the oil industry to pay its proportionate part.

I respect the oil industry. It is one of the most respectable industries in the country, and it is also a prosperous one. But I do not think that under the existing tax structure the oil industry is paying its proportionate part of the cost of supporting the Government. Approximately one-half—40 percent, at least—of the cost of operating the Government today, which approaches around $190 billion, goes for the defense of the country. To the extent that any industry or any individual has investments, he owns a fixed percentage of the assets of the country, whether it be an investment in oil or wealth of any other kind. Government revenues goes to support not only the lives of 200 million people but also their property. Billions of dollars are appropriated and paid every year by the American taxpayers to support and protect the industries of the country, including the oil industry. The time is long past when the oil industry should pay its proportionate part of the cost of supporting and defending our Government, both at home and abroad.

The difference in approving the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. ELLENDER) and in approving the section of the bill as passed by the House is a little more than $400 million. Under present law the depreciation allowance is 27½ percent. The proposal of the Senator from Louisiana is to keep the present law. The House provision would roll back the percentage to 20 percent. The Committee on Finance changed the amount to 23 percent; however, an effort will be made later to hold the percentage to the 20 percent, as proposed in the House bill.

We are now dealing with the question of whether we shall accept the House provision of 20 percent or retain the 27½ percent in the existing law, a difference which amounts to $400 million.

If we expect to obtain any tax reform at all we shall have to start somewhere, and certainly this is the place to start. In my opinion, if we fail to reject the Ellender amendment and if we fail to reduce the percentage of oil depletion allowance we might just as well tell the American people, flatly, that there will be no tax reform so far as this Congress is concerned. What we do now will set the pattern as to what will happen to many other so-called reform provisions in the bill.

We cannot get away from the fact that when we speak of tax reform we are correcting inequities that some group has been enjoying, and this raises the tax for someone. When we refer to a reduction in the oil depletion allowance as a tax reform proposal it means that we are raising the taxes of the oil industry. That is true of every feature in the bill. When we speak of reforming the existing tax law by eliminating what some of us think are inequities in the tax laws it means that we are taking away benefits which this group or that group may have been enjoying but which we do not think they should have. If we are going to make the tax structure more equitable it means an increase for some and perhaps a reduction for others.

Mr. President, certainly this industry has been enjoying special benefits for a long time. As the former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Barr, said there are around 200 people with incomes of $200,000 a year who pay no income taxes. Many of those people would still escape taxes in the amendment which is now before us.

To reduce this depletion rate is a step in the right direction. It will not correct all of the situation, but it will be a major step toward correcting some of those inequities and imposing a tax on those persons who for many years have not been paying any taxes whatever. However, if the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. ELLENDER) is agreed to and we retain the existing law we shall not be closing that loophole nor shall we be placing any tax on many of those individuals with incomes of around $1 million a year. Certainly we cannot allow them to continue paying no tax.

I hope the Senate overwhelmingly rejects the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I wish to point out that the action by the House committee in reducing the rate to 20 percent has the support of the Treasury Department of the Nixon administration. In testimony before our committee the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Kennedy, said his Department supported the 20-percent provision in the House bill. I hope that, with their support, we can retain the House provision holding the rate to 20 percent and reject the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield 15 minutes to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. President, the oil and gas industry is today under the most severe political attack in its history. The double-barreled proposals would take away tax incentives and, at the same time, force the domestic industry to lower its price and profit levels to compete with cheaply produced foreign oil—much of it from unfriendly sources. I refer here to the import threat because the questions of national security and domestic self-sufficiency are both dependent on the ability of the domestic industry to maintain an exploration and development program adequate to maintain a reserve sufficient to fill those needs. A cut in percentage depletion or other oil and gas tax incentives will seriously affect the rate of exploration and development as will any substantial increase in imports.

The two issues go hand in hand as do the discovery and development of oil and gas and that is why I mention imports here in connection with the oil and gas depletion allowance.

It seems imperative to me that we have a full realization of the nature of this attack.

Very early in the development of our tax laws it was generally recognized, as it has been ever since, that oil and other minerals in the ground represent a wasting asset. These assets can only be discovered—they cannot be created or manufactured. Our entire economy and our national security depend upon having available to us large and balanced quantities of all of these basic minerals. Realizing that oil, once discovered, inevitably will be depleted, and that the oil taken out of the ground cannot be replaced, it became an early cornerstone of our tax laws to recognize this fact and to provide the depletion allowance.

In recognition of the capital asset used up in production of petroleum, Congress in 1926 replaced earlier methods of computing depletion by establishing a depletion deduction of 27½ percent of the gross sum received from sale of crude petroleum. In no case, however, can depletion exceed 50 percent of net income from the mineral property after all expenses.

In applying this depletion rate, Congress intended, among other things, that it approximate the diminution of the value of the capital assets used up each time a barrel of oil is removed from the ground. In reality, the 27½ percent rate today falls far short of permitting full recovery of the "capital value" of assets exhausted through production of oil.

Now we are told that this basic principle of tax law represents a "loophole" which should be eliminated. Elimination of this feature of our tax laws and of other well-established principles affecting mineral production and operation would not benefit the public since any additional tax revenues would almost certainly be offset by a rise in the cost of gasoline and other basic commodities. Thus, the so-called tax saving would simply be passed on to the consumer and be payable by those who are perhaps the least able to bear this additional tax burden; namely, the average working man, the farmer, and the rancher who must operate an automobile, a pickup, or a truck in connection with his business. The problem, however, is much more basic than a mere shifting of the tax burden. Making such a basic change in our tax laws would have, I submit, far-reaching and serious consequences to our Nation and to our economy as a whole.

The United States is already dependent on foreign oil for 21 percent of its requirements. Domestic producers spent $44 billion over the past 10 years in their efforts to find oil and gas reserves in the United States.

To maintain the Nation's current level of self-sufficiency, the domestic industry must spend twice that amount over the next 10 years.

But if punitive tax measures are adopted, these capital expenditures will not be made in the United States, and these reserves will not be found or this measure of self-sufficiency maintained. Among all of the other consequences of such an approach would be a crushing blow to our already desperate efforts to maintain our balance of payments and a favorable balance of trade. Foreign operations of American oil companies now account for a favorable U.S. balance of $2 billion a year, and this is certainly something we cannot afford to lose, in view of our declining world trade position.

In the face of all of these considerations, it seems almost incredible that the Congress of the United States would seriously be considering taking action which could quite conceivably seriously cripple America's most successful and important basic national industry.

With percentage depletion, the industry has traditionally generated the great bulk of its own capital funds—somewhere around 90 percent. In the past few years, however, the squeeze on earnings and other cash flow in relation to rising capital requirements has forced oil companies to go to other capital markets for an increasing proportion of their funds—last year they went outside for 26 percent of such funds. The question is how long will the oil industry be able to continue this borrowing.

It is true that there has been a recent discovery on the North Slope of Alaska which will do much to shore up potential reserves of the United States, but already some $7.5 billion has been spent to find these existing oil reserves. This does not take into account the recent State lease sale in Alaska just for the right to explore. Oil companies paid more than $900 million for that privilege.

The significant thing about the North Slope discovery, as the Presiding Officer (Mr. GRAVEL) knows, is that in all likelihood the North Slope would never have been explored without the assistance of tax incentives prevalent to the U.S. tax structure. It is going to take billions of dollars to develop the North Slope and to move the oil to markets and most of that money has to come from oil company earnings. It is also important to note that every 10 billion barrels of oil that may be discovered on the North Slope or anywhere else represents only about 2 years demand in the United States. This means we have to find a lot more oil in the North Slope and in a good many other places if we are to avoid the dangerous degree of dependence on other countries for our prime source of energy.

By 1980 the United States will need some 270 billion gallons of oil per year. This is 70 billion gallons more than present requirements of the United States. It is also significant to note that the United States will require some 50 percent more in natural gas reserves.

Since 1956 gas consumption has more than doubled while drilling by producers has declined sharply. Wildcat drilling, geophysical activity, and total wells drilled have dropped 40, 56, and 43 percent respectively.

The Department of Defense has stated:

> U.S. domestic petroleum capability must be available to meet military need in case of the denial of normal foreign sources.

The Interior Department and the Federal Power Commission have warned that discovery and development activities have been inadequate to meet natural gas demands in the immediate future and oil requirement in the near future. These agencies recognize the need to encourage domestic exploration and development of both oil and gas in the interests of national security and the consuming public.

The Department of Defense was, also, emphatic in a statement to the Cabinet Task Force on Oil Imports as to future dependence on foreign oil:

> U.S. domestic petroleum capacity must be available to meet military needs in case normal foreign sources are denied. These denials can take many forms. For example, a denial of a supply source in a normally friendly country, which may not at the time be in sympathy with our cause, can be just as final as the destruction of that source by enemy action.

Our national security is directly related to the United States having unquestioned access to oil sufficient to satisfy its needs. In Southeast Asia today, according to the Department of Defense, about 50 percent of military tonnage consists of petroleum products—we must maintain a capability in the United States to supply our war needs in case foreign sources are denied. The DOD report notes that our interests will best be served by expanding oil development by areas in the following order of priority: First, the continental United States; second, the Western Hemisphere; and, third, other free world areas. Elimination of foreign percentage depletion will bring only temporary Treasury benefits, completely disappearing within 2 or 3 years, will discourage U.S. ownership and development of foreign fields and hurt U.S. balance of payments.

Those who attack depletion allowance also allege that import controls result in higher prices to consumers and argue that the consumer price of petroleum products, primarily motor fuels and home heating oils, could be sharply reduced by eliminating the quota system.

The wide variation in these hypothetical estimates attests to the fact that they are highly speculative but one point none of the advocates of more imports have mentioned is the effect of the Nation's gas supply.

Oil and gas development are inseparately related and a large part of all gas production comes from wells that were drilled primarily in a search for oil. These wells produce both oil and gas.

Therefore, any reduction in tax incentives that undoubtedly will lower the rate of exploration for oil will have the same effect on gas supplies. And while we could import all of our requirements for oil—at the pleasure of the producing countries and the expense of the domestic oil industry—we have not yet arrived at that point in technology to bring in the needed supplies of natural gas.

A Federal Power Commissioner said recently that the Government would soon have to provide added inducements—probably in the form of price increases—for company research for new natural gas supplies.

Rates on natural gas are set by the FPC, and for the past decade, the commission has deliberately reduced prices.

But the problem, as outlined here, is that the Nation is no longer locating enough new reserves to replace its new annual consumption. Last year, for the first time, the Nation's known reserves actually declined by 2 percent, according to a study by the American Gas Association.

FPC Commissioner Lawrence J. O'Connor, Jr. thinks the industry has a supply problem and a serious one. He emphasizes that most customers are not likely to feel the effects of the current reserve decline in the near future. The problem, O'Connor asserts, is to insure the longrun supply of natural gas.

Recently, FPC published a study that concluded that "the supply of natural gas is diminishing to critical levels in relation to demands." By 1973, the report predicted, the ratio of known reserves to annual production will have declined to 10.2 from the current level of 14.6.

At the same time, the report emphasized that ample supplies of gas exist—though the exact locations are unknown—to meet future demand.

Although he avoided directly advocating a price increase, O'Connor spoke of developing a better economic climate for drillers and seemed to rule out any prospect of rate reductions.

Dr. Richard J. Gonzolas, a noted Houston petroleum economist says that proponents of increased crude oil imports are completely overlooking the role of natural gas in the Nation's energy markets and that we cannot continue to supply cheap natural gas unless the customer is willing to take domestic crude oil as well, because the domestic petroleum industry supplies both crude oil and natural gas.

The equivalent energy cost of gas at its current average price of 20 cents per thousand cubic feet is $1.20 a barrel. Combine this with the average of $3 a barrel for domestic crude oil, and we get an average realization by producers supplying domestic petroleum energy of $2.10 a barrel; $3+$1.20÷2. This price is about as cheap as foreign oil can be delivered in the United States. Dr. Gonzolas also says that if domestic crude oil production is cut in half by greater dependence on imported oil, or cut in half by decreased tax incentives, we must correspondingly cut in half natural gas production, because the two are associated in wells. If mass production is cut, this Nation would have to seek alternative methods of acquiring gas such as synthesis from coal or importing it in liquid form. This would cost between 50 and 60 cents a thousand cubic feet compared to current average price of 20 cents a thousand cubic feet. This rise in price of 250 to 300 percent would mean increased prices to all consumers of gas in the Nation. In this case, we are talking about almost every American citizen.

John N. Nassikas, Chairman of the Federal Power Commission, stated before the Senate Interior Committee investigating natural gas supplies in the United States:

> The FPC has pointed out to the President's Task Force on Oil Imports that you really can't separate gas and oil. It is a definite inter-relationship which affects not only discoveries but basically the type of capital commitment, total capital commitment, and incentive for an industry.

In recent testimony before Senator Moss' Subcommittee on Minerals, Materials, and Fuels, Assistant Secretary of Interior for Mineral Resources, Hollis Dole, said that a shortage of natural gas already exists.

According to Dole, the supply-demand situation indicates that there will be "general deficiencies of gas for certain new service around 1972."

Dole said those shortages will affect prospective new customers for industrial-type lower cost service presently and in the future.

Dole warned that the longer term gas outlook is that "serious deficiencies of natural gas supplies will develop after 1975 if current demand trends persist and immediate corrective action is not taken."

He pointed out that concern about air pollution could increase requirements for gas as a substitute fuel. This, and other gas uses, he said, will force up demand through 1975 by about one trillion feet a year.

Dole said:

> The issue, is not that gas supply will falter and then begin a decline within the next decade; it is simply that it cannot grow fast enough under present conditions to satisfy the demands of new customers who will have to turn elsewhere to satisfy their needs.

He warned that the costs associated with new gas exploration will be "substantially higher than those that have led to the current price structure."

DOLE told the subcommittee, however, that there are large additional reserves of gas that can be discovered and developed, given an economic price, and added that a reduction in the depletion allowance would have the immediate result of a substantial reduction in exploration. Any increase in the cost of doing business is going to very definitely have a reflection on the amount of exploratory work, on the amount of money that would be available. There is no question in his mind that the amount of depletion allowance which is set by Congress very definitely has an effect on the development and the exploration for the finding of new deposits of gas.

Gas is ranked as the second largest source of our primary energy needs and now accounts for one-third of total U.S. energy needs. Crude petroleum products are the largest source of our primary energy needs. Together they account for 75 percent of our energy consumption in the United States. It should be obvious from these figures that a dependable domestic source to meet these energy needs is vital to our national security.

Federal Power Commission Chairman John N. Nassikas said that if the depletion allowance is lowered there would automatically be created an increased cost to both independent producers and integrated oil companies in exploring for gas. To the extent of that increased cost there is less operating margin available for further exploration in development unless the price happens to be increased.

Nassikas said:

> It must be emphasized that the Commission's jurisdiction in this area is over rates; the Commission does not have jurisdiction over production. It cannot order producers to sell or look for gas.
> Historically, independent producers have been the most aggressive entrepreneurial force in the finding of new gas fields. In 1966, for example, this group found approximately 80 per cent of the new oil and gas fields discovered in the interior oil and gas basins of the United States from the Gulf Coast to the Canadian Border.

But it is a fact that the independent operator as we have known him, and who has been responsible for finding so much oil in the past ,is fast becoming an anchronism because he cannot survive under the harsh economic facts of life of present-day conditions.

It is a fact that almost every country in the world provides direct or indirect incentives, either through its tax laws or otherwise, to encourage and to stimulate the discovery and development of its own natural resources. Almost universally, even in Communist countries, it is considered a matter of overriding national policy to encourage in every way possible the development of oil and other minerals. West Germany is currently making direct cash contributions out of the national treasury to private petroleum companies to stimulate the development of foreign reserves by such companies.

As we pass judgment here today on a matter of such far-reaching consequences, I believe we should consider another very probable effect of any cutback in the depletion rate and that is the tendency toward merger and consolidation in an industry that is still highly competitive.

One of the main reasons the industry is under attack is that, as one of its chief executives puts it, the oil business is probably the world's largest unknown industry. The industry has done too little to tell its story, he said, and has taken public support for granted.

The public has been exposed for years, especially in this part of the country, to a determined and persistent drumbeat by certain columnists, commentators, cartoonists, and news editors. This chorus of criticism has smeared the petroleum industry as a privileged segment of the economy enjoying a bonanza of tax benefits not enjoyed by other business or industry. Its leaders have been caricatured as the greedy oil and gas moguls and possibly a few of them may have been greedy. But by and large, the petroleum industry, a basically American industry, has done a remarkable job in providing the goods and services required by the people of this country and the world. In fact, the great abundance of oil in other parts of the world—the great flood of foreign oil that is now available—has been almost totally discovered and developed by American enterprise, know-how, and capital.

In recent antitrust hearings before a subcommittee of this body, advocates of doing away with oil import controls pointed to the huge savings that consumers would enjoy from cheaper imported oil. As the name of the committee implies, antitrust and monopoly go hand in hand. I fail to see, because of the nature of the oil industry, how the twin threats of reduced tax incentives and/or additional oil imports can do anything but lessen competition in the industry and force on it further consolidations into a handful of huge utility-type corporations.

The highly technological nature of the oil business makes it one of the most capital intensive industries in the world. One major company, which is probably a typical example, has total assets per employee of $88,000.

Another difficulty—from the viewpoint of public understanding—is that the industry's earnings reach record highs year after year. But the industry plows about half of its earnings back into the business each year in order to meet the rising demand—and also to develop new technology to produce better products at relatively lower prices.

As an example, the net earnings of a typical major oil company average about a cent and a half for each gallon of petroleum products sold. That figure is based on all of the various functions an oil company performs—finding and producing the oil, transporting and storing it, turning it into useful products, and bringing it to the marketplace.

What about the special tax advantages oil is supposed to have? The distortion that has been so widely implanted in the public mind ignores two key elements in the overall tax picture.

First, many oil companies earn a large share of their profits abroad and, quite properly, pay very large income and other taxes to the governments of the countries in which those profits are earned.

This is not unique in oil but also applies to all U.S. international business. To avoid double taxation of income from foreign sources, the U.S. tax law permits foreign income taxes to be taken as a credit against U.S. Federal income taxes, thereby obviously but fairly reducing U.S. taxes.

Second, the distortion ignores the very large State and local taxes that oil companies pay. As an example, in my own State of Wyoming, the fifth largest oil producing State, the 1968 assessed value of oil and gas production was 29.4 percent of the total valuation in the State, and the industry paid 26.5 percent of the total State property taxes and almost a third of the county taxes—in some counties the industry paid as much as one-half of all taxes.

But this is not all. The industry this year will pay a 1 percent severance tax to the State on the value of oil and gas produced that will add another $4 million plus to State revenues—and to the oil companies' cost of doing business.

In addition, Federal royalties, returned to the State from oil production on public lands in Wyoming for 1968, amounted to almost $16 million. This was out of royalties paid to the Federal Government of some $309 million.

Rentals and royalties from oil and gas operations on State and Federal lands account for more than half of the Wyoming common school land income fund and almost all of the funds for the permanent land fund. Both are dedicated to the support of public schools, construction and maintenance of roads, and other public service institutions.

Aside from the obviously adverse impact such tax changes would certainly have on Wyoming, I am convinced that the effects would be serious in numerous other States in which the industry is a major tax contributor and employer. In a State of only 300,000 population, employment of 7,500 is an important factor.

Here we have a unique industry, one that is peculiarly and essentially American and one which has not only powered the technological revolution in America but has been a vital part of it. It is one that has fulfilled its responsibility to the American consumer in furnishing abundant supplies of gasoline, home heating oil and natural gas, and the other petroleum products he wants.

The industry has powered the U.S. defense and military effort and stands ready for any emergency, as it has proved time and again, even to fulfilling the needs of Europe when Middle East oil was denied them.

So it seems to me that we should today be offering some credit to one of the most vital segments of our industrial economy rather than lessening in any way its ability and willingness to continue to serve the American consumer at reasonable prices.

Any reduction in present Federal tax incentives to the oil and gas industry could only add to the critical long-range outlook of the Nation for its vitally essential energy sources.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield 15 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana has only 14 minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I had agreed to yield 30 minutes of my time to the Senator from Louisiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I support the Ellender amendment with reservations. The majority of those engaged in the oil industry recognize that meaningful tax reform will and perhaps should result in some reduction of the present depletion allowance.

In addition, there are other features of the tax reform bill which would have graver consequences on the industry. If the intangible drilling cost deduction could be eliminated from the 5-percent minimum tax, most segments of the industry would readily accept the committee's judgment in fixing the depletion rate at 23 percent.

As we consider the pending tax bill, H.R. 13270, as adopted by the House and amended by the Senate Finance Committee, I am hopeful that this body will weigh the many provisions contained therein in light of all the facts and implications which are inherent in any major change in the tax laws which are now on the books. There is more than adequate evidence calling for a real and effective overhaul of the Nation's tax laws as they affect all segments of our economy and society as a whole.

Mr. President, in carrying out this particular review of our tax policies and detailed provisions, I am hopeful and confident that this body, in contrast to the other House in which I served 8 years, will weigh each and every major tax policy before making any drastic change therein.

In this regard, I wish to call to the attention of my colleagues some of the major changes in the pending bill which would adversely affect a vital and indispensable industry to this Nation's economic welfare and national security.

As each Member of the Senate knows, the bill as passed by the House reduced the percentage depletion rate for oil and gas production from 27½ percent to 20 percent. The Senate Finance Committee, by a tie vote of 8 to 8, failed in its effort to amend the House bill to restore the rate to 27½ percent. The Finance Committee, of course, did vote to set the rate for oil and gas production at 23 percent.

Mr. President, my main purpose in calling this action to the attention of my colleagues is an attempt to show each of them the need to look before we leap. I wish to urge each Member to thoroughly consider whatever action this body takes on the basic issue of how this Nation changes existing tax policies affecting the mineral producing industries—particularly the proposed changes with respect to the domestic oil and gas producing industries.

I could spend much of the Senate's time in outlining the need to continue as well as to improve the existing tax provisions that apply to oil and gas producers. However, I feel most of my colleagues have some basic knowledge concerning them.

However, Mr. President, I would like to briefly point out for the record, and for my colleagues in the Senate who are new to this body, as am I, some basics with respect to the origin, need for, and merits of the concept and rate of 27½-percent depletion for oil and gas production.

In 1926, Congress authorized a percentage depletion rate of 27½ percent of gross income—limited to 50 percent of net income—for the petroleum producing industry. This percentage depletion rate has remained unchanged during the past 43 years, although Congress has reviewed and examined this important tax provision many times during this period.

Each time percentage depletion has been considered by the Senate, it has been reaffirmed by a strong majority. In 1958, the vote was 58 to 31 and 63 to 26; in 1959, 54 to 21; 1960, 56 to 30; 1962, 50 to 23 and 57 to 30; 1964, 57 to 35 and 61 to 33.

History has provided us with an abundance of evidence of the practical results of this tax provision as follows:

First, an ample supply of petroleum in peace and war, at reasonable consumer prices.

Second, a broad base for Federal, State, and local taxation.

Third, an industry which has paid its fair share of taxes, Federal, State, and local.

Fourth, an industry which has not made an unreasonable or inordinate profit.

Percentage depletion for petroleum was adopted as a means of encouraging the search for and development of needed petroleum reserves. It was also designed to serve as a practical method of avoiding the taxation of capital as income.

Due in large part to this tax provision, this Nation has had available ample supplies for our military and peacetime requirements. As a result, we have enjoyed the highest standard of living of any Nation in the world.

The United States is the only major free world power which has within its own borders an adequate national security base in petroleum. Percentage depletion has played a large and important role in making this possible.

Today, with the ever-increasing demand for petroleum to meet our current and future needs, and the ever-increasing expenditures required to replace depleted reserves, it would be shortsighted and folly to adversely change this tax provision which has served our Nation and consuming public so well.

A study of the results of the operation of percentage depletion for petroleum during the past 43 years shows, first, that the chief benefactor of percentage depletion is the consumer of petroleum products; second, that the profits of this important industry are low relative to other industries; and third, that the industry provides a broad base for governmental taxation and pays its fair share of taxes.

Mr. President, I have covered this important matter in very general terms, except to say that thus far the existing mineral tax provisions, which have been in the law for 43 years, have well served the purpose for which each was enacted into law.

However, I must point out that even with these tax policies—which were designed, among other goals to offer an incentive to men to take part in the highly risky business of searching for new oil and gas reserves—this Nation is fast becoming a have-not Nation with respect to petroleum reserves.

To bear out my point, Mr. President, I wish to refer to portions of the recent testimony, before a subcommittee of the Senate Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, of Mr. Robert E. Mead, president of the Independent Petroleum Association of America, in which he declared in part:

> The foreseeable future of the petroleum industry—that is, whether or not it will be able to supply the requirements for both oil and natural gas needed to satisfy our expanding economy—will depend in our opinion on the governmental policies pertaining to the industry.

In the main governmental policies as to oil and gas have been wisely conceived and proven by long experience to be effective in serving the national interest. Federal tax provisions—in effect for more than 40 years—the Federal public land laws—for more than 50 years—State conservation programs—for more than 30 years—and the mandatory oil import program—for more than 10 years—all have a common objective: To maintain an economic climate that will encourage expanding development of domestic petroleum resources. The record of the industry shows that this objective has been attained to date. Increasing domestic supplies have been available to satisfy all consumer needs, with vital reserve capacities for use in times of emergency.

Yet, today, for the first time in our history, we face an uncertain future. But in our view, there is no need for this Nation to become short in petroleum supplies or to become dependent upon increased imports of oil or liquefied natural gas—LNG. U.S. consumers will suffer shortages in supply or become dependent upon insecure foreign sources only if ordained by unwise governmental policies.

The root cause of the threatened shortages in natural gas facing us today is the fact that for more than 10 years there has been insufficient exploratory effort by the petroleum industry.

In considering this matter, it should be kept in mind that the production of oil and the production of natural gas are performed by one industry—namely, the petroleum industry. The complaints which produce large quantities of oil also produce large quantities of natural gas. Those which explore for oil also explore for natural gas. The availability of funds to the industry will affect the level of exploratory activity for both oil and natural gas. Any basic economic factors or governmental tax policies or policy changes, or trends which affect one, also affect the other. The exploration of oil and the exploration for natural gas, therefore, in the main, are inseparable.

An examination of the essential activities in the search for new reserves of petroleum show that since 1956 the activities have markedly declined. During this period, the demand for oil has increased 52 percent; and the demand for natural gas has increased 94 percent.

Facts show that: First, oil and gas geophysical activity is down 56 percent; second, oil and gas leasing are down 22 percent; and third, wildcat drilling is down 40 percent.

The effect of these declines would have been greater, but fortunately they have been offset, but only in part, by advances in scientific and technological methods and increased expenditures in such new provinces as the Continental Shelf.

The sharp decline in the search for new petroleum reserves has been accompanied by a shrinkage in the overall activity of the oil and gas producing industry. First, the total number of active rotary drilling rigs has been more than cut in half. This, however, tells only part of the story. More important than the statistics, equipment has been cannibalized and highly trained employees have left the industry for better opportunities. Today, there is a very critical manpower shortage in the drilling segment of the industry. The decrease in active rigs has been accompanied by fewer total wells drilled, which declined by 40 percent since 1956. It should be recognized that part of these decreases can be attributed to wider well spacing and increased efficiencies in all phases of drilling and production operations.

A third measure of the overall decline is that of employment. For the producing industry as a whole, total employment has suffered a decrease of more than 60,000 workers, or almost 20 percent, since 1956.

Let me conclude as I started, by indicating my support of the Ellender amendment primarily to gain some leverage in the House-Senate conference. As stated there are other provisions in the bill which will adversely affect the oil industry unless appropriate changes are made. I shall offer an amendment at the appropriate time, either for myself or in cooperation with other Senators, to eliminate the 5-percent minimum tax on intangible drilling cost deductions.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield 15 minutes to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, prior to the final vote on the pending amendment, I want to make a few comments in order to clarify my position on the matter. I recognize the fact that the magic phrase "oil depletion allowance" has been the lightning rod of controversy here in the Congress for many years. It has provided the impetus for hours of debate in congressional committees and on the floor of both the House and the Senate, fed the typewriters of columnists anxious to exploit the inequities of the ever constant specter of tax loopholes, and created tax "experts" of the authors of books and articles appearing in periodicals.

The pending Ellender amendment to retain the present depletion allowance for oil and gas at 27.5 percent places the responsibility squarely upon us to recognize the consequences of reducing this depletion allowance as it pertains to both the oil industry and the Nation's consumer interests.

Mr. President, previous to today our discussions on the wisdom of retaining the present depletion rate for oil and gas have been confined to the ramifications of the specific question involved. Today, however, we all understand that the country and the Congress are caught up in the compelling need for tax reform. It is difficult, under these circumstances, to confine our discussion to this specific issue while the momentum for tax justice is running at high tide.

But I ask my colleagues to pause and reflect for a moment on the overall question now presented.

We all recognize that the oil depletion allowance is only one part of the broad issue of tax incentives for the nation's natural resource industry characterized in the Internal Revenue Code as mineral depletions. The mineral depletion provisions of the Code cover over 100 different minerals found and produced in this country. The reason for these provisions in the Code is a recognition of the fact that these minerals are not inexhaustible and that each and every one of them contributes in various ways to the energy requirements and general economic development of this country.

We cannot overlook the fact that this country is particularly vulnerable to the existence of a healthy and predictable energy resource industry. Without these resources we cannot continue to provide the kinds of goods and services necessary to sustain our historically unmatched national domestic growth nor can we continue to be sure that we will be master of our own helm in times of international crises.

Mr. President, I need not point out that our present proven reserves of energy resources cannot guarantee fulfillment of our energy demands forever. Back in 1962 the National Fuels and Energy Study Group prepared an excellent report for our Senate Interior and Insular Affairs Committee. This report contained the following statement on page 23:

> The economy of the United States rests upon a small base of energy. National income originating in the energy industries is only about 4% of the total national income.

These figures may be slightly changed today. But the essential fact remains constant: the American people are getting a tremendous bargain from the energy resources of this country.

For a moment, let me briefly review the ways in which the present 27.5-percent depletion allowance has contributed to the need for assuring that our energy resources stay ahead of our energy demands.

First, the present rate of depletion allowance has successfully enabled petroleum producers to meet the rapidly rising demands in times of peace and times of national crisis. I think the present rate of depletion allowance for oil and gas has significantly contributed to the present ratio between proved oil reserves to production.

However, I must point out, that our proved petroleum resources have dropped from a 12-year supply in 1960 to a 10-year supply in 1968. Our oil reserve position has been likened to a checking account. Reserves proved up during the year are the deposits; production, the withdrawals. The difference between the two reflects the changing condition of the bank account or reserve position. For many years prior to 1965 our bank account of reserves grew at a rate in excess of production, which was growing at a rate of about 3.5 percent each year. In 1965, however, we took out more than we added. Since then, our deposits have only been about equal to our withdrawals.

I hasten to point out that the North Slope discovery is not yet sustained by any geological and engineering data to be placed within the proved reserve category. Even if the North Slope reserves should be on the order of 10 billion barrels, this just barely makes up for the deficit at which reserves failed to grow these past 10 years.

Mr. President, I think it is also incumbent upon us to look to the future as well as to the past before arriving at a decision with regard to the merits of the pending Ellender amendment. At the turn of the century petroleum—crude and natural gas—represented only about 6 percent of the total U.S. energy market. Today it represents 75 percent of this market, and the Department of the Interior has estimated that by 1980 there will be a 50-percent increase in our total energy requirements.

Because our economy is based on energy producing resources—with oil and gas supplying three-fourths of that energy—percentage depletion is essential if the industry is to meet the anticipated tremendous future demand for petroleum.

Mr. President, a great deal of discussion has already ensued about the nature of that industry which is going to be called upon to provide more and more of the essential energy resources of this country. A favorite target of columnists and cartoonists, the oil industry is projected upon the national scene as a "fat cat" group of entrepreneurs who are benefiting from an inequitable tax loophole embodied in the phrase "oil depletion allowance."

Authoritative studies, however, demonstrate the fact that the petroleum industry pays its fair share of domestic taxes—exactly the same percentage of its revenue as other industries. In fact, if one uses profit in its generally accepted sense of being net income after all deductions for taxes and the cost of doing business, one can well see that the rate of return on net assets for the petroleum industry is only within the medium range of profits during the 1959 to 1968 decade. According to figures compiled by the First National City Bank of New York, the petroleum producing and refining companies earned 11.5 percent on net assets, which is slightly less than the 12.1 percent average rate on return on net assets earned by all other manufacturing industries during this decade. The 1968 figures, the most recent available, indicate that the petroleum producing and refining companies earned 12.9 percent while all other manufacturing industries earned 13.1 percent on net assets.

Mr. President, these figures dramatize the essential fact that the present 27.5 percent depletion rate has not produced fabulous profits for the petroleum industry. I hope these figures also lay to rest the chronic suspicion which afflicts some people that the present rate is a bonanza for this industry as a whole.

I think it is also important to point out that the price of gasoline, excluding State and Federal taxes, has only increased 2 percent during the decade 1957 to 1967. The price of gasoline to the motorist, exclusive of these taxes, has only increased from 22.11 cents per gallon to 22.55 cents during this time frame. During this same period, State and Federal taxes have increased by 20 percent. Even with these tax increases, during the same 10-year period the price of gasoline to the average motorist has only increased 7.1 percent while retail prices in general have increased 18.5 percent.

I use these figures, Mr. President, to demonstrate what I believe will be the true repercussions of inequitably reducing the oil depletion allowance. In light of the history of the matter of providing low-cost consumer fuel, and in light of the future requirements for finding new reserves, I believe that the impact of a change will be to increase the cost of gasoline to the consumer and decrease the amount which investors in oil companies are willing to provide for new reserve discovery.

In light of this, it may well be that those who argue most ardently for depletion of the present rate in accordance, for example, with that recommended by the Senate Finance Committee, will be most disappointed in the results. It seems to me, Mr. President, that we must weigh very carefully the consequences of this action. At the present time the oil industry realizes, according to Treasury Department estimates, about $1.4 billion from its Federal income tax bill through the operation of the 27.5-percent depletion provision. We must recognize the fact that the greatest proportion of this amount, plus another $4 billion each year, is reinvested by the oil and gas companies in search for and in development of new reserves. The development of new reserves is, of course, exploration.

In conclusion, Mr. President, we cannot consider this reduction of the present oil depletion allowance in a vacuum. Every one of us knows that the Senate Finance Committee recommended other changes in the basic impact of the Federal tax law upon the oil industry. One of the most important of these is the so-called 5-percent minimum tax which is added on in addition to the regular individual income tax or regular corporation income tax. Under the committee provision, explained on page 113 of the Senate Finance Committee report, individuals and corporations are to total their tax preference income, subtract an exemption of $30,000, and apply a 5-percent rate to find the minimum tax. Included in this, of course, is the mineral depletion allowance including the present percentage for oil and gas depletion. Standing alone, therefore, the present rate would be effectively reduced if the 5-percent minimum add-on tax as contained in the Senate bill is enacted by Congress.

As Senators know, the Finance Committee recommendation to reduce the present rate of depletion to 23 percent is estimated to increase Federal revenues by $155 million. However, the minimum tax on preference income is estimated to generate Federal revenues of $650 million in 1970 and up to $700 million over the long run. This particular provision substantially affects the effective depletion rate and intangible and drilling costs within the petroleum industry and may very well be more onerous over the long haul than the specific issue of the rate of repletion allowance.

Mr. President, I have tried to review carefully the economic realities of the situation, because I am deeply concerned that the present question before us may otherwise be determined on the basis of emotion rather than reason on this important issue.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I have previously advised my constituents in Colorado that I would support the present rate of depletion allowance for oil and gas. I believe the Ellender amendment, taken in light of the economic realities which confront the oil and gas industry, should be favorably adopted at this time.

I think, considering the alternatives, in view of the profit situation, the increased prices in the cost of gasoline and fuel to the American people, and the need for an increase in exploration for the future, which can come only out of profits in the oil industry, we would be well advised to agree to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

AMENDMENT NO. 318

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, on another matter, I send to the desk for printing an amendment to the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and printed, and will lie on the table.

THE ORGANIZED CRIME CONTROL ACT OF 1969

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, on November 20, the Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures completed its consideration of S. 30, the Organized Crime Control Act of 1969, and reported the bill favorably to the Judiciary Committee. This action was the culmination of a year of detailed study, hearings, and consultations, and resulted from one of the most thoroughly bipartisan efforts in which I have had the pleasure of participating.

The process began early this year, when I introduced S. 30, and continued through the introduction of four other bills—S. 1861, S. 2022, S. 2122, and S. 2292—aimed at organized crime that now appear, with revisions, in various titles of S. 30 as reported by the subcommittee. Senators EASTLAND (S. 2022), MUNDT (S. 2022), ERVIN (S. 30 and S. 2122), HRUSKA (S. 30, S. 1623, S. 1861, S. 2022, S. 2122, and S. 2292), and TYDINGS (S. 975 and S. 976), and the late Senator Dirksen (S. 2022), joined me in introducing some of these measures or introduced other bills that are now reflected in S. 30 as reworked by the subcommittee. Hearings on the bills were begun in March, and gradually the various bills were worked into S. 30 to form a comprehensive and unified measure against organized crime.

President Nixon added impetus to the effort to develop effective organized crime legislation by his message to the Congress of April 23, in which he called for prompt congressional action and stated:

> As a matter of national "public policy," I must warn our citizens that the threat of organized crime cannot be ignored or tolerated any longer. It will not be eliminated by loud voices and good intentions. It will be eliminated by carefully conceived, well-funded and well-executed action plans. . . . Success also will require the help of Congress. (H.R. Doc. No. 91–105, 91st Cong., 1st Sess. 2 (1969).)

The subcommittee held further hearings, obtained the views of experts and interested organizations, and worked very closely with the Department of Justice. The Department made a great many valuable suggestions which have been incorporated in the bill, and the Department now supports each title of S. 30 as reworked and reported by the subcommittee.

Mr. President, I am convinced that this painstaking and thorough process has produced a bill which guarantees protection of individual rights. At the same time, the bill promises to implement almost every significant organized crime recommendation made by the President's Crime Commission, the National Counsel on Crime and Delinquency, and others. Thus, Mr. President, I am confident that S. 30 will make a major contribution to the effectiveness of the Federal effort against organized crime. It may still be, of course, possible to improve or augment the provisions of S. 30, and I look forward to its thorough examination by the Judiciary Committee and on the floor. I only say now that we should turn our best efforts to the consideration of this bill—let us begin our consideration of it promptly and conclude it as rapidly as mature judgment permits—and let us give our approval to a truly effective legislation program designed to combat the organized crime menace.

Mr. President, I hope that the Judiciary Committee will be able to act on S. 30 soon, and that the bill will be before the Senate in the near future. In view of the fact that the bill will be coming up for a full committee vote soon, I was most gratified to learn that the national executive board of the National Chamber of Commerce, at their meeting on November 13, 1969, endorsed in principle several of the major provisions of S. 30.

I am particularly pleased to have the support of the national chamber for the principles embodied in S. 30 in view of the extensive research they have recently completed in the area of organized crime. Earlier this year the chamber published for public distribution a "Deskbook on Organized Crime." This concise but exhaustive study on organized crime was designed to alert the businessman to the growing exploitation of legitimate business by organized crime. Although directed at the businessman, the handbook discusses all phases of organized crime from loan sharking to bankruptcy fraud as well as the connection of organized crime to street crime. A reading of the handbook will indicate its thoroughness and the expertise of the numerous individuals and organizations who contributed to its publication. As chairman of the subcommittee, I hope that we can live up to public expectation reflected in action by organizations such as the chamber and have a bill ready for floor action before Christmas.

I ask unanimous consent to have the resolution expressing the chamber's endorsement printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMBATING ORGANIZED CRIME

To strengthen Federal efforts to combat organized crime, the National Chamber supports legislation providing for:

1. Extension of the grand jury system allowing the issuance of a presentment or report on misfeasance, non-feasance or corruption of public officials or their institutions.

2. Increasing investigatory and prosecutorial tools by implementing a Federal immunity provision, allowing taking depositions of witnesses, permitting introduction into evidence of declaration of co-conspirators, and codifying existing civil contempt proceedings.

3. Improving the system for protecting witnesses through Federal financial and other assistance.

4. Strengthening the Federal Government's authority to eliminate organized crime's economic power base by combating interstate gambling operations and the infiltration of legitimate business; and by creating a Federal study commission to examine the extent and effects of gambling upon society and the economy.

Support of the foregoing principles is with the understanding that such legislation will provide appropriate protection to the rights of the individual under the Constitution, and that specific provisions of any bill that deals with the Internal Revenue code will be referred to appropriate Chamber committees.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, that is good news which the distinguished senior Senator from Arkansas has just announced to the Senate, that his subcommittee has reported to the full committee a bill on the control of crime and that, hopefully, action will be taken shortly.

May I express the hope that at the same time proposed legislation covering the control of narcotics and the control of pornographic material, which I understand also has been reported by a Judiciary Subcommittee, is ready for the consideration of the full committee.

If the committee could report the proposed legislation having to do with pornography, with the control of narcotics, and with the control of crime, I think we should make every effort to pass it before Christmas, to get it on the books as soon as possible, so that we can face up to the difficulty which confronts this Nation in those three areas which, unfortunately, are not getting any better with the passage of time.

I commend the distinguished Senator for his action in regard to the crime control bill.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

I might say that S. 30, the bill to which I have referred, includes five other bills that were introduced and which have been inserted in this bill as new titles.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Do they concern narcotics and pornography?

Mr. McCLELLAN. No. Those are in other areas. Those are separate bills. They are in addition to the narcotics and pornography bills.

I may say, further, that in S. 30, into which we have worked the other bills by adding new titles, we cover substantially the recommendations of the President's Commission on Crime. We follow many of those recommendations substantially.

This bill should have and I think does have the backing of the Justice Department and many organizations throughout the country. I think it is a bill that can be passed in a day or two. I do not think there are any tremendous complications in it. Once we get it to the floor, I think we can act on it promptly.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Hackney, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed, without amendment, the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 143) extending the duration of copyright protection in certain cases.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H.J. Res. 1017) making further continuing appropriations for the fiscal year 1970, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 14159) making appropriations for public works for water, pollution control, and power development, including the Corps of Engineers—Civil, the Panama Canal, the Federal Water Pollution Control Administration, the Bureau of Reclamation, power agencies of the Department of the Interior, the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Atomic Energy Commission, and related independent agencies and commission for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1970, and for other purposes; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. KIRWAN, Mr. EVINS of Tennessee, Mr. BOLAND, Mr. WHITTEN, Mr. ANDREWS of Alabama, Mr. MAHON, Mr. RHODES, Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin, Mr. ROBISON, and Mr. CEDERBERG were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

The joint resolution (H.J. Res. 1017) making further continuing appropriations for the fiscal year 1970, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

TAX REFORM ACT OF 1969

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 13270), the Tax Reform Act of 1969.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLE in the chair). Who yields time?

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, and I ask unanimous consent that the time be equally divided between both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield 15 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Alaska (Mr. STEVENS).

Mr. STEVENS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, the matter before the Senate today is extremely important not only to the economy and the security of the United States, but also to my State. I am sure that anyone who is familiar with current magazine and newspaper articles realizes that the north slope development in Alaska is one of tremendous importance insofar as the future of oil and gas production in the United States is concerned.

I am pleased to have my name added as a cosponsor of the pending amendment which provides for returning the depletion allowance to 27½ percent. I do so in the real hope that this amendment will be adopted.

To me, the depletion allowance is part of the economic fabric of the oil industry, and without the depletion allowance at its present rate, the discoveries that have been made in Alaska may well be reduced in their importance. I say this because the pricing of the petroleum product on the American scene today reflects the 27½ percent depletion allowance.

If the 27½-percent oil depletion allowance is to be reduced, the amount of tax free cash that can flow into this development on the north slope would be drastically reduced, and it is my understanding this will amount to at least $600 million a year. That means the oil industry is going to have to go out into a tight money market and borrow the money, and when it borrows the money, the cost is going to be passed on to the consumer of petroleum products in this country. I do not see how the reduction of the depletion allowance could do anything other than increase the cost of gasoline to the American consumer. It will not decrease the needs for petroleum products from my State. That need will remain; and it will increase.

I think that at the time Alaskan petroleum enters the U.S. market in quantities sufficient to have an impact, and that has not occurred yet, there will be a reduction in the price to consumers. But that reduction in the price to consumers will not occur if we reduce the depletion allowance.

The Tax Reform Act of 1969 is, by its own terms, a reform measure designed to correct inequities in our present income tax laws. Its main targets are the so-called "loopholes." A loophole, to me, is a special tax benefit originally enacted to provide relief or incentive to a class of taxpayers who Congress felt were being treated unfairly under the income tax laws, but which is now being used by another class of taxpayers to escape paying their fair share of taxes contrary to Congress' intention. Under this definition, the depletion allowance is not a loophole. It was enacted in 1926 to recognize the fact that normal cost deduction methods work to the substantial disadvantage of depletable resource industries. That fact is still a fact. And, the depletion allowance is not now being used by an unintended class of taxpayers for the purpose of escaping fair taxation. It is still being used by the same industry for the same purpose Congress originally intended. It has been an integral part of the economic fabric of the petroleum industry for over 40 years. It is imperative that we recognize that a reduction of the depletion allowance is not a correction of a tax loophole; it is a change in our national policy toward the petroleum industry, a change that will have far-reaching effects both on our economy and our national security.

This amendment deals with a policy decision, not a tax decision. It is apparent that, before voting on this amendment, we must examine the industry which this policy decision affects. We need to answer two questions here: First, what will our future needs from the petroleum industry be, and, second, how would the lowering of the depletion allowance affect the ability of this industry to meet those needs.

I would like to point just a few things as far as the so-called "oil play" in Alaska is concerned. One of them is that the recent sale brought in $900 million to the State. That was deemed to be the value of the privilege to explore for oil on these State lands.

In bidding this amount, the industries involved were both U.S. oil industry companies and international companies such as British Petroleum were involved in the bidding.

However, the reduction in the depletion allowance, either the version of the committee in the Senate which reported the bill, or the House version of 20 percent, would reduce the amount of cash available to domestic companies, U.S. companies, to compete with the companies involved in the world play as far as future exploration in my State is concerned.

If these companies had not had the money to explore in my State, there would be more of Alaskan oil potential moving to international companies. I welcome them in Alaska, but I do not see why we should give them the upper hand, so to speak, by making it easier for them to compete.

The depletion allowance is the thing that makes it possible for our domestic companies to compete with Federal tax free cash in the development and exploration of our oil potential of Alaska.

I would like to refer to a couple of items in connection with Alaskan development. According to the American Petroleum Institute, the productive capacity of the United States as of January 1, 1969, was 12.005 million barrels a day—a decline of 234,000 barrels per day over the previous estimate made a year before. Over the next 6 years, the United States will require an additional 400,000 to 600,000 barrels per day every year, or 2.4 to 3.6 million barrels per day in increased productive capacity by 1975. If this rate of increase continues to 1980, our productive capacity would have to be double what it is now in order to meet the demand. Stated another way, proven reserves aggregating 55 to 60 billion barrels must be discovered in the next 10 years. My study indicates it will require $70 billion in exploration and production costs to find and produce that much oil.

This fantastic sum of money must come from either or both of two sources: return on capital within the oil industry and the money market. Look first at the second source, the money market. Capital is attracted into one industry in preference to another because the security of the investment and the rate of return are greater. The risk of an investment in oil exploration is known to be high. Only one well in 50 is successful. With this high risk factor, the oil industry's rate of return to investors has not been as good as the average for other industries in recent years. Already, the money market is tight, with corporate and government borrowing both reaching the 8 percent level. We will be fortunate to hold this rate where it is.

But, Mr. President, think what is going to happen if we force the oil industry out into the money market to find money to develop even the vast potential of the north slope.

Additionally, the power industries, of which the petroleum industry is the major segment, are all capital intensive industries and thus are all in competition in the money market. The outlook for raising much of this $70 billion figure from the money market is not at all hopeful, particularly if this Congress changes the economic fabric of this industry at the very time when more incentives, not less, are needed to generate the capital for this vast exploration and production task.

That leaves us with the first source I mentioned—return of invested capital. In the past, the depletion allowance has been the tool by which the oil industry retained an adequate amount of its capital for continuing the necessary exploration and development programs to supply this nation's petroleum needs. A reduction in the depletion allowance will simultaneously reduce the amount of capital the industry can generate internally and reduce the overall return on invested capital, thus worsening the industry's already unfavorable opportunities to raise capital from the money market.

The effects of this inability to raise capital that would plague the oil industry are easy to see. The amount of exploration that will be carried out would have to be curtailed.

We are dealing with an industry with a delicate balance. The inability to raise sufficient capital to continue exploration at a rate great enough to ensure the finding of adequate new reserves has an acceleration factor in it. As reserves are brought into production, they return capital which is used to find new reserves. If this capital is not obtained, then the reserves decline, leaving less oil to be brought into production which in turn produces less capital and so forth. Eventually, we have no reserves and no capital. This is precisely what happens when an industry does not set aside adequate funds to replace depreciating assets. As the assets' productivity declines, there is even less ability to replace them and the industry collapses until the services it once provided can no longer be supplied without direct government assistance. The $10 billion Urban Mass Transit Act is an example of the type of action that can become necessary when policies prevent the proper retention of capital in an industry.

Proponents of the reduced depletion allowance point out that U.S. producers would not need to bring these additional reserves into production if we adjusted our import quota program to allow sufficient imports to take up the slack. Because less capital is required to produce oil in foreign countries, the loss of capital in the domestic industry would not result in failure of the industry to provide the necessary oil for our society to continue functioning.

I see three very serious problems with this policy. First, with so much of our oil supply subject to the whims of international politics, our foreign policy and national security could be seriously impaired. It is estimated that as much as 58 percent of our oil could be coming from foreign sources by 1980 if the import quota program were eliminated. If just half that supply is jeopardized either by conflict in the Middle East or by a civil war in Latin America—certainly very possible military action would protect our security. Is this what the proponents of the cut in the depletion allowance really want? Our flexible foreign policy concepts would be seriously affected insofar as oil producing nations were concerned. Another Vietnam-type situation is a definite possibility. Expropriation of any further American oil producing properties in foreign countries could only produce an undesirable and precipitous action on our part if we do not retain the present balance in our domestic producing capability vis-a-vis foreign imports. Clearly, this is not a desirable position in which to place our Nation.

There is an answer, and the answer is to develop the Alaskan oil and gas potential as rapidly as possible, but how can it be developed when at the very time it is in its infancy, Congress wants to change the depletion allowance and the administration wants to change the oil import quota. By the time we get through with both of these matters, the price of Alaskan oil to the consumer is going to be outside the range consumers can afford, or we will have to find a way for a subsidy for the development of this resource in my State. I do not think that is contemplated seriously by anyone in Congress.

The second serious consequence of the change in the depletion allowance is the effect on our already deteriorating balance of trade and balance-of-payments position. Because of the necessity to develop lower cost foreign oil reserves, an increasing amount of the capital recovered under the reduced depletion allowance would flow out of our economy to foreign treasuries. A significant portion of every dollar spent for power or fuel in this country would go out of our economy. The petroleum industry has invested an average of $4.5 billion annually over the past 10 years to discover and develop domestic reserves. If the depletion allowance is reduced, a proportionate amount of this money will go into foreign investment. This will occur because those will be the reserves developed by an industry which must seek the lowest cost of production to pass it on to the consumer. The United States can hardly afford this additional burden on its already unfavorable balance of payments.

The third serious consequence relates to my earlier discussion concerning capital. Assume that a sudden loss of international supply was not recoverable by military action. Domestic producers would then be called upon to accelerate a reduction to make up the difference. This would require either a direct Government subsidy or a dramatic increase in consumer prices to provide the needed capital to rapidly expand production. So the consumer through increased prices will pay for any crash program of development in the oil industry. In other words, if we fool around with the economic fabric of this industry, we will create a boom, then bust, then boom-type economy in the oil industry instead of the continuous even operation we now enjoy.

To me, this is foolish economy, to force the oil industry into a position of reliance upon foreign imports and then get into a position where we know that domestic production will have to be restored if there is any change in the foreign picture so far as production is concerned.

Every person who supports the proposed reduction in depletion allowances must be intellectually honest. This reduction will increase the revenue to the Treasury but it will also drastically affect consumer prices. It will be the consumer who pays for this and the consumer will pay a great deal more than the increased revenues.

Those who support the reduction, I hope, will realize that this change in the depletion allowance will bring about a greater reliance upon foreign sources for our petroleum needs. This is being done despite the fact that in my State we have reserves sufficient to meet the needs, if we can retain the economic tools which have been given to every other deposit of petroleum in this country—and every other deposit has been developed on the basis of the depletion allowance as we have known it over the years. Thus, it is completely astounding to me that, at the time we find the greatest single known deposits in the United States, the depletion allowance is to be reduced so that this discovery cannot be developed in time to meet our needs.

Too many people talk of the depletion allowance in terms of the incentive needed to find reserves. I think it should be referred to more in terms of the incentive needed to prove out the reserves. We know that in my State it will cost $1 billion just to build one pipeline 800 miles long. Ten times that amount of pipe will be needed in gathering pipelines throughout the fields on the north slope.

Where is the money going to come from to build the facilities to take this oil to market? Where will it come from to drill the wells necessary to prove out the reserves? If we reduce the depletion allowance, we will take away the incentive and force the industry in my State to borrow money on the tight capital market. The result will be disastrous and will very drastically affect our State in the future.

And this analysis does not take into account the fact that there simply may not be enough proven reserves left at the time we need to increase production to meet our needs. When we finally recognize that we need a domestic industry, the industry may have to explore for several years to find the necessary oil. And what do we do in the meantime? Invade some oil-rich country to get what we need?

Mr. President, it is certainly possible that in the future an American President may face that question, if we refuse to examine the proposed reduction of the depletion allowance as a question of policy rather than tax reform.

The depletion allowance has been part of the economic fabric of the oil industry for 43 years. Alaska has been part of that industry for only a few short years. Our production has barely started. Yet just when our production really has the potential to develop, the depletion allowance is to be reduced. The oil industry has indicated, during the several months of hearings on this bill, what the consequences would be if this ill-advised step is taken in the name of tax reform. All of us are under pressure to reduce taxes, to reform taxes, to make everyone pay his fair share of our Government services. This bill provides many reforms to accomplish that end. It is heralded as the largest package of tax amendments since the 1954 code was enacted. But the attack on the depletion allowance is an attack on our national security, our oil and gas system, our capital markets, and, indeed, the foreign policy of this Nation. The reduction of the depletion allowance is not a reform measure, it is a total change in our policy toward the fossil fuel industry. It is an unwise change with dire consequences.

Viewed in that light and considered on its merits, I find it an unsupportable change and urge the Senate to retain the present policy and the present level of depletion allowance which is an integral part of it.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alaska yield?

Mr. STEVENS. I yield.

Mr. TOWER. I commend the distinguished Senator from Alaska for a very stirring and impressive presentation.

At a time when the United States of America is spending billions of dollars to help develop the underdeveloped areas of the world, I think it would be tragic if we denied the opportunity for development of oil to the great State of Alaska, which has a tremendous potential yet untapped, which should be tapped, and for us to discourage the flow of capital into the State of Alaska for the development of so much in the way of untapped resources, much of which we do not even know about.

I think that the Senator from Alaska has made an extremely good point. It is one that Senators should observe and take to heart.

Mr. STEVENS. I thank the Senator from Texas for his comments.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alaska yield?

Mr. STEVENS. I yield.

Mr. DOMINICK. Let me reiterate what the Senator from Texas has just said, that I think the remarks of the Senator from Alaska are illuminating and indicate once again, as has been proved over and over again, how thoroughly the Senator from Alaska is making sure that the interests of his State and his people are protected in this body.

The Senator has spoken in an extraordinarily effective manner on the problem as it relates between national policy and national concern and I want to congratulate the Senator on a cogent and able speech.

Mr. STEVENS. I thank the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. President, what will happen, if we are compelled to go on to the money market to get the $1 billion or the $1½ billion a year in order to develop the Alaska potential? This does not have anything to do with refinery costs or the total cost of production. We have the ultimate reserves of this country, and they should be developed under the same economic fabric as was the rest of the industry.

Mr. McGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Wyoming.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. McGEE. Mr. President, the 27.5-percent oil-depletion allowance has become, as one of its most ardent opponents was quoted as saying in Sunday's papers, "the symbol of tax reform." I could not agree more. It has been made the symbol by its opponents in the press, in the Congress, and in other facets of our national life who have fixed upon this one article of our tax laws. Indeed, the oil industry, because of this campaign, is threatened with becoming the scapegoat of tax reform this year. But let me say that a reduction in the oil-depletion allowance is not in itself tax reform. There are just those who would have us believe that. They are many. They have great influence. And they have not mounted this campaign all of a sudden. It has gone on for years, but never has it seemed so likely of success as it does in this unhappy year of 1969. As one of Wyoming's leading newspapers, the Casper Star-Tribune, recently observed:

> The 27.5 depletion allowance for the oil industry has long been a whipping boy for the tax reformers. With the assistance of writers and politicians who have other interests at heart, the industry is made to appear as a robber baron filling his own pockets at the expense of the average taxpayer.

Those of us who are going to stand up today in defense of the 27.5-percent depletion allowance will be termed by some tools of a special interest, Mr. President. I do not doubt that. But in the case of this Senator, I can state unequivocally that the special interest I am serving is the State of Wyoming. My objection to the antidepletion campaign is based on the realistic aspects of the situation; on how it would affect the economy of my State.

To those of us who live in Wyoming, the oil industry is vitally important. It is our heavy industry. It is our answer to the shoe industry in New England, the textile mills of the Southeast, and the timber and fishing industries of the far Northwest. Crude petroleum is our principal product, representing a full three-fourths of Wyoming's mineral industry, providing jobs for 6,877 men at last count, if only crude oil and natural gas production is concerned. If all aspects of the industry, from transportation to refining and marketing are considered, the industry employs nearly 12,000 Wyoming people. And that is a very significant total in a State with little more than 300,000 population.

It is a significant facet in the overall economy of a State which has, over the past decade, suffered some economic reverses which have resulted in a loss of population. We need the work, the dollars, and the activity generated by the oil industry. Last year there was a total of 1,293 wells drilled in Wyoming, and of that total 471 were new field wildcat wells which together added measurably to the known reserves of oil and natural gas in the United States. Most of those wells in Wyoming run deep, Mr. President. Without the 27.5-percent depletion allowance. I think it is fair to predict that fewer, far fewer, of these 15,000-foot wildcats will be drilled. They cost in the neighborhood of three-fourths of a million dollars each.

Generally, one can figure there are nine dry holes drilled for each new commercial well. In fact, in 1968, the dry holes turned up 86.5 percent when all wells are taken into account. Thus, the risk is high, and hardly acceptably without the existence of some economic stimulus. For Wyoming at least, that stimulus has been the oil depletion allowance.

I cannot predict that, given a reduction in the depletion allowance, Wyoming will see only 46 or 57 rotary rigs active on the average day in 1970, in place of the 76 operating rigs in 1968. Nor can I predict that employment in the oil patch will fall by 1,000, 1,500, or 2,000 men. I do not know just what would happen, Mr. President, but at this point I do not care to find out, because Wyoming cannot afford the losses, no matter what they may be. And I would like to add that this interest encompasses primarily the independent company of limited resources which is willing to stake its venture capital on the discovery of a new field which, if proven, adds to the national wealth of the United States and to this country's very security. If the financial encouragement for such activity is to be lessened, it is obvious that wildcatting also will be curtailed, and at the expense of my State.

The national interest itself calls for a strong oil and gas industry. Thirty-two States are involved in the production of oil and gas, an industry which directly employs more than 275,000 Americans and provides the basic fuel for so much of our economy. Yet, in 1968, we produced 4 million barrels per day less petroleum than we consumed. The total of our known reserves of liquid petroleum declined last year. In itself, this is not alarming, perhaps. But it is not a desirable state, either. Our reserves should be maintained in as high a level as possible in the interest of national security. This requires that exploration continue unceasingly, Mr. President, for we are a people who use massive quantities of oil and gas in the course of our normal activities. And we use huge quantities of natural gas as well. Indeed, the position of the natural gas portion of this industry is less enviable than most of us could guess, for reserves are dwindling here, too, by more than 5 trillion cubic feet last year. And natural gas is not easily imported.

So it is not just in Wyoming's interests that I defend the 27.5-percent depletion allowance, though, if it were, that would be enough. A good case is made, I believe, for leaving this policy of 43 years' duration on the books, Mr. President. Some may profit. But I am convinced that we all do. Certainly, my own State does. I urge acceptance of the Senator from Louisiana's amendment to retain the 27.5-percent depletion allowance. I think the importance of this vital tax provision can be summed up by saying percentage depletion has helped to establish and maintain the United States as the world's greatest producer and user of petroleum products. Reduction in the effectiveness of this time-tested tax provision would weaken the petroleum industry and result in an impairment of our national security and add increased burdens on the consuming public through increased prices.

I understand that the Senate is operating under limited time between now and the agreed-upon time to vote. I hope that Members of the Senate would not jump in a precipitate way into a search for some substitute for the problem by hanging it around a single phrase or a single term, namely "depletion."

I thank the Senator from Louisiana for yielding to me. May I ask if there is any additional time on this question?

Mr. ELLENDER. There is not.

Mr. McGEE. I thank the Senator very much for yielding the time.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Delaware yield me some time?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, may I inquire about the time situation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MATHIAS in the chair). The Senator from Delaware has all the remaining time from now until the vote at 3 o'clock.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I shall yield to my friend from Texas in just a moment, but first I yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. President, much has been said in the last few minutes about the Ellender amendment. The argument seems to be made that the oil companies have an inherent right to the 27.5-percent depletion allowance because it was something that was passed 40 years ago, something that is sacred and that we should not touch or change.

I call to the attention of my colleagues the fact that during those 40 years on numerous occasions we have raised the tax rates for all other Americans. The corporate rate has moved from 14 percent to 53 percent at the present time, including the surtax. Individual rates go as high as 77 percent, as compared with a top rate of 15 percent 40 years ago.

So I do not think that the oil industry, much as I respect it—and I do respect it—has any inherent right to this special allowance or that it should be regarded as a sacred group which cannot be touched. This industry is paying an average of only about 8 percent as the corporate rate.

It was pointed out that some foreign companies were recent bidders for the oil leases in Alaska. I remind my colleagues that very few foreign companies have any depletion allowance. It is only in this country that the oil companies have had a depletion allowance of 27.5 percent before they compute tax obligation. So I do not see that that is an argument for retaining that depletion allowance. Quite the contrary, it is an argument for putting that industry on more equal footing with all other American industry.

Much has been said in Congress in the last 12 months about tax reform, and nearly every Member of this body has said how much tax reform is needed. Yet every Member of this body knew when he was talking about tax reform that he was talking about raising taxes for some particular group that was getting a special tax advantage. When we get down to the votes it seems everybody is willing to reform every other form of industry except the one in which he or his State is interested.

I think the issue before us on this amendment is very clear: Do we or do we not want tax reform? If we do we are going to have to start voting to change existing tax structure. Certainly this is one industry that is not paying its proportionate part of the cost of operating the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I yield myself 2 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware is recognized for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. By all means, the Senate should at least stand by the action of the House, which rolled the depletion allowance back to 20 percent.

Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Louisiana has used up such time as he had

How much time do I have left?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware has 24 minutes remaining.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I shall yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Louisiana and 5 minutes to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. MONTOYA. Mr. President, will the Senator from Delaware yield to me?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I will try to take care of the Senator from New Mexico later, but I will have to withhold for the moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Delaware yield first?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Texas, and then I will yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Louisiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER) is yielded 5 minutes, after which the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. ELLENDER) will be yielded 5 minutes.

Mr. TOWER. I thank the Senator from Delaware. He is very generous with one who believes 180 degrees opposite from what he believes in this matter. It is very kind of him to yield under those circumstances.

I should like to offer my thanks to the distinguished Senator from Louisiana (Mr. ELLENDER) my neighbor to the east, who has offered, I think, a very constructive amendment. The action on this amendment will indicate whether this body is taking rational and economically sound approach to tax reform or whether it is following a "vengence be mine" formula for tax changes. I greatly hope that the amendment is approved, for I have no desire to participate in a vendetta against the oil industry even though it is cloaked in the guise of tax reform.

According to the best estimates of the Treasury Department, lowering the depletion allowance to 20 percent will bring in an additional $360 million of tax revenue. There is ample testimony that such a reduction would force the major oil companies to raise the retail price of gasoline 1 cent per gallon. Last year there were some 84 billion gallons of gasoline sold in the United States. If each of these gallons cost 1 cent more in 1970, the consumer will pay $840 million more for gasoline. If we take away the $360 million of increased tax revenues from the $840 million of increased cost to the consumer, we find that our so-called tax reform results in a net cost increase to the consumer of $480 million.

The man who has to pay extra for his petroleum products will not be interested in whatever fine labels we put on it. All he knows is that as a direct result of this body's action, he will be faced with a higher cost of living. He is not going to be happy about that. If after all the fine words and great promises, he still has less money after necessities, he will be much more inclined to join a "taxpayers' revolt" than he was before the "reform" speeches were made.

We need tax reform, but we need real tax reform, not a sham. That reform must be based on economic realities, not on an effort to strike back at some segment of the economy that has been made the villain in the press and a scapegoat in Congress.

I am just a little tired of this approach. By and large, the American oil man is a risk-taking entrepreneur in the finest tradition of the free enterprise system. If he is successful, it is often because he ventures to go where others have feared to go. He creates jobs and wealth for others in the process.

And there are many oil men who are not successful. The oil business is not an easy road to sure riches. If it were, a great many more people would be out looking for oil.

I think it is time that Congress abandon any negative attitude toward oil men and begin to appreciate the vital contribution they make to this Nation. It is time to quit trying to punish success and begin rewarding intelligence and hard work, and, I might say also, a venturesome spirit.

If we do not, Mr. President, we may see the problems of the "great natural gas fiasco" repeated on a larger and even more dangerous scale.

Let me take a moment to share the reasons for the "great natural gas fiasco." Some time ago, the Federal Government decided that it would save the American consumer some money by stepping in and regulating the price of natural gas. Without going into great detail, let me simply say that the FPC pricing policy has brought about a situation where—

First. The Northeastern States will experience some shortages of natural gas for this winter and continue to suffer increasing shortages for some time to come.

Second. The price of natural gas, held at an artificially low level over past years, will have to be dramatically increased in order to induce the discovery and production of enough natural gas to meet demand.

Third. At a time when we are exhausting our discovered reserves, Federal Government policy has caused a 10-year slump in drilling of some 32 percent; 32,000 wells were drilled in 1968 versus 47,000 in 1958.

In short, Government intervention designed to assist the consumer in the short run has resulted in net long-term cost increases to the consumer. Paul MacAvoy, a leading economist at MIT, described Federal regulation of natural gas prices as bringing about social benefits of $10 million at a net social cost of $100 million.

Even if we call this arithmetic consumer protection, it still does not add up to good economic commonsense.

And, if we compound this fiasco by reducing an incentive absolutely necessary to induce exploration for petroleum products, it still will not add up, even if we call it tax reform this time.

The oil depletion allowance is an economically justifiable, needed incentive. Let us not act to reduce it at a time when its justification was never greater and the need for it never stronger.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. McINTYRE. I need 5, at the very least.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. McINTYRE. Mr. President, it is simply amazing what handouts the oil industry has won from our elected governments. They are of three basic types, and each of them serves to reinforce the others.

The first type of handout is the series of production controls established and enforced by our main oil-producing States, such as Texas and Louisiana. The purpose of these controls is simple—to limit the amount of oil produced to keep prices high. They work as follows: Buyers of crude oil estimate each month to State regulatory agencies the amount of oil they plan to buy in the State during the following month. These State agencies then "pro rate" the State's oilfields, curbing their production so that it never exceeds the expected demand. It is through this market control mechanism that our oil-producing States first create and then maintain rigged petroleum prices.

These prices are close to 200 percent higher than the east coast delivered price of totally comparable foreign-produced oil. In a free-market environment one would expect this low-cost foreign oil to capture a large share of our domestic market. In fact, that is what was starting to happen in the 1950's, until oil's secret government won another of its handouts.

This handout, known officially as the mandatory oil import control program, was initiated by President Eisenhower in 1959. It limits the foreign-produced oil imported into the United States to only 12.2 percent of our own domestic production. It has produced rising crude-oil prices at home, even as crude-oil prices abroad have fallen sharply over the last decade. It has cost American consumers more than $6 billion a year.

Moreover, the program has discriminated harshly against New England. There are, at latest count, 284 refineries in the United States. None of these are in New England, and the reason is very simple. There are no indigenous oil supplies in the region and because of import controls enough foreign oil to run a refinery cannot be imported. The main source of oil for a New England refinery would therefore have to be the gulf coast and it is simply too costly to ship high-priced domestic oil that far to be refined.

Because there are no refineries in New England, the major oil companies headquartered elsewhere have the market to themselves. It is the market power of these companies—preserved by the oil import control program and now being expanded into the wholesale end of the industry—which has made New England home heating costs the highest in the country.

And on top of these two handouts there is yet a third—the elaborate system of tax loopholes which allow the oil industry to keep the vast profits made possible in the first place by State prorationing and import controls.

The oil depletion allowance is by far the best known of these many tax loopholes. It permits tax-free treatment of 27.5 percent of an oil company's revenues, up to 50 percent of its net profits. The official purpose of this loophole, which has been in effect for over 40 years, is the encouragement of oil exploration at home. Yet it is applied in full, not only to domestic oil, but to all oil produced by American companies abroad.

This depletion allowance does not stand alone. Oil companies, for example, can "expense" their intangible drilling costs instead of amortizing them over a period of years like most other industries. And they can deduct from their U.S. tax bills the "tax" payments they make to foreign governments, even when these payments are nothing more than royalties which bear no resemblance to the income they actually earn from foreign operations. These and other loopholes too complicated to mention together provide the oil industry with even more tax-free income than does the depletion allowance.

With loopholes like this it is really no wonder that oil companies end up paying Federal income taxes many times lower than those of most corporations. In 1968, for example, the average corporation had a 40-percent tax rate while the average oil company had a 7.7-percent rate. Sinclair actually paid no taxes at all on profits of over $100 million, while Gulf, with profits of almost $1 billion, had a rate less than 1 percent.

State prorationing, import quotas, and tax loopholes—these are the three types of handouts won in the past by the oil industry.

This day has been set aside for the consideration of amendments designed to revise our policies in the third of the three areas I have just discussed, amendments to revise the tax treatment of our domestic oil industry. In my own mind, there is not the slightest doubt that such revision is urgently needed. Any tax system which requires 2.2 million people under the poverty level to pay Federal income taxes, yet allows Atlantic Richfield to earn over $465 million between 1964 and 1967 without paying a single cent in such taxes clearly requires revision.

According to data which the Treasury Department has submitted to Congress, the percentage depletion allowance for oil and gas cost the American taxpayer $1.3 billion in revenues in 1968. And the oil industry received another $300 million benefit last year due to intangible expensing. This $1.6 billion is an awful lot of money.

It is three times what was budgeted in fiscal 1969 for Federal law enforcement; 15 times as much as the cost of running our Federal judicial system; three times the budgeted amount for school lunch and food stamp programs; five times as much as was budgeted for low-rent public housing; and four times the allotment for the Alliance for Progress.

In light of these facts, I think it is imperative that the Senate act today to rectify this situation at least in a small way. At the very least, we must follow the action of the House in reducing the depletion allowance on oil and gas from 27½ to 20 percent and we must put an end to the system by which international oil companies receive credits against U.S. taxes for royalty payments to foreign governments.

The oil companies have told us that if we approve such changes the result will be higher prices for American consumers. Any such price hike would be quite unjustified. More important, it could be prevented by sound governmental action. If our oil import program is revised in such a way that larger amount of cheap foreign oil are allowed into this country, the domestic oil companies will not be able to raise their prices. They will have to hold the line or else be driven out of the market by oil produced abroad.

Recent press reports indicate that a substantial liberalization of the oil import program may be forthcoming in the near future. Mr. President, if this is the case and if the Senate today acts to revise the tax treatment of the oil industry, American consumers will soon have some much needed relief which is certainly long overdue.

I thank the distinguished Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 13 minutes remaining.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the statements made on this floor today in behalf of the pending amendment have been, first, that if we do not agree to the Ellender amendment, and if we do agree to the Williams amendment, it will have an adverse effect on the finding of oil reserves and the production of oil.

Mr. President, we do not have to take the word of the proponents or opponents of the amendment on that matter. We can go to the report commissioned by the Treasury Department, prepared by Consad, and see what their finding is.

Their finding is that the oil depletion allowance is one of the most inefficient ways of encouraging exploration for oil, and that, for every $10 of tax reduction, you get only $1 of crude reserves. That simply is not the efficient way to do it.

In the second place, Mr. Collado, the executive vice president of the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, and recognized by everyone as an oil expert, has pointed out that it will be 1974, in his view, before there is any reduction whatsoever in the production of oil because of the reduction in the oil depletion allowance, and even after that, the decrease will be moderate.

In the third place, the argument has been made that to reduce the depletion allowance will reduce the income of the oil companies, and therefore, the Senator from Alaska pointed out, make it harder for them to raise money.

The firm of Merrill Lynch has made a study, and found that the effect on the profits of oil companies will be a decrease of only between 2 and 8 percent, averaging around a 4- or 5-percent reduction in net profits. This is less than their recent average increase in profits for 1 year. They have averaged an increase of 8 to 10 percent in profits each year for the last 4 years. So the adverse effect on profits would be very modest indeed. The effect on the money market would be insignificant.

Finally, the argument has been made that after all, the consumer is going to pay more. Obviously, if production is not going to be reduced, there is no reason why the consumer should pay more for the product. Furthermore, if the profits of the companies are going to be reduced, as Merrill Lynch's study shows they will, that would mean that the difference would not come out of the pockets of the consumers.

Finally, Mr. President, the argument, it seems to me, is well met by recognition that the reserve of oil in this country is supplied by imports of oil. The Shultz committee, appointed by President Nixon, has made a recommendation on the oil import program. They have recommended that, instead of having an oil import quota, we have a tariff. Their recommendations would result in increasing the supply of oil, decreasing the price to the consumer, and compensating for any adverse effect on the supply of oil that could result from a decrease in the depletion allowance.

So on all these scores, on the reduction in the income of the oil companies, the consumer paying more, or the reduced supply, it is clear that this oil depletion allowance reduction could accomplish tax reform and greater equity without any significant adverse effect.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. President, in his opening remarks earlier today the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin stated that the oil industry stands as a symbol of tax evasion and tax loopholes and that unless Congress acts, no one believes we will be able to close the tax loopholes.

As I pointed out in the main part of my speech this afternoon, tax evasion is not accomplished through the depletion process, because the depletion provision provides that not more than 50 percent of net income can be deducted. In other words the producer pays taxes at about the same rate as others pay on income from capital gains.

Mr. President, I dread what will happen if the depletion allowance is reduced. The Department of the Interior stated that for the next decade, from 1970 to 1980, we must find reserves amounting to 70 billion barrels of oil, despite the fact that during the last 10 years we have been able to find only 35 billion barrels of oil.

The decrease in wildcatting for oil has been enormous. In the decade from 1950 to 1960, the number of wildcat oil wells was 108,455, in contrast to 91,925 for the present decade.

In relation to all of these wildcat wells, there is nothing involved but expenses. They do not really produce oil. They simply seek it.

As I pointed out earlier today, out of every 10 wells discovered, only one is productive. The others are dry holes. And of 46 wells drilled only one finds enough oil to be truly profitable.

I believe sincerely, therefore, that we should keep the depletion allowance at least at the current level in order to provide funds so that companies can finance the discovery of more badly needed oil. As I have said, we are using 14 million barrels of oil per day at the moment. In the next 10 years, we will be using 19 million barrels of oil per day. We have to have reserves with which to meet this challenge.

Mr. MONTOYA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLE in the chair). The Senator from New Mexico is recognized.

Mr. MONTOYA. Mr. President, I concur wholeheartedly with the senior Senator from Louisiana. I think we should concern ourselves with all the ramifications that might come about because of the action we take today.

I am personally very concerned about what our action might do to the fiscal structure of the State of New Mexico.

I call to the attention of the Senate what oil and gas production means revenuewise in the State of New Mexico.

We talk about a 27.5-percent depletion allowance. We talk about loopholes. We talk about the bonanza that the oil industry is deriving from the 27.5-percent depletion allowance. However, we in New Mexico are deeply concerned over what the lack of exploration is doing to our revenue structure.

In 1968, the total sales value of oil and gas in New Mexico was $528 million. It is the sixth largest producer of oil and the fourth largest producer of gas.

From this amount we deducted the Federal, State, and Indian royalty which amounted to $52,781,279.

The taxes from the oil and gas production industry are as follows: The oil and gas emergency school tax is $12,090,386. The oil and gas severance tax is $11,853,320. The oil and gas ad valorem tax is $6,780,099. The oil and gas conservation tax was $633,786 .The other ad valorem taxes are $5,750,000. The other excise taxes are $6,250,000.

Mr. President, we then have the other revenue from oil and gas.

The State oil and gas lease rental and bonus amounted to $6,078,678.

The State oil and gas royalty amounted to $26,339,817.

The permanent fund earnings, oil and gas portion—97 percent—amounted to $15,213,198.

The Federal mineral leasing return, oil and gas portion, amounted to $10,201,438.

So, altogether we derived total taxes and other revenue of $101,220,722 for 1968.

We are now building a permanent school fund out of oil and gas royalties and rentals. Our permanent school fund now amounts to $365 million.

The earnings from this permanent school fund are used for administrative expenses in our school systems in the State.

To try to discourage exploration now by virtue of a reduction in the depletion allowance, in my State, at least, would be to discourage further investment in our school fiscal structure.

It is a healthy thing to maintain a 27.5 percent depletion allowance in view of the paucity of the oil reserves we have in this country.

Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Louisiana for yielding to me.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, Congress established the oil depletion rate of 27.5 percent 40 years ago. At that time the top rate of corporate tax was 14 percent, and the top rate for individuals was around 15 percent.

Since that time there have been many increases in the tax structures.

This year corporations are paying around 52.8 percent when we consider the surtax being added to the 48 percent, and the individual is paying as high as 77 percent.

Certainly this industry, which we all respect, is not paying its proportionate part of the cost of operating the Government today.

The average rate paid by the corporations operating in the oil industry is around 8 percent compared with a rate of better than 50 percent for all other American industry.

Certainly, the time is long overdue when this industry, which has been one of the most prosperous industries of our Nation, should pay its proportionate part of the taxes.

Much has been said about the amount of taxes they are already paying. Much of that tax amount is represented by taxes collected by the oil industry from the consumers of gas and gasoline as well as by withholding taxes on the payroll of its employees.

I do not give them credit for those taxes. They are merely acting as the collector, the same as other industries.

It costs us nearly $200 billion a year to run the Government today, 40 percent of which is for the defense of our country. This oil industry should be willing—in fact, should be more than willing—to pay its proportionate part of the cost.

The amendment of the Senator from Louisiana should be rejected. The House bill would reduce the oil depletion allowance to 20 percent. The Ellender amendment would retain the oil depletion allowance at 27.5 percent as is written in the existing law. The difference between the two rates involves an amount of around $400 million.

During the past few months much has been said about tax reform. I believe that practically every Member of the Senate has made a speech for tax reform.

We are going to call the roll now. Let us use our votes to support those speeches which we have been making for the past few months.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I oppose the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Louisiana. In many respects, the 27½-percent depletion allowance for oil and gas is the single most flagrant loophole in our entire tax system.

Indeed, I believe that one of the most significant achievements of the taxpayers' revolution this year has been its extraordinary success in focusing the spotlight of public opinion on this special tax preference that is available to the oil and gas industries. For the first time in many years, there is a real likelihood that the cause of reform will prevail, and that this notorious tax loophole will be closed.

For too long we have failed to recognize that the Nation's economy is paying an enormous public subsidy to the petroleum industry. The depletion allowance is a tax subsidy that is far out of line with the economic and tax realities of other industries. The value of 27½ percent for the allowance came into the Revenue Code more than 40 years ago, when a Senate-House conference split the difference between the 30-percent figure proposed by one House and the 25-percent figure proposed by the other. The year was 1927, a time when tax rates were far lower than they are today, and the tax benefits were correspondingly smaller.

Extensive economic studies have shown that the existence of the 27½-percent depletion allowance contributes only a marginal amount to the Nation's petroleum reserves. Instead, it encourages excessive drilling and inefficient production methods, and discourages research into other potential fuel sources. The percentage depletion allowance now causes an annual revenue loss of about $1.5 billion. Yet, as the 1968 Treasury study and the recent CONSAD report make clear, this enormous tax subsidy generates only about $150 million dollars' worth of new oil reserves each year, or about $1 of new reserves for each $10 worth of subsidy. Surely, this is a false economy that none of us would maintain in his own private economic decisions.

The facts surrounding the depletion allowance have been amply demonstrated during the current debate. I am confident that a majority of the Senate will agree that current allowances are excessive, and that the cause of reform will prevail.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, I rise to lend my support to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana.

The 27½-percent oil depletion allowance is justified in the national interest.

In this day of steadily increasing prices, the cost of oil exploration continues to spiral. In recent years, the tremendous costs faced by those in oil exploration has skyrocketed manyfold. Today, these people are facing almost impossible costs in their businesses, and this trend shows no signs of abating in the coming months. Thus, the petroleum industry faces a future of rising costs in its efforts to search for oil.

Mr. President, I maintain that the oil depletion allowance does not cost—it pays. It pays because the petroleum industry is a vital segment of our economy. Without it, America would indeed face an uncertain and unpredictable future.

The effect of the oil depletion allowance has not been to take funds from the national Treasury. But, it has had the reverse effect—to add to our national income. This is brought about because the allowance enables petroleum exploration to continue and the end result is lower prices to the American consumer.

At a time when our country faces an uncertain economic future because of continuing inflation, it is necessary that we do everything in our power to maintain a strong economy in every aspect. In my opinion, the oil depletion allowance is a very important factor in keeping consumer prices in line—not only petroleum prices, but consumer costs in nearly all segments of our economy.

No one denies that oil is essential to the American defense effort. It is used to keep our country strong in times of peace—and it is indispensable in times of world crisis.

The United States cannot depend solely on foreign sources for oil.

This is a lesson we learned in graphic proportions during World War II, when we faced the problems of gas rationing and the threat of the severe crippling of our war effort because of the German submarine fleet's menace to our shipping lanes.

Today we face an even greater threat. The Middle East, day in and day out, stands on the brink of war. These vital oilfields that contribute so much to world production are in danger of being embroiled in a war that we did not want and a war we cannot stop.

The specter of the Soviet Union is an ever-present threat. The Russians are daily increasing their worldwide naval armada and their fleets ride the high seas around the globe. No one can guarantee that we can control the sealanes against the menace of the Russian submarine fleet.

Yes, Mr. President, petroleum is vital to America in many ways.

This Nation's economy depends upon petroleum in plentiful supply. In reality, our livelihood and our standard of living depend largely upon a ready supply of petroleum.

I strongly and vigorously advocate that the Senate meet the challenge today. I think it is in the interest of this country—and it is best for the American people—that we continue the oil depletion allowance in its present form.

It is necessary, I maintain, for the oil industry to continue to furnish a supply of oil for the safety, the protection and the well-being of the American people.

Mr. MONTOYA. Mr. President, I rise in support of Senator ELLENDER'S amendment which would delete the provision in the committee amendment which reduces the oil depletion allowance from 27½ percent under present law to 23 percent.

Mr. President, much has been said during the past few months—and much has been said here today—about the need to reduce the oil depletion allowance in order to symbolically demonstrate to taxpayers of this Nation that this Congress truly meant to provide for tax reform. Somehow, the advocates of tax reform have equivocated tax reform with a reduction in the oil depletion allowance. This is greatly disturbing to me. It is disturbing to me because I, too, have long advocated tax reform. I have been one of those voices calling for a lessening of the tax burden on the low and moderate income wage earners. I, too, have proposed several measures which would help to better distribute the tax burden among rich and poor alike. But, I cannot agree with those of my colleagues who would cut the oil depletion allowance just for the sake of whatever symbolic value such action would produce.

Mr. President, permit me if I may to recount for my colleagues what the oil and gas industry means for my own State of New Mexico and why I oppose any efforts to cut the depletion allowance. In 1968, for example, New Mexico ranked as the sixth largest oil producing State in the Nation, producing 349,000 barrels of oil daily. Also in 1968, New Mexico ranked as the fourth largest gas producing State in the Nation, producing over 3 billion cubic feet per day.

What has this industry meant to my home State of New Mexico? For 1968 it has meant the payment of taxes from the industry to the State of New Mexico in the amount of over $43 million. It has meant nearly $58 million in other revenue to the State of New Mexico for a total revenue of over $101 million. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point a table giving a breakdown of these statistics, as well as additional data.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRODUCTION OF OIL AND GAS IN NEW MEXICO

INTRODUCTION

Production of oil and gas in New Mexico has played a very important part in its economic development for the past 40 years, and will continue to be a major factor for many years to come.

This booklet is for the purpose of helping those who are interested in the future of New Mexico to better understand the oil and gas production business, how it operates, its relative position in the whole energy picture of the world and nation, its internal economics, and its economic meaning to New Mexico.

Better communication of governmental and economic affairs is necessary for the continuing advancement of our society. We, the people of the oil and gas business, are a part of and actively interested in all phases of the social structure and we wish to meet our full responsibility at all times.

The New Mexico Oil and Gas Association was formed more than 40 years ago to play a part in the overall communications picture. It serves as a liaison between the oil and gas producers and all levels of government. The officers and staff of the Association welcome anyone to visit and discuss any matter with us.

What, who is the oil and gas production industry?

The industry is people working and participating in the production of the world's leading energy source which is in the backbone of our modern industrial civilization. There are over 700 oil and gas operators in New Mexico alone. Over 10,000 New Mexico residents are employed in some phase of the industry. There are the royalty owners—that is, those people who own the land from which oil and gas is produced. The State and Federal Governments own the land from which 75% of our oil and gas is produced, so the government is a very real part of the industry. There are innumerable oil company stockholders, many of them living in New Mexico.

Enclosed for your convenience is a copy of the Oil and Gas Map of North America (not printed in RECORD) which shows how New Mexico fits into the big picture. This, together with the New Mexico oil and gas statistical sheets attached will, we hope, help you understand the industry and what New Mexico means to it and what it means to New Mexico.

The rapid advancement of civilization is based mainly on utilization of energy for transportation, power and heat.

Availability of fuels to supply this energy is a paramount consideration in any broad economic study. World energy consumption has doubled in the last 17 years and is expected to double again in the next ten.

Oil is the world's primary fuel with 41% of the market—coal is second with 37% and natural gas is next at 16%.

Known world reserves of what are called "fossil fuels" are sufficient to meet mankind's requirements for generations to come. Coal leads the list, with shale oil, tar sand, oil and natural gas following. However, sufficiency is not enough to guarantee sales. Competitive economic factors determine which kind of fuel will be used.

Other energy sources will enter the picture in the years to come. Atomic energy is most often mentioned but it appears that it will be several years before it fills even one percent of the world's energy needs. Water power to produce electricity is an important feature of the grand proposals to redistribute the earth's fresh water resources. Solar energy, geothermal, and even the energy of the wind may have an important place in the future.

Conventional oil—that is the oil found and produced in a liquid state—now leads as the world energy source; however, these oil reserves do have a limit. There are vast deposits of shale oil and tar sands which are not nearly as easy to recover but as the needs demand, and technology advances, these sources may be tapped.

All things considered, the experts agree that mankind's energy requirements for the foreseeable future can be met, and this is all that can be planned on. We cannot plan or worry about energy a hundred years from now any more than the people of Abraham Lincoln's time could have foreseen or planned energy requirements or sources of today.

Peace and free trade among nations will be important factors in continued economic progress which depends on sea transportation of oil. Highly industrialized Western Europe is heavily dependent on imported petroleum. North America is also an area that consumes more than it produces.

NEW MEXICO OIL AND GAS

New Mexico is an oil and gas exporting state. Approximately 4% of the nation's crude oil and 5½% of the nation's gas is produced in New Mexico.

History

Discovery of good oil and gas pools in Lea and Eddy Counties firmly established the production business in New Mexico by the early thirties. By that time, oil pipelines from the east extended into the State, and El Paso Natural Gas Company was operating a gas line to El Paso, Mexico and Arizona.

Exploration and development of New Mexico's oil and gas resources progressed steadily through about 1957 when a peak was reached. Activity has declined since then, as can be seen on the well drilling table enclosed.

Gross sales value of oi land gas levelled off in about 1961 for a spell, but resumed its normal increase pattern again by 1964. Maintenance of this increase pattern is partly due to the increase in waterflooding secondary recovery operations, and also higher natural gas sales.

From the earlier years, production of New Mexico's oil and gas resources has been done on an orderly, conservation-minded basis. The Oil Conservation Commission was formed in the middle thirties to administer one of the earliest and finest conservation laws in the nation. The Commission controls all phases of the industry. Permission is required to drill a well, to produce oil and gas, and any other action concerning production of oil and gas. Cooperation between the industry and the Commission has always been excellent.

The future of the oil and gas production industry for New Mexico is a matter of opinion. There are those who are pessimistic and say there are no more good pools to be found, that the peak has been reached—it's downhill from here on. They point to the experience of other States, and when they had their peak years—Texas, 1956—Oklahoma, 1927—Kansas, 1956—California, 1953—Pennsylvania 1891.

But we tend to agree with those who are more optimistic. Demand will stay high, waterflooding will increase, new discoveries will be made, prices will improve.

All in all, it seems safe to say that the total dollar volume of New Mexico's oil and gas production will remain level, or maybe a little better than level for at least the next 15–20 years, provided that the economic climate of the State so allows.

OIL AND GAS PRODUCTION ECONOMICS

The first step is to find the oil and gas deposits. Every year, innumerable millions of dollars are spent on geological and geophysical exploration. Some ten thousand exploratory wells are drilled in the United States annually. This is very expensive work, but it together with improved methods of ultimate economical recovery of known sources are the only ways for the producer to replace depleting stocks. Petroleum deposits are the result of geological phenomena which occurred millions of years ago—and they are scarce and scattered on this earth. Even with modern theories and methods, they are very difficult to pin point. Exploration investment is a necessary part of the oil and gas production business.

In the world-wide petroleum source-consumer picture, we observe that the known locations of substantial petroleum deposits are generally far from the concentrated consumer centers, so the oil must be moved great distances to be used. Transportation is a main factor and economic consideration in the petroleum energy business.

The basic factor in oil pricing, of course, is what the consumer market will bear within the general economy and competing energy sources. Therefore, local exploration, production and transportation costs must be held within the general oil price structure and allow a profit margin. The oil operator seeks the areas where his costs will be lowest because he has no control over crude oil prices.

Considering the United States and New Mexico and the above basic oil pricing factors, please observe on the oil and gas map of North America that the two main producing areas of the country are the Gulf Coast and the great arc shaped Mid-Continent producing area extending from Kansas to New Mexico. Most of the oil from the Gulf Coast-Mid-Continent area is transported to consumers in the northeast of the nation. New Mexico's oil fields, obviously are farthest from the eastern consumer area.

Particular elements of oil production costs cannot be meaningfully compared, one area to another, because it is only the total that is meaningful. Depth of the source, distance from market, exploration costs, labor availability and wages, volume of the product, taxation, regulation, and many other segments of cost are all variable and must be considered as a whole. For instance, an oil field located near a huge refining center will have a low transportation cost element and may well be able to carry a higher tax burden than an oil field located several hundred miles away.

Nationwide, field prices for oil have remained practically level for the past ten years. Yet, during this period costs in almost all phases of the business have risen. The producer has had to initiate automation and economize in every way possible to make ends meet.

Many independent oil producers and smaller companies have not been able to maintain a competitive position and have sold their business to the large companies whose volumes enable them to keep unit costs down.

But still, industry-wide, the cost-price squeeze is at a critical point today.

The economic situation of the oil business today is so critical that localized cost factors definitely have an effect on the future of oil and gas exploration and production in any area. Investments for exploration and development will gravitate where combined production costs are lowest, and can be expected with some confidence to stay that way.

Those interested in a continuing prosperous oil and gas production business in New Mexico must keep the basic economic realities explained herein in mind. New Mexico does not have a sufficiently large volume of oil or gas to affect the overall price structure. New Mexico's production costs must be kept down to assure that exploring for and producing oil and gas will continue to be a profitable venture.

There are already economic drawbacks in New Mexico's oil production—specifically: Many of the State's good oil pools have yielded as much oil as can reasonably be pumped from them, so the expensive secondary recovery process of waterflooding is being used to recover as much of the remaining oil as possible. Also, disposal of salt water which is produced with oil is a growing problem—installation of safe water disposal systems is an added cost of production. Taxation has also increased—in 1963 the Oil and Gas Emergency School tax was increased 50%—this increase was absorbed by the producer. The average field price for New Mexico crude oil did not go up with the tax increase.

Participation in New Mexico governmental economy, summary, calendar year 1968

Total sales value, oil and gas	$528,427,160
Less Federal, State and Indian royalty	52,781,279
Industry owned value	475,645,881

TAXES FROM OIL AND GAS PRODUCTION INDUSTRY

Oil and gas emergency school tax	$12,090,386
Oil and gas severance tax	11,853,320
Oil and gas ad valorem tax	6,780,099
Oil and gas conservation tax	663,786
Other ad valorem tax—estimate	5,750,000
Other excise tax—estimate	6,250,000
Total	43,387,591

These taxes amount to 9.1% of Industry owned value.

OTHER REVENUE FROM OIL AND GAS

State oil and gas lease rental and bonus	6,078,678
State oil and gas royalty	26,339,817
Permanent fund earnings, oil and gas portion (97%)	15,213,198
Federal mineral leasing return, oil and gas portion	10,201,438
Total	57,833,131
Total taxes and other revenue	101,220,722

NOTE.—The above items are detailed in the following paragraphs.

PARTICIPATION IN NEW MEXICO GOVERNMENTAL ECONOMY

In calendar year 1968, total New Mexico crude oil and natural gas sales at the wellhead amounted to over $528 million. Of this figure, $376 million was for oil and $152 million for gas. This is big business. It amounts to about $1.4 million gross sales per day.

In addition to this, over $80 million was spent last year in New Mexico just drilling wells, plus untold millions in pipeline and other construction, and related business. Some ten thousand employees in New Mexico work in some phase of oil and gas production, processing and transportation, for an annual payroll of more than $60 million.

How does the Government of New Mexico share in this money? What is the direct financial benefit to the State of New Mexico, the schools, counties and municipalities? The direct financial benefits come in two categories: 1. Public land oil and gas leases. 2. Taxation.

Public land oil and gas leases

State lands, general: During territorial times, and upon statehood, Congress granted four sections of each township in New Mexico to the State's Common Schools, plus specific acreage to the universities and other institutions. These lands, (over 11 million acres) are held in trust by the Commissioner of Public Lands, and administered by him. Any income from these lands is credited to the "beneficiary" i.e., the Common Schools, or State Institutions. Recurring income, like rental, is credited to the current funds of the beneficiaries. Non-recurring income, sales or royalties is credited to the permanent Fund, which is invested by the State Investment Council and only the earnings on these investments are transferred to the current funds of the beneficiaries. For a detailed explanation of New Mexico's beneficiary lands, see the Annual Report of the Commissioner of Public Lands, 1967–1968.

The largest source of income from State Lands has been from oil and gas. The State Land Office offers oil and gas leases monthly for competitive bid. The competitive bid is called a "bonus". After the initial bonus payment to the State, a fixed rental sum is paid annually.

State oil and gas lease bonuses and rentals: These monies are paid by the lessee direct to the State Land Office and transferred to the beneficiaries for current use. In 1968 receipts from this source amounted to $6,078,678.

State oil and gas royalties: Approximately 40% of the oil and gas production in New Mexico is from State oil and gas leases. The State's one-eighth share of this production is paid directly to the State in cash—one-eighth of the sales value. These receipts are not for current use but are deposited to in the State Permanent Fund where they can never be diminished. In 1968, these State oil and gas royalty payments amounted to $26,339,817.

State Permanent Fund: This fund, which belongs to the beneficiary schools and institutions, now amounts to about a third of a billion dollars, 97% of which came from oil and gas royalties. The State Investment Council invests these funds, and the earnings from the investments are credited to the beneficiaries for current expenses. This fund assures a good, steady source of income for the schools and institutions forever. Last year, the oil and gas portion of these earnings was $15,213,198.

Federal Lands: Approximately 36% of the oil and gas production in New Mexico is produced from lands owned by the United States. The Federal Government receives its one-eighth share of the sales value of oil and gas in cash in addition to lease rentals. The Federal law provides 37½% of these monies to be transferred to the State. The money is used for public schools, free textbooks, and $100,000 per year for the New Mexico Institute of Mining and Technology. In 1968, receipts from this source are calculated at $10,201,438.

Taxation

There are four production taxes paid on the full sales value of all oil and gas not owned by the State or Federal Government (one-eighth royalty on State and Federal leases). The only deduction allowed is the cost of trucking oil from an isolated area. This trucking deduction encourages production, sales and resulting royalties and taxes as soon as possible after drilling a productive well.

The taxes on production are collected by the Oil and Gas Accounting Commission. New Mexico has a modern, efficient system of collecting oil and gas taxes and State Royalty. The laws on all taxes applying to production are uniform. They are all reported and paid, along with State Royalty, on one form monthly to the Oil and Gas Accounting Commission. This system is so efficient that tax collection and administration costs are less than ½ of one percent of receipts. The four production taxes are explained as follows:

Oil and Gas Emergency School Tax rate is 2.55% of full value. Proceeds are deposited in the State General Fund. Collections during 1968 were $12,090,386.

Oil and gas severance tax rate is 2.5% of full value. This money is used partly to pay severance tax bonds for public works, the balance to the general fund. Receipts during 1968 were $11,853,320.

Oil and gas ad valorem tax is shared by the State, counties and school districts. Oil and gas production is placed on the tax roll at 50% of its wellhead sales value. The local levy rate, which varies in each taxing district is applied. 1968 tax payments totaled $6,780,099.

Oil and gas conservation tax is used to support the Oil Conservation Commission which regulates all phases of the production of New Mexico's oil and gas resources. The rate is 14/100% of full value. During 1968 it brought in $663,786.

Other taxes of a direct nature on the oil and gas production business are impossible to figure exactly but estimates are shown below:

Ad valorem taxes paid on all pipelines, oil and gas wells, equipment, tanks, pumps, building materials and supply inventories, refineries, processing plants, buildings, and other corporate and locally assessed properties. At least $5,750,000.

State excise taxes on the general business of the industry—gross receipts and compensating tax on purchases and contracts for exploration, drilling, construction, field services, legal fees, engineering, and oil and gas manufacturer's privilege tax. At least $6,250,000.

[From the Oil & Gas Journal, Apr. 8, 1968]

U.S. RESERVES WILL CONTINUE TO MELT AWAY—UNLESS

Implications of the latest API report on this nation's hydrocarbon reserves are grim but clear. Demand for crude oil and natural gas gradually is creeping up on the domestic industry's ability to supply them.

It is important that this message comes through loud and clear to that group of economists and politicians which contends that the oil industry operates from an economic sanctuary.

The figures, detailed beginning on Page 34 of this issue of the Journal, mean that at present rates of use, known oil reserves will last for 10.3 years. This is a drop from 11.1 years for this ratio since last year. The figure for natural gas is 15.9 years against 16.4 a year ago.

None, of course, contends that this country will run out of oil in 10 years or natural gas in 16. More oil and gas will be discovered. Development drilling plus new or improved technology will allow the industry to produce more than currently figured from fields already discovered.

Under present trends, however, the expected discoveries won't radically change the picture. The new supply will be gobbled up by the steady and substantial growth in demand. Only a dramatic turnaround in exploration will give the nation a larger margin of safety in reserves.

The current low state of domestic exploration offers slight hope of any early turnaround.

Figures again tell that story quickly. Active rotary rigs in the U.S. slightly exceeded 1,000 in late March. Average for rigs working in 1967 was 1,134 units. This is less than half of the 2,429 working 10 years ago.

Reason for this inactivity is plain. Operators are just drilling less. Only 33,558 wells were completed in 1967 against 55,024 in 1957. And well completions are headed still lower in the first quarter of this year.

The domestic industry must start drilling at a much higher rate if it is to find the new reserves needed for the nation's security.

What's the answer? Operators simply need more incentives to take the risks of hunting for oil in a country where oil is tougher to find. Several factors would help provide these incentives. Among them:

Higher prices. Average price for crude last year was $2.91/bbl against $3.09 a decade ago. Gas prices are under tight controls. Cost of everything the producer buys has gone up but his prices have not.

Chance to produce at rates that will provide the operator a quicker payout on his initial investment.

Preservation of such incentives as percentage depletion, expensing of certain exploration costs, and stable controls on crude imports.

Unless incentives for drilling are maintained and increased, domestic reserves will continue to melt under the pressure of demand. That's the message the industry must get across to friends and critics alike.

Mr. MONTOYA. Mr. President, in New Mexico, where we have a meager tax base every tax dollar counts. This is especially true when it comes to the financing of our children's education. We have in New Mexico what we refer to as the permanent fund. This fund is presently approaching $365 million and is growing at the rate of $2.5 million each month, according to the New Mexico State Investment Council. Over 95 percent of the fund is derived from oil and gas royalties produced on State-owned lands. Of the earnings from the permanent fund, the schools of New Mexico receive approximately 80 percent. Thus, every dollar contributed by the oil and gas industry in New Mexico represents funds that the citizens of New Mexico will not have to pay by way of taxes to support the schools of our State. And we all know about the financial crisis that our schools find themselves in these days. To take away this one source of operating capital from our State's schools would mean a further deterioration of the quality of education our children would receive or an added tax burden for our citizens.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a letter I received from the New Mexico State Investment Council, dated May 12, 1969, bringing these details to my attention.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE INVESTMENT COUNCIL,
Santa Fe, N. Mex., May 12, 1969.

Hon. JOSEPH M. MONTOYA,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR JOE: The State Investment Council of New Mexico, trustees of the Permanent Fund, believes the current attack on the federal tax structure applicable to oil and gas production is not justified on the basis of the industry's contributions to New Mexico and the nation.

The Permanent Fund of New Mexico is approaching $365 million and is growing at the rate of $2.5 million each month. More than 95 percent of the Fund is derived from oil and gas royalties produced on State-owned lands. The Common Schools of New Mexico receive about 80 percent of the earnings from the Permanent Fund. Nineteen other institutions or agencies receive the 20 percent balance. In this period of increased tax pressures, it is important to remember that every dollar earned by our Permanent Fund represents $1.00 less which must be raised by New Mexico taxpayers.

At a time when many major oil companies are turning away from New Mexico and spending exploration dollars in Alaska, in offshore and in foreign countries, the Council submits that it would be inadvisable to disturb a tax structure of 40 years standing and thereby discourage the future development of New Mexico's dwindling and sometimes marginal deposits of oil and gas.

At its regular meeting on May 9, the State Investment Council authorized me to ask you to diligently resist proposed changes in the tax laws affecting the oil and gas industry. These laws, especially in the area of the 27½ percent depletion and the intangible write off provision, have encouraged a vigorous oil and gas industry in New Mexico and elsewhere in the nation. They need to be preserved.

Enclosed is a copy of an Analysis Of The Relationship Of The Permanent Fund To The General Finances Of The State which I recently prepared for the Investment Council. Information on page 5 of this report shows the importance of a vigorous oil and gas industry in New Mexico.

Respectfully,

ED HARTMAN,
Chairman, Investment Council.

Mr. MONTOYA. Mr. President, for the above reasons, Mr. President, I support the amendment being offered by my good friend from Louisiana, Senator ELLENDER, that would maintain the oil depletion allowance at the present 27½ percent.

I am for tax reform, Mr. President, but I do not agree that a cut in the depletion allowance would be in the best interests of our national security and national interests when all things are balanced out. Rather, I would propose that we reduce Federal expenditures in order to offset tax losses that will come as a result of other tax reforms. For example, let us cut the billions of dollars that might be appropriated for an unproven ABM system. Let us bring an end to the conflict in Vietnam and make expenditure reductions there. Let us make our Federal structure a more efficient one and abolish overlapping jurisdiction among Federal agencies and thus abolish waste. There are so many obvious areas where reductions can be made Mr. President, without doing harm to an industry that contributed so much to States such as New Mexico and thus to the welfare of this country.

I urge my colleagues to support the Ellender amendment.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

All time having expired, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ALLOTT. Will the Chair please state the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. ALLOTT. And a "yea" vote is for the retention of the 27.5 percent depletion allowance?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. GRAVEL (after having voted in the affirmative). On this vote I have a pair with the Senator from Missouri (Mr. SYMINGTON). If he were present and voting, he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea." I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. KENNEDY. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS), and the Senator from Missouri (Mr. SYMINGTON) are necessarily absent.

On this vote, the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. ANDERSON) is paired with the Senator from Illinois (Mr. SMITH). If present and voting, the Senator from New Mexico would vote "yea," and the Senator from Illinois would vote "nay."

Mr. GRIFFIN. I announce that the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) and the Senators from Illinois (Mr. PERCY and Mr. SMITH) are necessarily absent.

The Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MUNDT) is absent because of illness.

If present and voting, the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MUNDT) and the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY) would each vote "nay."

On this vote, the Senator from Illinois (Mr. SMITH) is paired with the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. ANDERSON). If present and voting, the Senator from Illinois would vote "nay," and the Senator from New Mexico would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 62, as follows:

AMENDMENT NO. 291

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will now turn to the consideration of amendment No. 291 offered by the Senator from Delaware (Mr. WILLIAMS). Under the previous agreement, the time of 1 hour is to be equally divided.

The clerk will state the amendment.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 335, line 10 of the committee amendment strike out "23 percent" and insert "20 percent".

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask that all staff personnel be asked to take seats or to leave the Chamber.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, a point of order. Attachés are standing around. Does the Senator from West Virginia mean that his request will be in order all afternoon?

I ask that the Chamber be cleared of all clerical personnel for the remainder of the day.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I must object to that request. I do not know precisely who is on the floor but I would venture the assertion that there is not one Member in the Chamber, including me, who can tell everybody everything contained in this 500-page bill. We are more in need of technical assistance on this bill than on any other bill that will come before the Senate this year.

Some Senators have some of their committee assistants here. They are very much needed to help on this matter because they have expertise in this field beyond that which Senators have. We must have help from the joint committee as well as our staff committee. I have one assistant here. However, any Senator who has an amendment which he regards important might very well need assistance which the rules intended when they state a Senator can have his assistant here.

I do not know of anyone from the committee staff or the joint committee who is on the floor and who is not needed. I would assume that any Senator who has an assistant here has him here because he is needed. If the assistant of any Senator is here merely because he wants to see what is going on or to observe, I do wish he would take a seat in the gallery.

We have an unusually large number of assistants here because they are needed. I believe that most conversation has not been by staff members but by Senators, and in most cases I am sure it has been because Senators said something to them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the responsibility of the Chair to maintain decorum in the Chamber. All staff personnel not immediately needed will leave the Chamber and those who are needed may remain. This policy will be observed for the remainder of the day.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, of course, any assistants of the chairman of the Committee on Finance who is handling the bill and any assistants from his committee that he feels should be on the floor would be excepted. Of course, I did not mean to include them in my request. All assistants who are here out of curiosity should be seated or leave the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, for the information of the Senate, the pending amendment is offered on behalf of the Senator from Vermont (Mr. AIKEN), the Senator from Maine (Mrs. SMITH), the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE), and myself. The purpose of the amendment is to strike from the committee bill the 23-percent depletion allowance and to go back to the House figure, which is 20 percent. The House of Representatives cut the depletion allowance from 27.5 percent to 20 percent and by so doing, raised revenue by about $400 million.

The same argument made for defeat of the Ellender amendment could be made in support of this amendment. Personally, I see no need to repeat all of the argument, and therefore I shall withhold the remainder of my time. Perhaps we can proceed to vote quickly.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, will the Senator from Delaware yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, I strongly support the pending amendment. Meaningful income tax reform is of the utmost necessity. Of course, that means plugging tax loopholes such as the notorious oil depletion allowance of 27.5 percent, which was enacted many years ago.

Mr. President, 20 years ago, as a member of the taxwriting Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, I remember distinctly that we were debating in committee a proposed reduction of the oil depletion allowance. That was 20 years ago, when the average family in this country was not so heavily burdened with income taxes as it is at the present time. At that time, Jere Cooper, a Representative from Tennessee, who was later chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and one of the most outstanding Members of Congress of that day, proposed to reduce the 27.5 percent oil depletion allowance to 20 percent.

I was one of the minority on the committee who joined with him in that proposal and voted in committee to reduce the 27½ percent depletion allowance on oil and gas production. Our efforts in committee failed. A Democratic colleague on the Ways and Means Committee who opposed us—I recall distinctly that he was from the State of California—at at time stated, in denouncing our proposal, that there would be a man on the moon before the committee would vote to cut that depletion allowance.

Well, Mr. President, 2 days after Neil Armstrong walked on the moon, the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives recommended reducing the oil depletion allowance from 27½ to 20 percent.

Very definitely, Mr. President, I believe that the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware is a much-needed amendment and should be carried today. The oil depletion allowance would then be reduced to 20 percent. Personally, as a Member of this body several years ago, I voted to reduce the oil depletion allowance to 15 percent, which I still believe to be a more realistic figure.

Very definitely, the thing for us to do today is to adopt the pending amendment and then place this section of the tax reform bill back in the same form in which it came to us from the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, what we need in this country today is real tax reform. It happens that as an owner of some thousands of shares of stock in Atlantic Richfield Oil Co., Tenneco, Inc., Occidental Oil, Continental Oil, and other oil producing companies, I am in a position to know that in one recent year, at a time when American families with incomes of from $4,000 to $12,000 a year were bearing a tremendously heavy tax burden, an oil company, of which I am a stockholder paid no income taxes whatever.

The Atlantic Richfield Co. is one of the great oil producing companies in America. It paid approximately 6 percent of its net earnings to the Federal Government in income taxes in 1967.

Like other owners of oil stocks, almost invariably, especially in recent months, my stock dividend was accompanied with an admonition and an urgent request to write my Congressman and tell him to retain the 27.5-percent oil depletion allowance.

Well, Mr. President, I am not about to do that. I am going to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Delaware. I hope that the majority of Senators will also vote in favor of this meritorious and much-needed amendment.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, will the Senator from Delaware yield to me for the purpose of asking him a few questions?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I yield.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Let me say first, that I do not believe there is another Senator in this Chamber who is more aware of the intricacies of this complicated bill than the distinguished Senator from Delaware (Mr. WILLIAMS).

I would be willing to state that almost any bill or amendment recommended by him would probably be as fair as any tax bill that this body could come up with on final passage.

It seems to me that we have a reform tax bill with one tax loophole in it which has become the symbol of all tax loopholes; namely, the oil depletion allowance; is that not correct?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. That is correct. That was the reason the House made it No. 1 on their agenda with which to deal. I think they dealt with it fairly when they reduced the rate to 20 percent.

Mr. RIBICOFF. No matter what we come up with finally, if we do not make a substantial reduction in the oil depletion allowance, so far as the American public is concerned, the Finance Committee and this Congress will really not have acted on tax reform; is that not correct?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. There is no question about it. Former Secretary of the Treasury Barr pointed out that there were a number of people with sizable incomes in excess of $200,000 who paid no income taxes whatever. I think there were 21 of them with incomes in excess of $1 million who paid no tax. Many of them were escaping taxes through the particular provision of law, which allowed the 27½ percent depletion for oil and gas.

Unless Congress does deal with this rate the oil industry will not be paying its proportionate part of the taxes.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Last year, the Treasury Department authorized what is called the Consad study. That study claims that oil depletion and other related loopholes constitute a substantial subsidy to the oil industry. When one studies that study, "substantial" is hardly the word, because the study indicates that the subsidy to the oil industry amounts to $1½ billion to $2 billion annually. Is that correct?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. That is correct as to the depletion allowance, yes.

Mr. RIBICOFF. I wonder if the Senator from Delaware would verify some statistics I have noted. Without the surtax the corporate tax rate is 48 percent, is it not?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. That is correct.

Mr. RIBICOFF. But am I not correct in stating that the petroleum industry has an effective tax rate of 21.1 percent?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Yes. As to many companies, the rate drops as low as 8 percent.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Along that line, one of the most interesting studies has been made by the knowledgeable Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE). I should like to list his statistics, which I have checked. They show that Atlantic Richfield paid no income taxes from 1964 to 1967 on earnings of around $467 million.

Consider other top-flight companies. In 1967 Standard Oil of California paid 1.2 percent; Texaco, 1.9 percent; Mobil, 4.5 percent; Gulf, 7.8 percent; and Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, 7.9 percent of net income.

When we consider that the statistics indicate that the overall industry average in the United States was 37.5 percent, it means that American industry of all kinds is taking on the burden of supporting the great expenditures made by the Government of the country, but the oil industry certainly is not bearing its fair share.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. That is the point I was making earlier today. The oil industry is a respected industry. It is an industry that is essential to our economy, but we have many other equally essential industries. With the corporate tax rate having moved from about 14 percent 40 years ago to 52.8 percent and the individual tax rate having advanced from 15 percent to 77 percent, in the last 44 years an oil depletion rate of 27½ percent means that the oil industry is not paying its proportionate part of the cost of operating the Government under today's conditions. I should think the oil industry would be well-advised to support the proposal we have before us now so that it could be removed from the criticism that it is not paying its share.

This is not punitive legislation. It is introduced only for the purpose of creating some equity in our tax structure, so as to distribute the tax load in order that the oil industry may pay its proportionate part.

Mr. RIBICOFF. The Internal Revenue Service says that, on the average, 97 percent of corporate net income is taxable. However, the petroleum industry is taxed on only 48 percent of its net income. In fact, the depletion allowance alone accounts for seven-eighths of this reduction, is that true?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. That is correct.

Mr. RIBICOFF. I wish to ask the Senator from Delaware if it is not true that this depletion allowance allows a company to write off the cost of a producing well on the average of between 10 and 20 times.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. There is no limit to the number of times the cost of a well can be recovered. If it costs $120,000 and the company has an annual production income of $1 million the company would get a tax credit of $275,000 year after year. It is true that some of the wells are dry holes, but the companies are allowed to write them off, and that, too, is a deduction. So we are not talking about a case of allowing the companies to write off exploration costs, nor are we proposing to close off writing off the cost of drilling a well; but I do not see why an oil company should be permitted to write it off 15 or 20 times.

Mr. RIBICOFF. It has been pointed out that the action by the Finance Committee will add $175 million to overall revenues. I wonder if the Senator from Delaware would inform the Senator from Connecticut as to the additional amount that would be added to our revenues if the 20 percent depletion allowance were adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. About $170 million more—that is by reducing the rate from 23 to 20 percent.

Mr. RIBICOFF. In other words, is it fair to expect the oil industry to make this small contribution to the overall burden of operating the Government of the United States?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I think the oil industry, with its large earnings, can certainly pay these additional taxes without being disrupted at all. Certainly it is going to mean higher taxes for the industry. When we speak of tax reform—and we have all been speaking of it—we must remember that tax reform means raising taxes for some particular group that has not been paying its proportionate part. We cannot escape that fact. There are going to be some higher taxes for the oil industry. That is true of every other feature of this bill, whether it is the banking industry, foundations, capital gains, or whatever else is spoken of in this bill. When we correct an inequity in the law we are changing it to produce additional revenue.

In all these areas the committee bill proposes to raise $6 billion annually. Certainly the $400 million proposed in this particular section for the oil industry is not at all unreasonable from an industry that is as prosperous as this particular industry is.

The American people expect us to deal with this subject. I hope the amendment will be approved.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, may I conclude with this comment? I do not know what the result of the vote will be. In my 7 years on the Finance Committee, I have been filled with admiration for the consistent fight that the distinguished Senator from Delaware and the distinguished Senator from Tennessee have made at each opportunity to try to close this loophole.

As one studies the whole problem of taxes, however, I am convinced that without major reform in the oil depletion allowance, not only the Senate, but the oil industry itself, will be doing itself inestimable harm. My prediction is that unless there is substantial reform of this major loophole, the oil industry will become a political football. The oil industry will stand naked as the one industry that has received special treatment by the Congress of the United States.

When we try to close some of the loopholes in the present tax bill, it is my belief that the Finance Committee has treated most generously, of all the industries, the oil industry.

We have the symbol of tax loopholes right here before us. To try to close this loophole even partially, by providing a depletion allowance of 20 percent, still leaves the oil industry with a very substantial bonanza. I believe the Senator from Delaware is being more than fair in trying to reduce the oil depletion allowance to 20 percent, which still leaves the oil industry with a substantial boon and windfall.

The amendment of the Senator from Delaware deserves support. I shall vote for it. I hope a majority of the Senate will support the fight of the Senator from Delaware.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. McGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield briefly to me?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. McGEE. Mr. President, I had something to say extensively earlier today on the oil depletion question. I strongly oppose the pending amendment.

Mr. President, the point has been made here today that the oil and gas industry will suffer a reduction in its depletion allowance. The industry, and those States such as Wyoming which are highly dependent upon it, are going to have to live with this decision. It will cost them, as I am sure it will end up costing the American people in more ways than one. But let us not compound the effect by going any further along this course. The Finance Committee, in its wisdom, recommended a depletion allowance of 23 percent instead of 27.5 percent, which I had hoped to maintain.

To go beyond the committee recommendation would be an error. It would not gravely injure the largest companies, the biggest operators, maybe, but it would do grievous harm to the independent companies of relatively small means and to the operators who produce about 16 percent of the U.S. crude output from stripper wells.

The House has voted a depletion allowance of only 20 percent. So the matter is going to be considered further, no matter what we do here today. The Senate has voted once today to stand behind the Finance Committee, and I would suggest that we now do so again.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the vote on keeping the depletion allowance at 27½ percent was close in the committee. But that was not the case with respect to the proposal to place the depletion allowance at 20 percent with respect to oil companies. The vote was rather overwhelmingly opposed to that.

The reason for the overwhelming rejection was that the committee felt that this mineral, being a strategic mineral, could well be placed in the category of other minerals in section 613 of the Internal Revenue Code. Under that section there are listed, at 23 percent, silver, uranium, manganese, mercury, nickel, platinum, zinc, and others, 39 in number, which are regarded as being strategic minerals and which, it was felt in years gone by, were not as strategic and essential to this country as oil, being the fuel needed to move all our economy in wartime and in peace.

A chart which I have had prepared is at the rear of the Chamber. It shows in red what the profits of the petroleum industry have been since 1960, on an investment basis. That completely disallows depletion and all other costs. It is simply based on how much is made in an industry. It shows that the petroleum industry is no more profitable on an average than all others in this country.

Reference was made to other industries carrying a much heavier tax burden than the oil industry. I ask that the chart to which I have just referred be removed, and that the other chart be shown.

Mr. President, the chart gives an indication of whether other industries are supporting the petroleum industry or not. The computation shows how much, on a per dollar of gross revenue basis, the petroleum industry pays in taxes in relation to mining and manufacturing and all business corporations.

The fact is that while the oil industry is a relatively low-tax payer with regard to Federal income tax, on other taxes the oil industry is a high-tax payer, particularly taxes at the State and local level. Production taxes, revenue taxes, and property taxes on this industry are much higher than on others, particularly since this industry has difficulty locating in places where taxes are low. The wells must be located where the oil may be found, and the refineries where conditions are favorable for the refining of oil.

That does not include the excise tax on the product, which is about a 50-percent tax on the product itself. So this product, at the consumer level, is the most heavily taxed product there is in the American economy, with the exception of cigarettes and alcohol, both of which have an adverse connotation either with regard to health or in some other respect.

It might be well to see how this industry has managed to bear these taxes, which are heavier than for any other, considering how the price of this product actually compares with that of others. I ask that the aides turn over to the next chart.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, will the distinguished chairman yield for a question before the chart is changed?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Would the staff please put the last chart back on the stand?

I wonder if the distinguished chairman would inform the Senate where the figure in the third column, the 6.03, comes from. I have difficulty determining where that figure comes from.

Mr. LONG. I have here, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD, excerpts from a study showing the amounts of taxes that are paid in production taxes, property taxes, and State income taxes, industry by industry, relating that to the revenues of those industries.

There being no objection, the compilation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Tax Burden on the Domestic Oil and Gas Industry, 1964–66, by the Petroleum, Industry Research Foundation, Inc.]

DETERMINATION OF THE TAX BURDEN

In order to ascertain the tax burden on the domestic oil and gas industry we had to develop two sets of data, neither of which is readily available from official sources: the industry's total gross domestic revenues and its total tax payments by type of tax. To obtain the revenue data we had to seek special cooperation from the oil industry, since most companies publish only world-wide gross revenue data which in a number of cases vary considerably from domestic revenues. We obtained the cooperation of twenty-seven large companies which together account for nearly 65% of total domestic crude oil production, 85% of domestic refining operations and over 80% of U.S. foreign oil revenues. At our request these companies reported their revenues by foreign and domestic source to the Tulsa office of the international public accounting firm, Arthur Young & Company. This was done in order to maintain the confidentiality of each reporting company's figures. Arthur Young & Company submitted to us and composite summary of the twenty-seven companies' foreign and domestic revenues. This composite figure was used in our computation of the oil industry's domestic tax burden, as described below.

The required tax data was obtained from the 10–K forms which publicly owned corporations are required to file annually with the Securities and Exchange Commission. We collected this data for the same twenty-seven companies for which we had received the composite gross domestic revenue data.

For comparative purposes we obtained similar data on gross revenues and total tax payments for all U.S. mining and manufacturing corporations and for all U.S. business corporations (excluding oil in both cases) from the Internal Revenue Service publication, Statistics of Income—Corporate Income Tax Returns for the Fiscal Years 1963–64 and 1964–65.

To measure the relative tax burden on oil and on other industries we computed ratios of total domestic tax payments to total domestic gross revenue. The use of this particular ratio avoids the problems of comparability normally encountered when comparing one industry with another. The concept of gross revenues differs less from industry to industry than that of net income or other bases. The relating of taxes to gross revenues rather than net income (before income tax) permits us to ignore the inter-industrial differences in the treatment of inventories and depreciation which have a varying impact on net income. The use of gross revenues therefore provides the most reliable yardstick available to measure the tax burden on a comparable inter-industry basis.

All types of domestic taxes—federal, state and local (with the exception of excise and sales taxes which are treated separately)—were taken into account in computing our tax burden. These taxes were considered collectively on the assumption that regardless of whether, when and to what extent they are shifted forward in the form of higher prices or backward in the form of lower royalties or other payments, initially they represent a burden on the tax paying firm, much like any other cost item.

Thus, our procedure ignores the question of the ultimate incidence of the tax—what part is shifted by the initial tax payer and to whom it is shifted. This omission is deliberate in view of the very limited and contradictory knowledge in economic theory of the incidence of tax shifting. For our purposes we may assume that while business firms generally attempt to shift all taxes—primarily by incorporating them in their prices—companies are invariably restricted in this endeavor by competitive factors as well as the response of consumers to price changes. Furthermore, tax shifting depends in part also on the type of tax paid. For instance, unit taxes are more easily shifted than income taxes. Since, as we shall see, unit taxes tend to play a relatively larger part and income taxes a correspondingly smaller part in the oil industry than in other industries, the degree of shifting may possibly be somewhat larger in the oil industry than in U.S. industry in general. However, we have no statistical or other factual evidence of this behavior.

FINDINGS OF THIS STUDY

The total domestic tax payments of the twenty-seven U.S. oil companies listed in Appendix, page 32, amounted to $1.92 billion in 1966, $1.57 billion in 1965 and $1.31 billion in 1964, as the following table indicates.

TABLE 1.—DOMESTIC TAXES OF THE 27 PETROLEUM COMPANIES

[In millions of dollars]

Taxes	1966	1965	1964
Federal income	658	433	263
State income	58	46	34
Severance and production	354	331	297
Property and ad valorem	433	398	354
Payroll	185	141	133
Pipeline [1]	41	50	45
Miscellaneous	193	174	183
Total	1,922	1,573	1,309

[1] Only the taxes and revenues of the pipeline companies owned by but not consolidated on the income statements of these 27 oil companies were included.

When we expand the domestic tax payments of these twenty-seven companies to the entire oil industry on the basis of the companies composite share in total U.S. crude oil production and refinery runs, we arrive at the following estimates:

DOMESTIC TAXES OF THE U.S. OIL AND GAS INDUSTRY

[In millions of dollars]

	1966	1965	1964
Federal income taxes	775	510	310
All other taxes (except excise and sales)	1,685	1,520	1,445
Total domestic tax payments	2,460	2,030	1,725

As can be seen, federal income taxes have taken an increasingly larger share of the oil industry's total tax payments. In 1964 federal income tax payments of the twenty-seven companies amounted to 20% of their total tax payments; in 1965 and again in 1966 the share of federal income taxes increased to 27% and 34% respectively.

TABLE II.—SHARE OF DOMESTIC OIL COMPANY TAXES, 27 COMPANIES

[In percent]

Taxes	1966	1965	1964
Federal income	34.2	27.5	20.1
State income	3.0	2.9	2.6
Severance and production	18.4	21.1	22.7
Property and ad valorem	22.6	25.3	27.1
Payroll	9.6	9.0	10.1
Pipeline	2.1	3.2	3.4
Miscellaneous	10.1	11.0	14.0
Total	100.0	100.0	100.0

The distribution of taxes in the petroleum industry, as shown in Table II, differs distinctly from that of U.S. industry in general. Approximately half of the total U.S. corporate tax payments and nearly 60% of the total tax payments of U.S. mining and manufacturing industries were federal income tax payments for the fiscal periods 1964 and 1965, compared with the aforementioned 20% and 27% for our twenty-seven major oil companies. It is this relatively lower effective federal income tax rate in the petroleum sector than in U.S. industry in general that has given rise to the question of the equity of the oil industry's tax burden. However, as was pointed out, all taxes initially are a burden on the tax payer. Hence, the fact that taxes paid to state and local authorities are proportionately larger for the oil industry than for other industry cannot be ignored in answering the question about the industry's tax equity.

The bulk of these other taxes was levied on the production of oil and gas in the form of severance and production taxes, mainly at the state level, and local taxes, consisting mainly of property taxes levied by communities and counties on oil refineries, terminals, bulk plants, inventories as well as on oil and gas deposits in the ground. In fact, severance, production and property taxes have accounted for nearly 46% of the total tax payments of the twenty-seven oil companies for the three-year period. This places the oil industry among the largest industrial tax payers on the state and local level.

The difference in the tax distribution pattern between oil and other industries is due to a number of special factors, including two provisions in the federal income tax statutes applicable to mineral industries only, namely percentage depletion and the treatment of intangible drilling and development expenditures. Percentage depletion is designed to enable oil and gas producers to recover the value of their depleting deposits by allowing a deduction up to 27.5% of the gross value of production (restricted by the 50% net income limitation); producers also have the option of either capitalizing or writing off immediately the bulk of their drilling expenditures.

Both these factors tend to reduce the petroleum industry's federal income tax burden as defined in this study. However, they apply only to the producing sector of the industry. It is this sector which also bears most of the industry's severance, production and property taxes. Therefore, a determination of whether the petroleum industry pays an equitable* share of taxes must take into account these other taxes too. Having determined the total domestic tax payments of the twenty-seven companies, we can now proceed to establish their tax burden by relating the tax payments to the companies' overall economic performance, or, more precisely, by computing a ratio between tax payments and gross revenues, as shown in Table III.

*The term "equitable" is used in this context to imply an equal total tax burden for all businesses in relation to their economic performance.

TABLE III—THE DOMESTIC TAX BURDEN—27 MAJOR OIL COMPANIES

[Dollars in millions]

	1966	1965	1964
Domestic gross revenues	$31,885	$29,957	$27,130
Total domestic taxes	$1,922	$1,573	$1,309
Tax burden: tax/revenue ratio (percent)	6.03	5.43	4.82

Includes the nonconsolidated pipeline revenues and taxes of these 27 companies.

Thus, in 1966 for each dollar of domestic revenue these twenty-seven companies paid out 6.03¢ in domestic taxes. The average for the three-year period 1964–66 was 5.5¢ per dollar of revenue (exclusive of excise and sales taxes). Of interest is the steady increase in the tax burden during the three years. The principal reason for this is the increase in federal taxes, as shown in Tables I and II. These taxes have increased much more rapidly than domestic gross revenues.

Our final step in seeking to determine the equity of the oil industry's tax burden is to compare it with the tax burden on all mining and manufacturing corporations* and on all business corporations* in general. Since the data for the fiscal period 1965/1966 is not yet available in workable form from the Internal Revenue Service, our computations will be restricted to the fiscal periods 1963/64 and 1964/65. This corresponds approximately to our petroleum industry for the years 1964 and 1965.

Mr. RIBICOFF. But this is not the burden of Federal taxation. The Senator is taking into account the tax burden levied by a municipality or a State for property taxes, or whatever other taxes there are, but there is no indication of what the Federal income tax burden might be in relation to earnings, in comparison with any other industry in this Nation.

Mr. LONG. This relates the tax the industry pays both the State and local governments on production or property taxes, as well as the income tax it pays the Federal Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COOK in the chair). The Senator's 5 minutes have expired.

Mr. LONG. I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

This does not include the burden that the product bears, on the product itself—the excise tax—which, as I say, is the highest of any product. It is a 50-percent tax, roughly, at the pump, which is higher than the taxes on anything except alcohol and tobacco.

So when one talks about an industry carrying its fair share, this industry carries a heavier overall tax burden, if you add its property taxes, its production taxes, on the State and local level, and its Federal income tax—than the average for mining and manufacturing and other corporate business. I shall be happy to provide for the RECORD the figures which I supplied on May 16 on this issue.

I ask unanimous consent to include a tabulation from that speech in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

*Exclusive of petroleum as well as other industries—For details see Appendix, page 23.

Mr. RIBICOFF. What confuses me is the fact that in 1965, the latest figure available, I note Federal income taxes, as a percentage of net income, were 37.5 percent for all industry, and 21.1 percent for petroleum. So, basically, it becomes very obvious that when it comes as a percentage of net income, the petroleum industry is nowhere near the national average, which causes great confusion, because here we are talking about Federal income taxes. We are trying to reform our income tax laws, and yet we have this question of the petroleum industry carrying this large burden of State and local taxes. But certainly, when it comes to the Federal Government, they are not carrying anywhere near the burden of taxes that other American industries are carrying.

Mr. LONG. If you are talking about the Federal Government alone, the Senator's statement would be correct, unless one wishes to give that industry some recognition for the fact that it is carrying a heavier overall tax burden than any industry with the exception of alcohol and tobacco. There is also a 50-percent tax on the product when delivered to the consumer. If the Senator thinks the consumer is paying all of that tax, then I suggest that the Senator contact any industry in his State and ask if that industry would be happy to accept a 50-percent tax burden on its product.

Mr. RIBICOFF. May I say to the distinguished Senator, the difference is this: When you and I go to the gasoline pump and pay our bill, we might pay 10 or 11 or 12 cents a gallon tax on the gasoline for filling up our tank, but we pay it, and not the major oil companies.

That is not the case with other businesses. So, basically, when we talk about the tax burden, it is the consumer that is paying this tax burden, and not the producers of oil.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, every industry is going to pass along every tax to the consumer if it can, because if it does not pass the tax along, it is not making money. So even the income tax is one it is going to pass along, if it can, to the consumer, as part of the price of its product.

But if the Senator wants to revert to the chart I have previously shown him, after we take all these facts into consideration, we find this industry is not making as much net profit as the average, or at least not more than the average, for all manufacturing, and it is going to be making less as a result of these major increases in taxes the committee has voted. The Senator should bear in mind that the committee has not only voted to reduce the depletion allowance to 23 percent, but has put a 5-percent tax on benefits from the depletion, and also a 5-percent tax on the intangible drilling costs.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. RIBICOFF. That 5 percent, however, is a burden not only put upon the oil industry, but is an additional tax that will be placed on every individual or corporation having a tax sheltered income of any kind. So we are not picking out the oil industry for that 5-percent additional burden.

Mr. LONG. If you want to call it a tax shelter. But the point is that most industries have the benefit of depreciation. You buy a piece of equipment, and depreciate it over the life of the equipment and are able to replace it when it is fully depreciated. But with regard to one seeking oil and gas, when he drills for it, the chances are 42 to 1 that it will not be a very good oil well, and the chances are 9 to 1 that he will not find anything worth producing. So it is an entirely different problem than simply depreciating something one manufactures.

The fact of the matter is that the CONSAD report, which Mr. Stanley Surrey wanted made. We have heard a lot of discussion about the conclusion of this report—that percentage depletion is an inefficient way of encouraging people to produce.

The fact of the matter is that the CONSAD report is rated by economists who understand the oil industry as being so erroneous that there is really not much point in getting into it.

I have here a memorandum from one of the experts over in the Department of the Interior, who said that in his judgment, there were 70 editorial mistakes in that report. I do not have time to go into all the fallacious and unrealistic assumptions in that report. For example, just to show how completely unreliable that CONSAD report is, they proceed on the assumption that we will find more reserves by making it unprofitable for someone to find reserves. The reverse side of that coin would be that if it were not profitable for someone to go out and find the oil and gas, he would do it even though he were losing money, which is pretty ridiculous, on the face of it.

I ask unanimous consent that the initial criticism of that report, together with the Proxmire comment and the response to it, be printed in the RECORD at this point, so that one can read both the criticism and the response, and the response to the response, and see who they think is correct.

There being no objection, the items requested were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANALYSIS AND COMMENT RELATING TO THE CONSAD REPORT ON THE INFLUENCE OF U.S. PETROLEUM TAXATION ON THE LEVEL OF RESERVES, APRIL 25, 1969

(By the Mid-Continent Oil and Gas Association, Washington, D.C.)

SUMMARY

The conclusions of the CONSAD report can be given no credence because:

I. The mathematical formula (an "economic model") from which the conclusions are drawn is conceptually inappropriate for the purpose.

II. CONSAD, itself, issues repeated warnings about the pitfalls of its model-building. The combined impact of these cautions is a clear signal that CONSAD should have rejected this model, as it did two other models—and as it did this one for natural gas.

III. The quality of the data used in the formula is questionable, as is the method of manipulation.

IV. There are factual errors in the report.

V. The study proceeds from a number of doubtful premises about the economics of the petroleum industry.

I. Inappropriateness of the CONSAD formula

The CONSAD study employed mathematical methods to predict the change in petroleum reserves that would result from elimination of percentage depletion. A fundamental error was made by using a formula that cannot answer this question. It was assumed that production would not change in the event of an increase in petroleum taxation, and the formula was designed to determine the level of reserves that would be required to accommodate the assumed fixed level of production.

Once it made the assumption that output is fixed regardless of profitability, it was inevitable that CONSAD would find that there would be little change in the desired level of reserves, since the required level of reserves is technologically determined by the level of production. It is indisputable, owing to the nature of petroleum deposits, that any given level of production requires a supporting amount of reserves which is a multiple of production—as CONSAD acknowledges on page 7.3 of the report. (To produce one barrel of oil annually, there must be about ten barrels of supporting reserves in the ground.)

CONSAD actually ignored the real problem, which is how the long-run level of output would change in reaction to a decrease in profitability resulting from increased taxation. Instead, CONSAD indefensibly assumed that the desired level of production is independent of the level of profitability of the industry.

Indeed, the CONSAD model makes no provision for unprofitability (except at a zero price of crude oil). The mathematical model is so formulated that it tells us that the industry would find and develop reserves even if price were less than cost. Any model which states that businessmen desire to invest when price is less than cost is indefensible because no firm desires to invest at a loss.

II. CONSAD cautions

CONSAD raised such an extended and serious list of objections to its own procedures that the reader should be convinced of the mathematical formula's lack of merit without further independent inquiry.

The formula was developed for use in describing the behavior of individual firms in manufacturing. CONSAD questioned whether the formula would be reliable if extended to the petroleum industry—see page 6.31.

CONSAD also questioned whether the historical data employed can be used to predict the future—see pages 6.12 and 6.13. In the report, it was said that "If the quantity of reserves necessary to support a certain level of output has changed during the period of the study, it will cause errors" in the estimates—page 6.13. (In fact, the ratio of proved reserves to production actually has declined steadily since 1960.)

CONSAD warns that reliable economic models require reliable data. In addition to the problem of finding reliable figures, it was recognized that there are massive problems in using the data. Perhaps the best example is finding costs, "the most ambiguous area in the data in this study"—page 6.16. Computing industry finding costs involves multiple difficulties, e.g., (a) the impossibility of determining from industry data when the exploration dollars for a given year's discoveries were actually spent; (b) the difficulty of estimating how much has been found until a number of years after discovery; and (c) the random variability of the amount spent per barrel found from year to year.

III. Statistical problems

The CONSAD report points out that there are "many missing links" in the quantitative data available for making a reliable economic study—page B.1. It nevertheless proceeded with the study on the basis of estimated data and often relied on doubtful stand-in data to estimate the effects of important items for which it could not obtain direct information. Moreover, the data were used to predict the effect of a change in industry taxation for which there is no historical precedent. Such an extrapolation beyond the range of historical experience violates fundamental statistical principles.

IV. Incorrect information

The report contains factually incorrect statements. Some involve data—even matters as basic as the current level of U.S. crude oil production. Others refer to petroleum tax provisions which do not exist.

If a research company is so unfamiliar with the petroleum industry as to err on basic data and tax provisions, it is unlikely to have sufficient knowledge of the industry to be able to develop accurate complex mathematical models for analyzing industry behavior.

V. Doubtful petroleum economics

Some of the premises of the CONSAD study are, in our opinion, based on unreliable assumptions about the economics of the industry. A notable example of these propositions asserts that Canadian crude reserves can "substitute" for United States reserves. However, the amount of crude oil imports from Canada is limited by agreement between the two governments. Since crude oil imports from Canada are controlled, Canadian reserves—like overseas reserves—are not substitutes for U.S. reserves. Thus, CONSAD should not have aggregated Canadian and U.S. reserves in its economic model. And drawing conclusions from this model entailed the error of assuming that changes in the U.S. tax law would have the same effect on Canadian reserves as on domestic reserves.

CONCLUSION

No useful conclusions can be drawn from the CONSAD study because the mathematical model and the data are defective and because some of the basic premises are not appropriate. Indeed, it was predestined that CONSAD's exercise would be futile because CONSAD assumed that production would not change in the event of an increase in petroleum taxation.

Furthermore, we firmly believe that no aggregative mathematical model of the oil industry—no matter how sophisticated—can be used as a guide to estimating the effects of eliminating percentage depletion. Two of the most important reasons for this are:

(1) Part of the period upon which such a model must be based (the 1950's and 1960's) was one of industry readjustment to excess capacity, a readjustment now well on the way to completion.

Sound statistical theory holds that projection of a past period assumes that any changes that occurred in the base period will be repeated in the future. Since further significant adjustment to excess capacity is not likely, the 1950's and 1960's cannot be used as a base period for forecasting the future.

(2) The largest year-to-year crude oil price change since 1950 was +30¢ per barrel (1956 to 1957). Elimination of percentage depletion would be equivalent to a price reduction of about 75¢ per barrel. Thus, any prediction of the results of such a tax change based on a model reflecting the 1950's and 1960's would require extrapolation far beyond the limits of the base period data.

Sound statistical theory holds that such extrapolation is invalid because there is simply no historical basis for evaluating how firms would react to changes so far beyond the range of experience.

CONSAD admitted the existence of these problems, but it proceeded undeterred.

Our criticism is not so much that CONSAD's exercise predictably proved futile, as that CONSAD drew serious public policy conclusions from its mathematical model despite the obvious and admitted statistical problems involved in constructing any such model. The model used is especially subject to criticism because it is based on the improper assumption that industry exploration and development expenditures are not dependent on an adequate rate of return.

INTRODUCTION AND CONCLUSIONS

This paper is a review of the recently released CONSAD Research Corporation Report on The Economic Factors Affecting the Level of Domestic Petroleum Reserves. This report has been widely quoted as concluding that elimination of percentage depletion would cause the firms in the industry to reduce the total desired level of proved crude oil reserves by only 3%, while elimination of percentage depletion and the right to deduct intangible drilling costs in the year of drilling would, together, reduce the desired level of reserves by only 7%.

The CONSAD conclusions are based on an economic model which is inappropriate for evaluating the effect of a tax increase on desired reserve holdings. This model was estimated and applied using old and doubtful data and generally questionable techniques. Furthermore, the study contains a number of statements which can be shown to be factually incorrect, as well as a number of questionable statements on the economics of the petroleum industry. In fact, the study is not even internally consistent in several places. Given these various problems, documented in detail below, the CONSAD conclusions can be given no credence.

CONSAD set out to evaluate three models:

(1) A so-called "neoclassical" model purporting to relate the desired level of reserves in the long run to production, price, and cost;

(2) An industry "behavioral simulation" attempting to relate exploration and development expenditures to some general measure of industry performance such as rate of return; and

(3) An individual firm simulation model attempting to determine mathematically how an integrated or non-integrated producer might react to changes in petroleum taxation.

The second model "could not be developed" (3.5)[1] because of CONSAD's inability to find a "significant relationship between the rate-of-return measures and expenditures for exploration and development". (6.51) "Consequently the development of a model of this type was determined to be infeasible at this time." (6.52)

The third model was developed, and we are told at the beginning of the report that the results are "mutually supportive" (3.5) of the results of the first model. Later in the report, however, CONSAD admits the "lack of quantitative significance of the firm model" which is "due in part to the lack of data on which to base it." (6.53) "The outputs of this model cannot serve as quantitative estimates of the effects of tax policy changes on total reserve levels . . ." (6.52) If this model cannot provide quantitative estimates, it is clear that CONSAD has no basis for alleging that it supports the results of the first model.

In short, the whole CONSAD result depends on the theoretical and statistical viability of the (first) model which attempts to relate the desired level of reserves to price, cost, and output. This report's purpose is to appraise this model. We shall, in turn, discuss:

(1) The theoretical invalidity and general non-applicability of the so-called neoclassical model, and CONSAD's failure to consider the relevant policy questions;

(2) The warnings which CONSAD itself issues about the difficulties of formulating such a model for the petroleum industry;

(3) Problems in CONSAD's statistical analysis;

(4) Apparent factual errors in the CONSAD report; and

(5) Certain doubtful propositions which CONSAD develops about the economics of the industry.

The general conclusion of our appraisal is that CONSAD analysis is conceptually unsatisfactory and statistically unsound. Thus, as is made abundantly clear in numerous statements in the report itself, it simply cannot provide reliable predictions of the likely reaction of petroleum firms to a substantial and unprecedented change in the basic economics of the industry. Consequently, it cannot serve as even a "base point" in the formulation or reformulation of public policy in this vitally important area.

I. THE "NEOCLASSICAL" MODEL

The source of CONSAD's conclusions, the Reserve-Reaction Forecasting or Neoclassical model, is based on arguments that were developed by Professor Dale W. Jorgenson of the University of California (Berkeley). Jorgenson's research, as reported in a series of recent papers, centered upon his attempt to apply what he has called a "neoclassical" approach to the problem of forecasting short-term changes in the level of investment spending. In the CONSAD report, one part of Jorgenson's model is used for the rather different problem of predicting the volume of petroleum reserves that petroleum producers will want to hold in the long run under different conditions.

This chapter first examines the model and its applicability to petroleum production. In the second part, emphasis is placed on those aspects of the model that are especially inappropriate in the CONSAD application. The final part covers published academic criticism of those of Jorgenson's assumptions which are both common and critical to the CONSAD analysis.

A. CONSAD's question

The question which CONSAD seeks to answer is this: If petroleum taxes were raised, how much reserves would the industry desire to hold at various levels of output, assuming that those levels of output would be produced. Specifically, in drawing its conclusions, CONSAD asked how much reserves the industry would have liked to hold in order to produce a particular level of output (the level produced in 1966): (1) with present taxation and (2) with increased taxation.

This question is almost trivial, and CONSAD itself provides an adequate answer on the very page on which it presents its basic model:

"There is a definite technological relationship (represented by the MER[2]) between the stocks held and the level of production. This limits the amount that can be produced from a given level of stocks, and requires a producer to maintain certain levels of stock to meet certain levels of production. Due to the MER, no more than a certain percentage of the total reserves can be produced during a year. (7.3)"

Thus, the level of reserves required for a given output is technologically determined. Assuming that the output will be produced come what may, the answer to CONSAD's question is a function of the technology of the industry. As will be shown below (p. 32), U.S. crude reserves in 1968 were ten times production. Allowing for some excess capacity, this is the answer to CONSAD's question.

It is not surprising that CONSAD found little responsiveness of desired levels of reserve to price changes, since it assumed that the 1966 level of output would be produced—profitable or not. With output fixed, the level of reserves should remain unchanged. Thus, CONSAD's question is basically trivial and is not the question that is relevant for public policy.

The question of real public policy significance is one having two parts. First, what quantity of output would firms want to produce at various prices? And second, what level of reserves is implied by those levels of output? Put this way, the question allows for the possibility of a zero answer if production becomes unprofitable. Put CONSAD's way, a level of output (and by implication, effort to add to reserves) is assumed regardless of profitability; and the elaborate CONSAD procedure merely attempts to determine the amount of reserves compatible with the output—something already technologically determined.

B. The basic model

In its simplest terms, the CONSAD argument is that the amount of "desired reserves" which petroleum producers will want to hold in long-run equilibrium is equal to the expected level of production multiplied by the ratio of the price of output to the cost of reserves.

Desired Reserves equals production times Price of Output divided by Cost of Reserves times Technological Constant.[3]

The problem with this formulation can be seen by asking what happens to desired reserves if price falls so much relative to cost that the industry becomes unprofitable. If expected production remains constant, as CONSAD assumes, the formula indicates that desired reserves would decline and that firms in the industry would want to abandon (draw down without replacement) some, but not all, of their reserves. This is clearly an unrealistic result; for as long as investment is unprofitable, firms will not want to hold any reserves in the long run. But this theoretically inappropriate formula tells us that firms in the industry would want to develop and hold some amount of reserves at any price greater than zero—even if that price were less than cost. Only if price is zero can this multiplicative formula give a zero reserve answer. But any rational description of long-run economic behavior must indicate zero net investment whenever investment is unprofitable, not simply when price is zero. (Price less than cost is no mere academic issue here, since the price which CONSAD uses to arrive at its final conclusion is below cost, based on its cost data.)

Probably the main reason why the CONSAD model gives this irrational answer is that it is incomplete. It considers only one of the many relationships that would determine the long-run equilibrium of an industry; and, in particular, it does not explain the level of production of the industry. However, it is the level of production of the industry which determines the desired level of reserves. If the industry becomes unprofitable, firms would cease to produce and therefore would cease to invest in new reserves. The CONSAD model is unable to account for this possibility.

The formulation actually used in the CONSAD analysis is somewhat more complex than the basic relationship discussed above, but it is still subject to the same fundamental criticism. The CONSAD model requires a number of highly restrictive and unrealistic assumptions some of which are discussed below.

C. Specific objections to the CONSAD model

Specific objections to the CONSAD model as it is applied to the petroleum industry relate to the formulation of the model and to the various assumptions. The assumptions which are most objectionable include (1) the "Production Function" on which the model is based; (2) the assumption of perfect extensibility beyond the range of available observations; (3) the assumption of perfect knowledge; and (4) the assumption that aggregation problems are minimal.

(1) The "Production Function" on which the Model is Based

The basic CONSAD model rests on the assumption that competitive firms will want to add to their holdings of capital (in this case, reserves) as long as the value of the output attributable to an additional unit of capital is greater than the cost of acquiring the unit. According to economic theory, the same relationship must hold for all factors of production (land, labor, capital, etc.), so that in long-run competitive equilibrium, the value of output attributable to the last unit of each factor will be equal to the cost of its acquisition.

With this as a basis, the CONSAD "neoclassical" approach assumes that we can determine the amount of capital that an industry will want to hold simply by determining how the value of the output attributable to additional units of capital varies with the amount held. This, in turn, is determined by manipulating what economists generally refer to as a "production function," a device which describes the technologically feasible alternative combinations of factor inputs which will result in various levels of output.

In an analysis such as CONSAD's, the specification of the production function is a matter of critical importance. In fact, the choice of a production function really determines the results that will be "found." For this reason, it is notable that the choice of a production function in the CONSAD analysis is essentially arbitrary with absolutely no basis in industry characteristics or technology. Thus, we are told:

"The exact relationship to be expected depends on the form of the production function which applies to the industry, and on this there is comparatively little evidence. Due to lack of strong evidence to the contrary, a first-degree constant elasticity of substitution production function was assumed . . . (7.7)"

With no evidence supposedly available, a particular function was simply "assumed." Actually however, the production function which is used for most of the computations involves a further—but no less arbitrary—assumption:

"It should be noted that although the assumption of a CES (constant elasticity of substitution) production function is common in the literature, and is reasonable on its face, the explicit assumption of constant returns (to scale) is not supported (nor made suspect) by any empirical evidence. Consequently it seemed appropriate to calibrate a CES function of degree greater than one . . . (7.7)"

Again, with no empirical evidence, it "seemed appropriate." In our opinion, there is convincing evidence on the nature of the production function for oil and gas; and an understanding of the inappropriateness of CONSAD's arbitrarily assumed production function is vital in evaluating CONSAD's work.

CONSAD's production function assumes that labor can be substituted for capital (in this case oil reserves) to produce a particular level of output. To us, this is not a realistic description of the oil industry. With a given state of technology, the ultimate recoverable output of a field cannot be increased by applying more labor to it. With MER production, the only way to get more output of oil is to find more oil pools. Labor is not a substitute for oil in producing oil. As CONSAD itself tells us, the required amount of reserves for a given annual output is fixed by MER, which is technologically determined (see the quote from (7.3) on page 4 above).

Thus, the appropriate production function for petroleum is one allowing no substitution between labor and capital. The proper formulation of the equation explaining desired reserves should be:

Desired Reserves = Production x Technological Constant. Since labor cannot be substituted for capital, CONSAD's assumption that production will remain constant requires that reserves remain constant. This formulation indicates clearly the triviality of CONSAD's question.

Another questionable property of CONSAD's production function is the assumption of increasing returns to scale—i.e., as more labor and capital are used to increase the scale of operations, progressively larger increments in output result. The implication is that the minerals industry uses the best deposits last. On the contrary, to the extent to which the quality of deposits is known (and the very significant problem of uncertainty is ignored in the CONSAD analysis), the minerals industry would logically use the best deposits first; that is, the production function would show decreasing returns to scale.

(2) The Assumption of Perfect Extensibility

Another fundamental problem with the CONSAD analysis is the assumption that relationships observed over a particular range of historical data necessarily will hold outside that range at some point in the future. This is the assumption that allows CONSAD to predict the effect of eliminating the percentage depletion allowance (equivalent to 75 to 80¢ per barrel before taxes) on the basis of the observed reactions to changes in price that were no larger than 30¢ during the sample period.

In discussing this point CONSAD observes that—

Since some of the possible tax policy changes evaluated are of greater magnitude than any past changes, it may well be that the adjustment of the industry to changes of this magnitude may not be completed for a period of years. (3.2)

In truth, when projecting beyond the range for which there is information and when using the projected results for public policy recommendations, the speed of adjustment—while important—is probably the least important concern. In fact, the dangers of extrapolation are so basic, one is led to wonder why "speed of adjustment" is stressed, while the truly significant problems are not discussed.

As soon as we attempt to go beyond the range of the available data, the statistical validity of any results declines precipitously. Beyond the range of observed variation there is absolutely no way to guarantee that the observed relationships will continue to hold. In fact, if one is to predict the petroleum industry's response to a change in (effective) price that is 2½ times greater than any observed in the past, he must first refute a presumption that the actual response would be totally different. In this case, predictions from a statistical model alone are not sufficient. Clearly, little information is available to support the validity of the fitted equation or even its general form, once one ventures outside the range of sample data. These problems cannot be dismissed merely with a reference to possible delays in adjustment. Given the limited range of observations and given the presumption that the industry response would be quantitatively and qualitatively quite different, the more logical reaction would have been to dismiss the results.

(3) Perfect Knowledge

The assumption of perfect knowledge or complete certainty is fairly common in econometric analyses. The reason is generally one of convenience rather than "common sense or casual observation." For a small manufacturing firm renting capital services in a perfectly competitive capital market, the assumption may be tolerable, especially when compared to the other assumptions that are required for econometric studies. However, such an assumption is totally inappropriate where investment means searching for petroleum.

Over the years, the fundamental uncertainty of petroleum exploration has been amply documented in the public record. Additional evidence can be drawn from the record of lease bid ranges (as originally proposed by Professor James W. McKie in 1960). Lease bids in particular auctions reflect different companies' valuations of the same properties. Since in the typical sale, each company is free to explore and study the property in question, complete certainty would suggest that the variation in bids would be small. However, as illustrated by the results in the table below, taken from public records, it is not uncommon for the winning bid in a patricular sale to be many times the low bid and even double or triple the second highest. These wide variations in bids from companies with similar access to pre-bids information make it clear that the actual circumstances of oil and gas exploration are anything but perfectly certain as assumed in the CONSAD report.

(4) The Assumption that Aggregation Problems are Minimal

Another fundamental problem is the assumption that the activities of thousands of petroleum producers can be lumped together, explained, and predicted in a simple three-variable model based on industry aggregate data.

One aspect of the problem is that the basic "neoclassical" or "desired capital" model is really applicable only for an individual firm. The importance of this particular problem is difficult to judge; but it may be worth noting that after a series of attempts to apply his version of the neoclassical model to aggregate investment expenditures, Jorgenson's most recent work deals with individual firms.

Another aspect of the aggregation problem noted by CONSAD is that: "In dealing with average figures for a number of firms, little information is usually available about the distribution. (6.5)" In truth, however, there is enough information in the case of the petroleum industry to make questionable any conclusions that are drawn from an analysis of aggregate industry data. Evidence in the distribution of most of the factors which CONSAD lumps together is readily available from public sources, e.g., U.S. and Canadian reserves. Moreover, a convincing demonstration of the significance of CONSAD's problem is provided by the econometric work of Professor Edward Erickson. Erickson's study (cited by the Treasury but not by CONSAD) shows that petroleum prices and the volume of exploration activity are closely related but only when the econometrician gives proper recognition to regional differences in exploration condtions and differences in the size or type of firms undertaking the exploration. Failure to take account of regional and firm differences in reserves, prices, access to capital, etc., would have restricted the usefulness of the CONSAD analysis even if the model had been somehow appropriate.

D. Academic criticism of the "neoclassical" model

Before examining CONSAD's own reservations about its work, it will be of interest to inquire into what other economists have said about the "neoclassical" approach.

Jorgenson's "neoclassical" approach to investment forecasting has been the subject of considerable critical comment in the professional economic literature. Since the CONSAD formulation is too recent to have received comment and since many of the principal assumptions are the same in both, it is important to take note of the published views of some prominent economists on Jorgenson's studies.

First, on the lack of realism and the general restrictiveness of Jorgenson's assumptions, Professor Roger F. Miller of the University of Wisconsin has observed:

"I strongly doubt that the prominent neoclassicists, were they alive and well read today, would find much interest in a model which assumes away uncertainty with regard to the future, lags in adjustment, difficulties in aggregation and composition, discontinuities, etc.[4]"

A more detailed listing of Jorgenson's assumptions, is provided by Professor James Tobin of Yale University. Citation of Tobin's list is appropriate not only because the assumptions are unrealistic but also because the complete list is never presented in the basic CONSAD document:

"In Jorgenson's world of perfect competition and perfect knowledge . . .

"(Jorgenson's firm) purchases capital services at a market rental, just as it purchases labor at a market wage. There is a perfect market in capital goods; capital is homogeneous in quality regardless of its vintage, and capital evaporates exponentially, so that future depreciation is also independent of vintage. Thus, any surviving capital can always be sold at the prevailing price of new capital." [5]

Additional questions relate to the assumption of equilibrium and to the restrictions which this places on the types of problems that can be addressed. This point was best expressed by Professor Zvi Griliches of the University of Chicago:

"In the Jorgenson model, one cannot answer the question of what happens to the rate of investment if the rate of interest or other prices shift to a new permanent level in one move or if a change occurs in depreciation rules. A discontinuous jump to a new accumulation path is not admissible." [6]

Note, however, that it is just such a shift in tax policy which is the problem addressed by CONSAD.

Professor Griliches has asked further:

"Are the desired capital change variables significant because they are largely equal to the change in sales or output, or does the specific 'neoclassical' deflation of these changes by the elaborate 'user' cost of capital concept really do the trick?" [7]

Professor Griliches never answers these questions, but the recent publications of Professor Eisner of Northwestern University provide some indications:

"In most critical instances, it will be found that empirical tests contradict Jorgenson's assumptions and with them the deductively derived conclusions." [8]

These criticisms of the "Neoclassical" model of investment behavior are in the literature. Surely CONSAD should have taken them into consideration and stated its reasons for believing that these criticisms do not vitiate the appropriateness of the CONSAD model.

II. CONSAD CAUTIONS

CONSAD goes to great length to point out the multiple problems associated with attempting to set up any mathematical model describing the response of petroleum exploration to changes in economic factors affecting the industry. Our only basic quarrel with these cautionary passages in the report is that the authors did not take them to heart. Rather, they elected to move ahead undeterred and use the mathematical derivation described in the prior chapter as a basis for drawing major public policy conclusions about an industry whose continued growth is vital to the military and economic security of the nation.

CONSAD expresses three general reservations about mathematical evaluation of the responsiveness of petroleum exploration to increased taxation:

"(1) Whether investment analysis developed for manufacturing firms can validly be applied to petroleum;

"(2) Whether appropriate quantitative estimates of a Jorgenson-type 'neoclassical' model are feasible, based on historical data; and

"(3) Whether the data used for the four principal variables in the total industry formula (reserves, price, cost, and production) were reliable and appropriate."

A. Applicability to Petroleum of Investment Analysis Developed for Manufacturing Firms

CONSAD warns that—

"Investment analysis, as developed for manufacturing is best applied with caution to the oil industry. (6.3)"

CONSAD lists three reasons for this caution: (1) the industry is assumed to be "neither growing very rapidly nor declining;" (2) the theory applies to "a single firm;" and (3) "the oil industry does not invest in quite the same way as other industries do." (6.3 and 6.5)

(1) Static Industry

CONSAD states:

"The oil industry, and particularly its exploration sector, has so far as it is possible to tell from the sparse financial data available, been passing from a period of high and increasing demand and high profits to a period of more stable demand and lower profits. (6.3)"

Where there has been a change in a fundamental factor during the base period for an historical economic model, use of that model to forecast the future implicitly assumes that the change will continue as it did in the base period. Hence, the model will give invalid results if the change has, in fact, been a transition which is complete. We agree with CONSAD that—

"The immediate past may well have been a period of readjustment for the industry . . . ; and extrapolation from this period may thus not be entirely relevant to the future of the industry. (6.4–6.5)"

Footnotes at end of article.

We shall address this point in more detail later.

(2) Individual Firm Decisions

CONSAD then states:

"The behavior of an entire industry is more difficult to explain than that of a single firm, particularly since. . . . Industry aggregate data may obscure some of the underlying behavior of the individual firms. (6.5 and 6.7)"

This reservation about the validity of attempting to estimate the reaction to a petroleum tax increase by observing past industry aggregates rather than by examining the economics of individual firm investment decisions was what led CONSAD to attempt to develop the individual firm simulation model mentioned in the Introduction to this report—a model which "lacked quantitative significance" once it was completed.

(3) Capital Investment Process

CONSAD argues that the process of capital formation in oil differs from manufacturing in that a good part of the investment base is immediately deductible for tax purposes (the losses are literally sunk capital):

"This may be be taken to indicate that capital has been relatively more free to move in and out of exploration and can, therefore, be sensitive to expected profit; or it may suggest that, since it is easier to 'pull out,' there is less need to be sensitive to small fluctuations in expected profits as measured by realized profits in the previous period. (6.6)"

We read this to say that petroleum explorers will probably not react quickly to small changes in profits, but that they can—and will—react significantly if a profit change persists. This reaction will either be to pull out or to increase expenditures, as the case may be. The lag between profit change and reaction will be long; but the reaction will occur if the profit change proves to be other than transitory. The length of the lag will also be difficult to predict because industry reactions are the sum of individual reactions; and various firms will undoubtedly react differently to a given change.

How could a research organization which can so accurately appraise the process of petroleum capital formation in qualitative terms permit itself to fall into the trap of believing quantitative results which are, on their face, patently unreasonable?

B. Quantitative reliability of models based on historical data

CONSAD also lists three reasons for caution on this point: (1) rational businessmen base decisions on "expectations of future values" which may not be accurately represented by historical observations; (2) historical observations "may represent transient, rather than equilibrium, conditions;" and (3) historical observations may be distorted by technological change during the base period. (6.12–6.13). The second of these is the same as the first caution in (A) above.

(1) Expectations

CONSAD states:

"First, and perhaps most important, rational operators are basing decisions not on past values of variables but on their expectations of future values. (6.12)"

Of course, past experience is relevant in estimating future expectations. However, in trying to develop quantitative results, one must explicitly consider just how these expectations might be formed. (6.12) . . . Obtaining data on current expectations is fraught with problems, and obtaining historical data on expectations was essentially impossible. (7.12)

CONSAD recognizes that one must consider how expectations might be formed and that it was impossible to obtain any historical data on expectations. Yet CONSAD proceeded with estimating the "neoclassical" model. How? By using "some variable for which data was available and which might reasonably be assumed to reflect the expectations which existed at the time . . ." (7.12) The result was that producers' expectations were represented by: first-order exponentially weighted moving averages of costs (7.20); second-order exponential moving averages of production (7.25); and actual prices.

The matter of explorers' expectations is of critical importance in any model which seeks to predict the effect of eliminating the percentage depletion allowance. The allowance is worth 75 to 80¢ per barrel before taxes; and the largest year-to-year price change since 1950 was +30¢ (that change was largely eroded within two years). Thus:

"One of the objectives of the study was to predict the effects of changes which exceeded the range of the calibration data. (7.8)"

How explorers will react to a 75¢ equivalent price decrease is impossible to predict from their reactions to very small price changes. The effect on their expectations for the future of the industry could be catastrophic, especially since the change would come via repeal of a tax provision which originated a half century ago during the formative years of the corporate income tax.

(2) Transient Conditions in the Base Period

CONSAD observes that there will be problems in utilizing the base period data if they reflect transient conditions rather than equilibrium. We have seen that this is crucially important in evaluating the reliability of a mathematical model of reactions to increased petroleum taxes.

In the first place, as CONSAD recognizes, the industry was reacting to excess capacity during the base years:

"There is clear evidence that excess capacity existed during the entire period studied . . . (7.10)"

Surely a base period when firms in the industry were reacting to substantial excess capacity is of dubious value for forecasting industry reactions in long-run equilibrium.

Next, CONSAD is impressed by industry structural changes as firms reacted to excess capacity, particularly after the first Suez crisis of 1956–1957: "The industry structure and pattern of expenditures changed in 1957 or thereabouts, with one pattern being exhibited prior to this time, and a second totally different pattern . . . exhibited after 1957. (6.25)"

This change "will make it hazardous to use the past behavior of the total industry (over the last twenty years) to judge possible behavior of the industry in the future. (6.24–6.25)"

Rather, "It is the more recent years which should be most closely modeled because of the apparent period of adjustment during the 1950's and because the later years are the only period indicating any sensitivity of expenditures to rate of return. (6.46)"

Having recognized the "hazards" and the need for restricting the model to "later years," CONSAD proceeded to base its "neoclassical" model on the period 1951–1965. Not only does this model carry the figures back into a period CONSAD itself rejects, it cuts off 1966 and 1967.

(3) Technological Change

CONSAD states: "The final major problem in this approach, . . . is the question of the stability of technology during the period studied. If, in fact, the quantity of reserves technologically necessary to support a certain level of output has changed during the period of the study, it will cause errors in the quantitative relationships estimated. (6.13)"

There can be no question that the ratio of reserves to production has, in fact, changed. Chart A [not printed in the RECORD] shows that the ratio may have trended up slightly until 1960 and then began a persistent decline.

Early in the report, CONSAD itself quotes a 1968 Department of the Interior statement that the ratio had dropped to 10.4:1 (2.7). However, this point is ignored in estimating the model, where the use of 12:1 is qualified only by the following remark:

"While there is evidence that such a change occurred, there exists some evidence as to the direction and magnitude of that change, thus making it possible to at least estimate its effect on the relationships. (6.13)"

CONSAD clearly knew of the technological change, witness its own reference to the Department of the Interior study:

"This large increase in well productivity . . . implies that the reserves needed to support a given level of production on a technological basis have declined by 36% since the period 1944 to 1948. The economic significance of this point is stated in a Department of the Interior report: (2.7)"

Then, quoting Interior:

"In view of this fact, it no longer appears necessary to maintain a ratio of proved reserves to production in the vicinity of 12 to 1 to insure the producibility of reserves at required rates. (2.7)"

In short, even though it called the reader's attention to the fact that errors "will" be caused by a reduction in the ratio, CONSAD apparently made no modification of its results to reflect the technological change.

There are other examples of technological change which occurred during the base period and which cannot be expected to continue at the same pace, e.g., a rapid increase in the use of fluid injection for secondary recovery and fracturing of certain formations to increase recoverable reserves.

C. Reliability of petroleum data

CONSAD warns us of serious limitations in the data used to calibrate the model. We use two of these as examples.

(1) Finding Costs

"Finding" costs as used in the study are actually finding and development costs. According to CONSAD:

"The definition of finding cost is perhaps the most ambiguous area in the data in this study. (6.16)"

There are three reasons for this (6.17):

(a) How to measure what is found;

(b) "Relatively poor data available on actual costs of exploration and development activity"; and

(c) "Discovery is . . . a random event."

The problem is this: First, one does not know how much he has found with any degree of certainty for many years after the discovery. This is a particularly serious problem when the measure of discoveries proved reserves, since reserves only appear in these data when they are actually put in the working inventory. The time lag can be quite long. Furthermore, it is impossible to determine from aggregate industry data when the exploration dollars for a given year's discoveries were actually spent. And the amount spent per barrel found will vary considerably from year to year on a purely random basis as discoveries vary.

CONSAD finally relied on total expenditures for exploration and development divided by gross annual additions to proved reserves of oil and gas (gas converted to liquid equivalent on something like a value basis). This measure is also sometimes used in the industry. However, the measure is used only as a rough measure of capital requirements, not as a precise input to a mathematical model—and certainly not as a precise measure of the cost of new discoveries. Very little of the money spent in a given year is associated with the oil actually found in that year, and gross additions are not "discoveries," as mis-labeled by CONSAD (A.37). Gross additions are composed of extensions, revisions, and conservative first-year estimates of new discoveries. The proportions of these components change over time (see Chart B) [Not printed in the RECORD] and the new discovery component is quite small.

(2) Price

CONSAD states:

"Because of the unique nature of petroleum and natural gas reserves, the appropriate measure of price is particularly difficult to determine. (7.14)"

Why?

"A price decline would be expected to lead in the long run to lower reserve stocks."* (7:15)"

"In the short run, however, it might result in a cutback in production which would increase reserve stocks above planned levels, since the planned depletion of reserves would not occur. (Italics added.) (7.15)"

In other words, observing the historical relationship between price and reserves can lead to an exactly opposite conclusion from that appropriate to a long-run model, since history is composed of a series of short-runs.

(3) Summary on Data

There were also problems with all other data used to calibrate the model. (At various points in the report, three different methods were used to estimate lifting costs—see 6.34; 8.3; and 9.13.) Using finding costs and price as examples, finding costs were "ambiguous;" and an appropriate price was "particularly difficult to determine." Yet CONSAD was not deterred from applying the "neoclassical" model to oil—even though data problems caused it to reject the other two models. And CONSAD even rejected a "neoclassical" model for natural gas because of data problems.

III. STATISTICAL PROBLEMS

This chapter deals with statistical aspects of the CONSAD report. Attention is directed to the quality of the statistical analysis including the appropriateness of the data inputs and the success of the statistical manipulations.

A. Data

As with most parts of the analysis, a critical discussion of the data inputs can best begin with CONSAD's own qualifications and cautions. Thus, in a section on problems of data collection, CONSAD states that—

"Throughout this study there have been substantial difficulties in obtaining data which would have broadened the analysis undertaken. There are so many missing links in the quantitative evidence available that it is difficult to know which to rank first. (B.1)"

To overcome these "missing links" CONSAD has tailored its analysis to fit the data which are available, even when this does violence to the underlying logic:

"The purpose of this study required that the investment hypotheses chosen meet two criteria—first, that data be available to calibrate it, and, second, that it include as determining variables the magnitude which would change with changes in tax provisions. (6.3)"

Both criteria are necessary, but neither should be allowed to take precedence over logic where the analysis is to form the basis for public policy.

More specific examples of this tailoring include the following:

"The approach taken here is somewhat different for two reasons. One is that the data for most of the variables of interest is available only on an annual basis. The other is that the primary objective of the study is an estimation of the long run effects of certain policy changes, and in view of the paucity of the data available, it seems advisable not to attempt the estimation of an excessive number of parameters. (7.4–7.5)"

And—

"The choice of a single-equation model over a multiple-equation model was based on the paucity of data available for model calibration . . . (7.9)"

A second technique employed to compensate for "missing links in the quantitative evidence" is the use of "proxy" variables—variables which stand in for the quantities actually desired. For example well head price plus the after-tax value of percentage depletion was used as a proxy for price minus income tax. Objections could be raised to each of CONSAD's proxy variables. An obvious and not atypical example, however, is the interest rate which forms one element in the important "user" cost formulation. Without explanation, CONSAD uses what purports to be the Aaa corporate bond rate (4.5% before taxes for 1966—actual average was 5.13%, now 7.5%). Apparently the rationale for this is that the Aaa rate is used by Robert M. Coen, the source of CONSAD's "user" cost formulation. But if this is the case, it is important to take note of the comments presented by Coen:

"Choosing an appropriate measure of 'the interest rate' raises many problems regarding the definition and measure of the cost of funds to firms. (Miller and Modigliani) have found that for the electric utility industry the Aaa bond yield is far superior to a weighted average yield on bonds and equities in predicting both the level of, and magnitude of changes in, the cost of funds. Whether or not this is also true in the manufacturing sector is unknown, since research in this important area is just beginning." [9]

If we are to be expected to accept the Aaa corporate bond rate as a reasonable reflection of what petroleum producers expect for their cost of capital, something more convincing is needed than a reference to Modigliani and Miller's admittedly distinguished work with electric utilities, particularly when one considers that only six companies in the oil industry have the Aaa rating. Of course, no one borrows for exploration (unless the loan is secured by other income or assets). Hence, the cost of capital for exploration must be the long-run return to equity in the United States (say, 10% after taxes) plus a substantial risk premium to compensate for exploration uncertainties. CONSAD, itself, uses 9% after taxes elsewhere in the report (4.30).

B. Problems of estimation

It is characteristic of the model which CONSAD attempts to estimate, that once the particular form is specified, the regression analysis is not terribly important. The reason, quite simply, is that the values of the coefficients are so constrained that whatever values are indicated in the regression analysis are of marginal significance. With this as background, one could probably ignore the regression analysis on the ground that it is unimportant, were it not for the fact that the analysis itself contains some fundamental and important errors.

The principal problem in the multiple regression analysis is the problem of interrelated independent variables, or as it is called by the econometricians, "multicollinearity." This problem is described by CONSAD as follows:

"For the model here, the question is whether any of the independent variables in the capital stock equation are in fact dependent on the other variables in the system. It might be proposed for example, that the observed production values are functions of price, or that the current cost of new capital stock is a function of the existing quantity of capital stock. If this is true, then the single-equation model will produce biased estimates of the parameters. (7.10)"

CONSAD devotes considerable effort to arguing that the independent variables in their regression, price/cost and production, are not highly correlated. At no point, however, do they provide the only suitable evidence, the set of correlation coefficients.

Our computation and analysis of these coefficients using the basic CONSAD data shows that the two independent variables, the price/cost ratio and lagged production, are highly correlated. In a situation such as this, the statistical validity of any multiple regression results accordingly must be highly suspect.

Just how suspect CONSAD's results may be can be seen if we attempt to duplicate their results using U.S. data instead of aggregated U.S. and Canadian data. Using CONSAD's data sources and model, a series of regressions was computed to relate U.S. prove reserves to the price/cost ratio and to U.S. production. As in the CONSAD analysis, the two independent variables were highly correlated, but the effect of the multicollinearity in this case was to leave the coefficient for the production variable in the multiple regression analysis statistically insignificant. This kind of result is only to be expected where multicollinearity is a problem.

C. Problems of application

The principal problem with CONSAD's application of the model is the problem of extensibility. As explained above it is simply not legitimate to use historical data to predict how firms might react to a fundamental and unprecedented change in the basic economics of the industry—especially when the base period is atypical and when serious public policy matters are at issue.

Other problems of application suggest the pervasiveness of the theoretical and statistical problems. In this regard, it must be considered curious that in estimating and applying the model, lifting costs are never mentioned except where they are used to calculate income taxes.[10] If this version of the neoclassical model permits us to disregard labor and other costs even though these must affect the profitability of the industry, this point should be noted and explained. Jorgenson's original formulation had a separate equation for labor inputs—not used by CONSAD.

Equally curious is CONSAD's use of a formula to measure the cost of reserves that was designed to measure the cost of the annual services of a machine. Since this approach leads CONSAD to compare the price of a full barrel of reserves with the cost of only a fraction of a barrel, some explanation is required as to how the formula is applicable. Unfortunately, none is offered.

D. General appraisal

Given the problems with the data inputs and given the problem of multicollinearity, the general appraisal can be brief. The essential point is that made by Professor Eisner when confronted with similar evidence in earlier Jorgenson models.

All in all, there appears to be scant empirical support for the usefulness of "the neoclassical model of capital accumulation." [11]

IV. APPARENTLY INCORRECT INFORMATION

In our opinion, the following statements are factually incorrect:

CONSAD statement 1: the United States is a net importer of foreign oil . . . the quantity is restricted to 12.2% of domestic demand . . . (4.4)

Fact: 1968 Domestic Demand, 13,016 MB/D.

Fact: 1968 Total Imports . . . 2,857 MB/D.

Total Imports divided by Domestic Demand equals 21.9%.

CONSAD statement 2: import restrictions . . . effectively limit crude imports to 12.2% of domestic crude production. (6.15)

Fact: 1968 Domestic Crude Production, 8,648 MB/D.

Fact: 1968 Crude Imports . . . 1,273 MB/D.

Crude Imports divided by Domestic Production equals 14.7%.

CONSAD statement 3: The IOCC estimate . . . is the only available estimate of oil originally in place in known fields . . . 346.2 billion barrels [1962] . . . (4.18)

Fact: The Department of the Interior has estimated 387 billion barrels for 1965.

Footnotes at end of article.

CONSAD statement 4: The current output of crude oil is approximately 7 million barrels a day. (4.22)

Fact: 1968 production: 8.65 million barrels per day.

CONSAD statement 5: The ratio of reserves to production has remained consistently in the region of 12:1. (4.23)

Fact: 1–1–1968 Reserves equals 31.4 billion barrels.

1968 Crude Production equals 3.17 billion barrels.

Reserves divided by Production equals 9.9 billion barrels.

The ratio of proved reserves to production has remained virtually constant at 1:12 (sic) for 20 years. (5.12)

CONSAD statement 6: Crude oil and natural gas are bound together. (4.24)

Fact: 76% of U.S. gas reserves are in non-associated reservoirs (part of the remaining 24% is from non-dissolved gas caps over oil deposits).

CONSAD statement 7: Depletion is calculated for each property separately, or in certain cases, on specified aggregations. (4.38)

The small producer . . . has not the benefit of property aggregation to spread his deductions and avoid the net income limitation. (8.9)

Fact: Since 1963, aggregation has been prohibited (except within an individual lease), regardless of the size of the producer.

CONSAD statement 8: Alternatively, a recent provision (1956) permits capitalized and accumulated intangible costs to be deferred and expensed over the five years following the discovery of the well. This may allow the net income limitation to be avoided altogether. (4.40)

Fact: We know of no such provision.

CONSAD statement 9: Foreign . . . depletion . . . amounted to a total of $655,000,000 in 1960. . . . This represents 23% of all depletion claimed. (5.19)

Fact: Most of this "claimed" depletion was not effective because foreign tax credits prevented payment of U.S. tax on foreign production.

CONSAD statement 10: There are no direct import restrictions on natural gas. (6.16)

Fact: Federal Power Commission approval is required for all such imports.

CONSAD statement 11: Since assets result from past expenditures, an initial estimate of the assets committed to crude oil production activity was obtained by summing three years' expenditures for exploration and development (the past two years' and the present year's). . . . using [this base] . . . a rate of return was computed. (6.34)

Fact: Present cash flow comes from sale of reserves developed over a period of many years, not just the last three. Thus, the rates of return on Chart 6.5 are far too high.

CONSAD statement 12: Some firms operating abroad pay up to approximately 70% in royalties. The standard domestic royalty is ⅛ although many are higher. (8.9)

Fact: In general, royalties in foreign producing countries are approximately the same as in the United States.

CONSAD statement 13: The integrated major producers . . . [may have] economic power . . . great enough to enable them to force independent producers to bear the burden of the increased taxes, by reducing field prices and thus increasing the profitability of refining operations.

Fact: Even if it had the economic power (which no producer does), an integrated company would hardly do this. Why? The action would reduce only the cost of that fraction of its crude which is purchased. However, a crude price cut would reduce the cost of all crude refined by its nonintegrated competitors, thereby leaving the integrated company at a competitive disadvantage in refining.

If a research company is so unfamiliar with the petroleum industry as to err on basic data and tax provisions, can it possibly have sufficient knowledge of the industry to be able to develop accurate complex mathematical models for analyzing industry behavior?

V. DOUBTFUL PETROLEUM ECONOMICS

The CONSAD report takes a number of positions on key petroleum economics issues which we believe to be wholly inadequate. These positions lead us to wonder whether the authors have relied on the intensive direct appraisal which should be a prerequisite to suggestions of public policy changes in any industry.

Ten examples of what are, in our view, serious misconceptions about the economics of the industry are:

(1) The substitutability which CONSAD assumes to exist between United States and Canadian reserves.

(2) The allegedly adverse resource allocation effects of petroleum taxation.

(3) The supposed insensitivity of exploratory activity to rate of return. CONSAD concluded on the basis of a defective measure of rate of return (see page 34 above) that there is no relationship between rate of return and exploration, except a weak relationship for larger companies during the period 1957–1965, (6.51).

(4) The adequacy of A.P.I. proved reserves data for use in evaluating exploratory results (see page 24 above).

(5) The picture of an industry operating as a monolith or as two groups (large and small companies) rather than as a large number of individual firms making individual decisions in reaction to price and cost.

(6) The picture of an industry "satisfied" with a modest return reflecting lackadaisical operation rather than an industry pursuing vigorous technological improvement programs designed to improve profits. A realistic picture of the actual situation is provided in the National Petroleum Council Volume, Impact of New Technology on the U.S. Petroleum Industry 1946–1965.

(7) The industry's supposed ability to "double" the recoverability of oil in place (4.18). The Department of the Interior predicts only a one-fourth increase between 1965 and 1980, and that is very likely optimistic.

(8) The concept of wildcat "success" used in the report. CONSAD correctly states that "discovery value on a successful well is many times higher than actual outlays made for that particular well" (4.37) but then takes the position that one wildcat in ten is "successful"—whereas the number is more like one in fifty.

(9) The attempt to apply overseas development patterns to United States reservoirs in order to determine how many excess wells have been drilled here.

(10) The conflicting statements on the alleged economic power of large producers who are said to control a "large share of production" (2.5) and are then said to operate in an industry "which is not highly concentrated" and where the top five producers account for only "20% of the output." (4.3)

In order to illustrate the problems involved with these CONSAD positions, we shall discuss our objections to the first two in some detail.

A. Substitutability of U.S. and Canadian reserves

In estimating its "neoclassical" model, CONSAD combined United States and Canadian reserves. CONSAD's stated rationale for this surprising treatment of the data is:

"Examination of the United States-only reserve/production ratio indicates that it has been gradually declining, while the Canada-only ratio has been rising. (6.14)"

From this, CONSAD reasons:

"For both of these to be due to rational decisions on the part of firms, either the expectation must be that Canadian production will be rising much more rapidly than United States production, or the firms involved consider the United States and Canada as a single market. (6.14)"

CONSAD concludes that the "latter seems intuitively more plausible." (6.14) Notwithstanding CONSAD's intuition, the truth most likely is that the rise in Canadian reserves reflects normal variations in success, which is highly random in the petroleum industry, as CONSAD recognizes elsewhere. (6.17) CONSAD also recognizes elsewhere that the decline in the United States ratio reflects technological change. (2.7)

CONSAD acknowledges that foreign oil cannot ordinarily be considered a substitute for domestic oil in the United States because foreign imports are restricted. (6.15) However, "Canadian (and Mexican) crude is exempt from allocation and licensing requirements of the Oil Import Program and, consequently, can serve as a substitute for domestic reserves for the individual producer. (6.15–6.16)."

This comment is typical of the misconceptions about the economics of an industry which can arise from a cursory examination of its institutional constraints. The premise is technically correct, but the conclusion does not follow.

It has long been common knowledge that the amount of Canadian oil exports to the United States is limited by agreement between the two governments. Prime Minister Trudeau recently described this agreement:

"We have a continental oil policy of sorts that was set up in the past . . . essentially it means that Canadian oil producers sell to Western Canada and sell to the United States an amount roughly equivalent to the amount of oil that Eastern Canada purchases overseas and notably from the Venezuelan producers. It's a deal between the American Government and the Canadian Government which is cost-saving and for both parties. (New York Times, March 26, 1969, p. 14)"

Canadian exports to the United States are, in fact, controlled. Hence, Canadian reserves are not substitutes for U.S. reserves; and CONSAD's mathematical conclusions accordingly derive from inappropriately combined reserve data.

The importance of non-substitutability becomes apparent when CONSAD tries to decide how much of a change in reserves to allocate to each country:

"The relative decline in each country would depend on whether the tax changes implemented in Canada were the same as those implemented in the United States. (8.11)"

What CONSAD does not say is that tax treatment is already materially different in the two countries; hence, Canadian and United States reserves cannot be perfect substitutes. Indeed, how could CONSAD validly compute the effect of a U.S. tax change on total reserves in the two countries when U.S. tax treatment does not apply in Canada? When tax treatment differs to start with, one cannot possibly have the "same" changes in the two jurisdictions.

B. Un-neutrality of the corporate income tax

In its study, CONSAD takes the position that percentage depletion is an economically wasteful tax subsidy which leads to a misallocation of resources by encouraging overinvestment in oil. CONSAD gives only five lines of text to the extensive discussion in the economics literature of the non-neutrality of a flat-rate corporate income tax, e.g., the work of Professor McDonald "who holds that a standard rate of corporation tax is not necessarily neutral in its effects on resource allocation and that . . . the depletion allowance may be found to be a neutralizing rather than a non-neutralizing factor. (5.33)"

In our opinion, taxation of petroleum exploration and production at the standard rate would cause an un-neutral and eccnomically wasteful shift of resources away from this industry—an industry vital to the economic and military security of the nation. Tax provisions which counter the non-neutral effects of a flat-rate corporate income tax on a vital industry are not "tax subsidies"; they are justifiable provisions which prevent what would otherwise be economic inequities.[12]

Why do we believe that application of the standard corporate income tax rate to petroleum would cause an un-neutral mis-allocation of resources? A flat-rate corporation income tax changes the relative attractiveness of different investments depending on risk and uncertainty, asset lives, and leveraging power. Investments in oil and gas exploration are characterized by high uncertainty, long asset lives, and low leveraging power. Thus, in the absence of mitigating provisions one would expect that imposition of a flat-rate corporate income tax would divert resources away from petroleum exploration to other industries or to liquid investments.

Consider the following example of the un-neutral effect of a corporation income tax levied at the same rate on two industries, "A" and "B." A is more uncertain than B, and we assume that investors demand twice as much cash generation to invest in A as in B, where the expected return is, say 10 percent in the absence of an income tax. This extra profit requirement in the event of success in A is compensation for the greater likelihood of failure in A. In each industry, we assume $100, 10-year investments yielding a constant annual cash flow which is reinvested in that industry.

The following tabulation summarizes the effect of a 50 percent corporate income tax on the relative attractiveness of the two investments (first two columns):

CUMULATIVE CASH ON HAND AFTER 10 YEARS[1]

	No tax	With 50 percent income tax	With 50 percent income tax and percentage depletion at 50 percent of net income for A
A	$518	$250	$311
B	$259	$170	$170
Ratio A to B	2.0	1.5	1.8

[1] Includes earnings on project cash flow assuming it is reinvested in the same industry at the same rate of return.

The flat-rate income tax reduces the ratio of A to B from 2.0 to 1.5, thereby making A relatively much less attractive than B. Investors would, therefore, place their funds in B rather than A because of the flat-rate tax.

Since this mal-allocation of resources results from the tax, it is appropriate to correct it through the tax. The third column shows what would happen if A were entitled to percentage depletion at 50% of net income. The relative deterioration in its position would be mitigated, with the ratio at 1.8. Complete restoration of the original relative profit position could be achieved by also permitting A to accelerate the write-off of part of its $100 investment.

A third possible use of funds is liquidity. If returns are not high enough relative to liquidity, investors need not invest in uncertain projects at all. The following tabulation compares "A" with liquidity, e.g., leaving the $100 in a safe deposit box:

CUMULATIVE CASH ON HAND AFTER 10 YEARS[1]

	No tax	With 50 percent income tax	With 50 percent income tax and percentage depletion for A at 50 percent of net income
A	$518	$250	$311
Liquidity	$100	$100	$100
Ratio A, to liquidity	5.2	2.5	3.1

Note: In this case, a substantial accelerated depreciation allowance would be required to reestablish the pretax ratio of 5.2.

[1] Includes earnings on project cash flow assuming it is reinvested in the same industry at the same rate of return.

It is apparent that the outcomes in the real world will vary with project lives, required relative profit ratios, leveraging power of the industries, etc. A recent extensive study using typical manufacturing and petroleum examples has shown that with both percentage depletion and the expensing of intangibles allowed to petroleum, the present corporate income tax results in roughly equivalent after-tax and pre-tax ratios.[13] Hence, these petroleum tax provisions tend to offset the otherwise un-neutral effects of a flat-rate corporate income tax.

Why does the flat-rate corporation income tax discriminate in this way against high-return investments? What matters in project profitability evaluation is the net cash which flows from operations (that is, gross receipts less operating exepnses). The flat-rate corporate income tax reduces this cash flow by a greater perecntage in the case of the project with the higher cash flow. The following tabulation shows the effect of a 50% corporate income tax on the annual cash flows required to achieve the stated profitability levels of A and B in the absence of a tax:

	A	B
Annual cash flow without tax	$22.3	$16.3
Less, annual depreciation	10.0	10.0
Taxable income	12.3	6.3
Tax, at 50 percent	6.2	3.2
Annual cash flow after tax	16.1	13.1
Percentage change in annual cash flow	−28	−19

Note.—These −28 and −19 percent tax-induced changes are minimal indications of the discriminatory effect of the tax, since the loss of future (compounded) earnings on the reinvested funds would also be larger for A.

OIL TAXES—INCENTIVE OR SUBSIDY?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, there is a debate as to whether the special tax treatment enjoyed by the oil industry is a subsidy or an incentive for additional exploration.

The CONSAD Research Corp. has prepared a thorough economic analysis of the oil industry's tax structure and how well these special tax provisions worked as an incentive.

Their findings are remarkable. They found that under the most favorable assumptions the American taxpayer was spending over $10 for each $1 worth of oil that would not have been found but for the "tax incentives." In other words, the American taxpayer was spending $10 to discover $1 worth of oil.

Naturally, the oil industry moved to attack these findings. The Mid-Continent Oil & Gas Association spearheaded the attack by delivering an alleged critique of the report to the Ways and Means Committee.

Because this Mid-Continent response has gotten wide publicity I think that CONSAD's rebuttal also ought to be be given a hearing and thus ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

If the Mid-Continent response is the best the oil industry can do, Congress is under an affirmative obligation to change the tax laws to eliminate all these special favors at the expense of the ordinary taxpayer.

I ask unanimous consent that the attached CONSAD report be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"COMMENTS ON MID-CONTINENT (MC) OIL AND GAS ASSOCIATION CRITIQUE

"I. Introduction

"The critique and evaluation of the CONSAD report entitled, "The Economic Factors Affecting the Level of Domestic Petroleum Reserves," by the Mid-Continent Oil and Gas Association is so replete with inconsistencies and out-of-context references that it appears to be an outright attempt to obfuscate, confuse, and mislead.

"The MC report is notably lacking in constructive criticism. At no point does the report indicate how the CONSAD model might be improved, how the data might be improved, or what alternative methods and models, might be used for analysis to develop more accurate estimates of the effects of the special tax provisions. This suggests that perhaps the authors prefer to have no analysis made.

"The inability of the MC report to find any serious fault with the CONSAD report conclusions after apparently concerted study only serves to increase the credibility of these conclusions.

"The covering letter contains a glaring inconsistency, which is repeated in the body of the report. In paragraph three, the MC cover letter implies that the CONSAD model is erroneous because when extrapolated to below-cost prices it indicates that firms would continue to find and develop reserves. In paragraph five, the CONSAD report is deprecated for extrapolating a considerably smaller amount. Thus, the MC report indicates that extrapolation beyond the range of the data is justification for placing no credence on the results, then proceeds to extrapolate even further to illustrate the 'inappropriateness' of the CONSAD model. The MC report also seriously overstates the amount of CONSAD's extrapolation. The price change equivalent to the elimination of percentage depletion is about 35 cents (not 75 cents as stated in the MC report) which is a comparatively small extrapolation—the largest year-to-year price change in the data was 30 cents.

"II. Objectives of CONSAD study

"The CONSAD study was designed to evaluate the efficiency of the special tax provisions in encouraging petroleum producers to maintain reserves above those necessary to support current production. The primary justification voiced in recent years in defense of the special tax provisions regarding the petroleum industry was the necessity of encouraging a large reserve level to insure adequate supplies of oil in time of a sudden increase in demand due to a national emergency.

"Although the MC statement of a fixed technology relationship between reserves and production is not supported by available data, the existence of such a relationship would not prevent producers from maintaining excess reserve stocks if economic incentives were offered to encourage this. The CONSAD study was aimed at determining the effectiveness of the special tax provisions in increasing oil reserves above those levels needed solely to support production.

"The conclusions of the study that the special tax provisions were inefficient means for achieving such an objective remains a valid conclusion. Throughout the study, CONSAD took pains to inflate the effectiveness of the special tax provisions as an incentive for holding reserves. Consequently, if better data became available, its analysis would probably show that these tax provisions were even less efficient than is concluded by the CONSAD report.

"If the intent of the special tax provisions is to encourage consumption of petroleum products by keeping prices below their free market levels, the CONSAD study offers no evidence as to the effectiveness of the tax provisions.

"It is very possible that petroleum production will decrease if the special tax benefits are reduced or eliminated. Such a decrease would take place if the producers passed the added tax burden on to consumers and consumers then reduced their consumption. A decrease might also occur if producers were currently producing at the limit of available capacity, since the tax increase would make marginal wells unprofitable to operate. Such a producer-initiated decrease might not occur if production restrictions, such as allowable production days, or relaxed, allowing more efficient production from existing wells.

"III. Specific comments on the MC report

"Examination of many of the allegations made in the MC report leads only to the conclusion that the authors of this report either (a) did not read the CONSAD report, (b) did not understand the CONSAD report or the economic theory on which it is based, or (c) both. The concluding statement in the summary says that 'The model used is especially subject to criticism because it is based on the improper assumption that industry exploration and development expenditures are not dependent on an adequate rate of return.' No such assumption is either explicit or implicit in the CONSAD models, and such a statement implies a rathe xtreme lack of knowledge of the contents of the CONSAD report.

"The technique of quote-out-of-context is used on page two of the MC report to attempt to invalidate the supportive evidence of CONSAD's third model. What the CONSAD report actually stated was that the quantitative estimates obtained from the model of the individual firm could not be used as estimates of industry reaction, since all the various types of firms in the industry were not represented in the model.

"The CONSAD report stated that the third model would substantiate the first model if the indicated reserve changes were of the same order of magnitude, and were changes in the same direction. The results obtained from the third model did substantiate the results of the first (or neoclassical) model.

"Surprisingly enough, after indicating that only the first CONSAD model was worthy of comment, much of the MC report is devoted to specific criticisms of minor points concerning the other models discussed in the CONSAD report.

"On the question of uncertainty, the MC report is somewhat erroneous in stating that the CONSAD report assumes perfect knowledge. The report does not assume this, nor is such an assumption implicit in the methodology.

"Another out-of-context quote is provided on page 15, where Eisner's objections to Jorgensen's model are noted. The remainder of Eisner's article goes on to propose modifications in Jorgensen's model similar to those used by CONSAD (the CONSAD model is credited to the Eisner article quoted in the MC report).

"The MC report appears completely confused on page 21, where the CONSAD report is taken to task for using a 12:1 reserve ratio in the model. The 12:1 reserve ratio figure is not, of course, used anywhere in the model. It is mentioned as historical background, but the data used in the model were actual reported reserves and production.

"The MC report seems confused again on page 31 when it indicates that 'this approach leads CONSAD to compare the price of a full barrel of reserves with the cost of only a fraction of a barrel.' This is not true, but as the MC report offers no explanation of its statement, no comment can be made.

"There are two important points to be made concerning the 'apparently incorrect information,' cited in the MC report (Section IV). The first of these is that careful reading of the report would make it quite clear that all of the items cited were presented as background information in the study and do not form the basis for any results derived therein. The second of these is that, with one exception, the statements in the CONSAD report were true when the data was being collected and the report was being written. The use of 1968 data, which were obviously not available when the report was written, (the study involved over a year of continuous effort) to illustrate the 'incorrectness' of statements in the CONSAD report cannot be interpreted in any other way than as an obvious attempt to discredit the CONSAD report, since anyone with any knowledge of the petroleum industry would be aware of the basic sources of the CONSAD statements.

"Most of the discussions in Section V, Doubtful Petroleum Economics, is replete with the same sort of out-of-context quoting of the rest of the MC report. The only relevant information presented here is that in reference to Professor McDonald's work on the non-neutrality of a flat-rate corporate income tax. It is interesting to note the omission from the MC report of Professor McDonald's conclusion that a percentage depletion rate of 14% would provide the desired neutrality.

"Professor McDonald's work, however, does not examine the efficiency of percentage depletion as a method for compensating the non-neutrality of the flat-rate corporate income tax. It is certainly possible, and a subject worthy of further study, that some more direct method of compensating investors for the risk elements in petroleum investments would provide the desired neutrality at a much lower cost to the economy.

"IV. Conclusion

"CONSAD would welcome some meaningful critiques of its work, with the ultimate objective of imposing the reliability of the conclusions. Unfortunately, the Mid-Continent report is totally useless for this purpose."

CRITIQUE OF CONSAD'S REBUTTAL

The Senior Senator from Wisconsin inserted in the November 13th Congressional Record a reply by the CONSAD Research Corporation to a critique by the Mid-Continental Oil and Gas Association of an earlier CONSAD report. He seemed to think that the CONSAD rebuttal was a definitive response negating the value of the Mid-Continent criticism. On the contrary, the CONSAD response confirmed the basic thrust of the industry's criticism of CONSAD. I am submitting for the record at the conclusion of my remarks a point-by-point analysis of the CONSAD rebuttal.

Before inserting this analysis, I would like to comment briefly on the main thrust of the Mid-Continent critique and CONSAD's reply thereto. Mid-Continent said that CONSAD actually answered the following question: "In the event that percentage depletion were eliminated, what would happen to the level of reserves desired for a given level of production, assuming that this level of production would continue?" Here is what the CONSAD rebuttal says on this crucial point:

"The CONSAD study was aimed at determining the effectiveness of the special tax provisions in increasing the reserves above those levels needed solely to support production." (Emphasis added)

The CONSAD study simply purports to tell us whether percentage depletion stimulates the holding of any additional reserves over those technologically needed to support a particular level of production—and never mind whether it is economic for the industry to produce that level of output. Their study does not attempt to tell us what would happen to the level of United States petroleum production and reserves after the full effect of elimination of percentage depletion were felt. CONSAD has, therefore, admitted the truth of the basic Mid-Continent argument.

In my opinion, CONSAD's question is trivial. As has been amply demonstrated in the hearings of the Committee on Finance, the petroleum industry earns a below-average rate of return. Under these conditions, it is a matter of simple economic logic that an increase in tax cannot be absorbed by the industry in the long run. Hence, a tax increase will ultimately lead to a reduction in the level of production (and, accordingly, in the level of reserves)—provided, of course, that the tax increase is not offset by a price increase. (CONSAD assumed that there would be no price increase.) Thus, by assuming no change in production, CONSAD has given us an answer to a highly hypothetical question which has little, if any, relevance in the real world.

Mr. President, the question of real significance to the national interest is not whether, at a particular level of output, somewhat less reserves would be held without depletion than with. The real question is how much less would be produced without depletion than with. How much would the overall level of activity in the industry ultimately decline if percentage depletion were eliminated? (We can measure activity either by annual production or by the level of reserves required to support that amount of production.)

I should like to call to the attention of the Senate two studies which did attempt to answer this kind of question. One was by Professor Edward Erickson, who appraised past response of oil discoveries to changes in price. A recently updated version of his study estimated—on the basis of past response—that supply in the industry would ultimately change in proportion to a change in price. That is, a 27.5% decrease in price would ultimately cause a 27.5% decrease in production and reserves.

In testimony before the Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, the Board Chairman of an American oil company revealed the results of a study by their geologists of future drilling prospects in the United States. The geologists estimated that supply in the industry would ultimately change considerably more than a change in price—about two thirds more. Thus, a 27.5% decrease in price would ultimately cause about a 46% decrease in production and reserves.

It is not surprising that both of these answers far exceed the 3% reduction in desired reserves which CONSAD estimated for a particular level of output if that output were produced, since CONSAD did not attempt to determine how much would be produced.

Let me sum up, Mr. President. CONSAD did not evaluate the question they are widely believed to have evaluated, namely the ultimate long run effect on the industry of eliminating percentage depletion. Professor Brickson's independent study of the past shows a percentage decline in production equal to a percentage decrease in price. An exhaustive study of the future by experts from the petroleum industry shows an even larger decline based on an economic appraisal of the prospects expected to be available.

Mr. President, I hope that my review of the situation will put this controversy to rest once and for all. At this point I will place in the record my comments on the CONSAD rebuttal to which I referred in my opening remarks. My analysis is presented setting forth statements made in the CONSAD rebuttal with relevant observations based on the Mid-Continent Oil and Gas Association critique of the original CONSAD report.

ANALYSIS OF CONSAD REBUTTAL OF CRITICISM OF EARLIER CONSAD REPORT PREPARED BY MID-CONTINENT OIL AND GAS ASSOCIATION

CONSAD statement 1: "The MC report is notably lacking in constructive criticism."

Comment 1: The MC report was constructive in that it attempted to point out the question that is relevant for public policy in this area. Beyond this it attempted to point out the problems inherent in using the available industry data for scholarly empirical research. Under the circumstances, suggestions as to how to improve an analysis that was directed towards answering an irrelevant question could hardly be considered constructive.

CONSAD statement 2: "The inability of the MC report to find any serious fault with the CONSAD report conclusions after apparently concerted study only serves to increase the credibility of these conclusions."

Comment 2: At the time, it seemed sufficient to point out that whatever CONSAD's conclusions they were irrelevant since they answered an irrelevant question. Since that time, however, a number of researchers have addressed the relevant question and in general, their findings support the industry view that a significant change in percentage depletion would produce a substantial reduction in production and reserves.

CONSAD statement 3: ". . . the MC report indicates that extrapolation beyond the range of the data is justification for placing no credence in the results, then proceeds to extrapolate even further to illustrate the "inappropriateness" of CONSAD's model."

Comment 3: Extrapolation affects primarily the statistician's confidence in his results. Since CONSAD's analysis required it to extrapolate far beyond the range of historical data, there can be little statistical confidence in its precise statistical results. The question of the appropriateness of CONSAD's model has its roots in the logical structure of that model. Totally apart from questions of data, the model that CONSAD tested is inappropriate in part because it is not designed to exclude the possibility that the industry will want to hold reserves in the long run even if price is less than cost.

CONSAD statement 4: "The price change equivalent to the elimination of percentage depletion is about 35 cents (not 75 cents as stated in the MC report) which is a comparatively small extrapolation—the largest year-to-year price change in the data was 30 cents."

Comment 4: 27½% of $2.93 (CONSAD's assumed wellhead price) is $.81, but the net effect of percentage depletion is reduced somewhat by the 50% of net limitation and by the loss of cost depletion when percentage depletion is taken. Hence, about $.75 is correct.

CONSAD statement 5: "The CONSAD study was aimed at determining the effectiveness of the special tax provisions in increasing reserves above those levels needed solely to support production . . . If the intent of the special tax provisions is to encourage consumption of petroleum products by keeping prices below their free market levels, the CONSAD study offers no evidence as to the effectiveness of the tax provisions."

Comment 5: The principal point of the MC critique was that CONSAD's question, the question of the effect of depletion on the quantity of reserves the industry would want to hold for a given level of production, assuming that that level of production would be produced, is "basically trivial and is not the question that is relevant for public policy."

As noted in the MC report "The question of real public policy significance is one having two parts. First, what quantity of output would firms want to produce at various prices? And second, what level of reserves is implied by those levels of output?"

These questions have been addressed in a number of responsible studies. As CONSAD's statement implies, they were not addressed nor can they be addressed using the CONSAD methodology.

CONSAD statement 6: "The concluding statement in the summary says that 'The model used is especially subject to criticism because it is based on the improper assumption that industry exploration and development expenditures are not dependent on an adequate rate of return.' No such assumption is either explicit or implicit in the CONSAD models and such a statement implies a rather extreme lack of knowledge of the CONSAD report."

Comment 6: CONSAD's failure to recognize the rate of return implications of a model that allows for continued long run production even though price is less than cost implies a "rather extreme lack of knowledge" of (a) its model, (b) fundamental economic principles or (c) the real world.

CONSAD statement 7: "The results obtained from (CONSAD's) third model did substantiate the results of the first (or neoclassical) model."

Comment 7: Several comments are possible on this point: First, the neoclassical model (inadequately) answers an irrelevant question. If the third model substantiates the first it is not clear that CONSAD's case is advanced.

Second, even if the neoclassical model had been directed toward the relevant question, there is no escaping the fact that the magnitude, rather than the direction of the response is the significant consideration. Since the third model is not statistically significant, it can offer nothing in the way of verification for the magnitudes shown by the first.

CONSAD statement 8: ". . . much of the MC report is devoted to specific criticisms of minor points concerning the other models discussed in the CONSAD report."

Comment 8: If a defense of thoroughness is necessary, the reason why the second and third models were criticized is that both appear to offer far more promise than the one which CONSAD used for its conclusions—and both received extensive treatment in the CONSAD report.

CONSAD statement 9: ". . . the MC report is somewhat erroneous in stating that the CONSAD report assumes perfect knowledge. The report does not assume this . . ."

Comment 9: Not only does the CONSAD neoclassical model assume perfect knowledge it assumes that all petroleum reserves are homogeneous and that new reserves can be added simply by going to a warehouse and taking them down from the shelf.

CONSAD statement 10: "(the CONSAD model is credited to the Eisner article quoted in the MC report)."

Comment 10: The CONSAD neoclassical model adopts only Eisner's version of the production function. Additional problems common to the Jorgenson and Eisner studies are embodied and exacerbated in the CONSAD formulation.

CONSAD statement 11: "The MC report appears confused . . . where the CONSAD report is taken to task for using a 12:1 reserve ratio in the model."

Comment 11: The MC point was that since the CONSAD methodology was sensitive to technological change, and since CONSAD was (or should have been) aware that technology was changing, as evidenced by its references to changing reserve production ratios, CONSAD should have made some attempt to take changing technology into account or to qualify its conclusions accordingly.

CONSAD statement 12: "The MC report seems confused again on page 31 when it indicates that 'this approach leads CONSAD to compare the price of a full barrel of reserves with the cost of only a fraction of a barrel.'"

Comment 12: The MC critique noted that CONSAD appeared to have compared the price of a full barrel of reserves with the "user cost" of that same barrel spread out over the life of the well. CONSAD has yet to offer an explanation or justification for its strange and, in our view, inappropriate formulation.

CONSAD statement 13: "The use of 1968 data, which were obviously not available when the report was written . . . to illustrate the incorrectness of statements in the CONSAD report cannot be interpreted in any other way than as an obvious attempt to discredit the CONSAD report . . ."

Comment 13: Viewed somewhat less defensively, the use of 1968 data can indeed be used to "illustrate the incorrectness of statements in the CONSAD report . . ." In the first place, the CONSAD model assumes that the industry is in long-run equilibrium. If the 1968 data differ substantially from the 1966 data used in the CONSAD report, then clearly the industry was not in long-run equilibrium and CONSAD's model is inappropriate. In the second place, even if the model were somehow appropriate, the fact that the 1968 data differ from the 1966 data implies that the results, if valid for 1966, would not be valid for 1968, 1969, or for the 1970's—the period that is relevant for public policy. In short, conditions in the industry have changed dramatically since the CON SAD base years; hence, those years are of doubtful value for predicting the future.

Mr. LONG. I personally think that the economists and the experts in the Interior Department and other petroleum economists who feel that the report is completely unsound and who feel that the logic is so completely discredited that the report does not deserve our consideration should have their side of the matter printed as well as the side of those who would like to place most emphasis upon the report.

I point out that Mr. Collado's letter has been used by the Senator from Wisconsin in a fashion in which he would not want to have it used.

The Senator noted only one aspect of the matter. He noted that Mr. Collado was not referring to the factors which one could call collateral in any respect at all.

He pointed out that there would be a reduction in production if the depletion allowance were cut, but that certainly a company could be expected to continue to produce from its present reserves and the discoveries it had already made. However, the reduction that would occur over a period extending to the year 1985 would cause this Nation to be producing 1,400,000 barrels a day less, or more than 20 billion gallons a year less, than we would be producing otherwise.

Second, Mr. Collado in that same statement pointed out that there are a lot of other factors that we really could not get precise estimates on, factors such as the effect of a reduction in cash flow on the incentive to invest and produce.

One thought was that we could not really estimate what the effect of it would be, but that anyone could tell us that, if we tax an industry to the extent that it is not profitable to explore for more oil, there will be less exploration for oil. And that will probably result in a major reduction of drilling and of the discovery of new production in this country.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the memorandums I have prepared in this connection be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorandums were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM ON MISINTERPRETATION OF MR. COLLADO'S LETTER TO MR. AREEDA

Mr. President, I would like to point out to the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin that he has misunderstood Mr. Collado's projections and that an incorrect conclusion is being drawn from them.

First, the projection shows that if percentage depletion were cut to 20%, domestic crude oil production is 1985 would be 1,400,000 barrels a day lower than if depletion were maintained at 27½%. This is not a trivial reduction; it amounts to over half a billion barrels or 20 billion gallons a year.

This drop of over 10% in domestic production would have a serious impact on the economies of domestic producing areas but, of more importance, it would increase our dependence on the Middle East. The simple fact is that only the Middle East has the capacity to make up a shortage of the magnitude that such a cut in depletion would entail. I, for one, think it would be sheer folly to expose further our economic health—indeed, our national security—to political developments in that volatile area. The added tax revenues—if there would be any in the long run—would simply be inadequate to justify such additional risk.

Secondly, Mr. President, I would like to note that Mr. Collado's projections have been interpreted without consideration of the qualifications indicated by him in prefacing his remarks.

In the explanation of his projections, Mr. Collado stated that no weight was given to the resulting reduction of cash within the industry, or the loss of interest by prospective investors, which would follow any reduction in the depletion rate. The reason no weight was given to these losses of investment capital was because, while they are sure to happen, a determination of the exact amount is highly speculative. His projections were limited to numbers which can be obtained from production economies. He merely called to the attention of the task force the resulting danger of capital losses normally flowing into the exploratory branch of oil operations so that they might use their own judgment as to its magnitude.

In my personal judgment, Mr. President, the impact of reduced cash flow and loss of investor confidence would have a greater impact on exploration and production than would the change in the producing economics to which Mr. Collado limited his observations.

Finally, Mr. President, it has been pointed out that the figures show that a cut in depletion would not lead to lower production until 1974. This situation is purely fortuitous, and comes about for two simple reasons.

One is that there is some spare producing capacity today—spare capacity which has proved valuable during periods of supply disruption. This spare capacity will ultimately disappear, but if depletion is cut, it will disappear more rapidly. But, for a few years, we can live on this spare if we choose to pay no heed to the future.

Another important factor is the recent discovery of new reserves in Alaska. This field, now that it has been discovered, will probably be developed whether depletion is reduced or not. But the important fact is, Mr. President, that without depletion you can be sure that the industry would never have undertaken such an extremely expensive search for oil in the hostile Alaskan environment.

The cut in depletion which is being proposed now—and erroneously justified by faulty interpretation of Mr. Collado's projections—will surely result in declining exploration and the loss to us of possible future finds like Alaska.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, furthermore the statement was made that other countries do not have depletion allowances. I point out that they have incentives which exceed those that we have. And they have incentives of various degrees to encourage people to go into the business of producing their essential requirements.

I ask unanimous consent that there be printed at this point in the RECORD the material appearing on page 4451 through the middle of 4454 to indicate what other countries are doing to find their requirements for oil and gas in those countries.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF INCENTIVES GRANTED BY FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS IN REGARD TO THE PRODUCTION OF OIL AND GAS UNDER PETROLEUM AND/OR TAX LAWS

ARGENTINA

Immediate deduction is allowed for exploration costs as well as amortization thereof. And option is available to deduct exploration expenses and normal depreciation on capital assets against non-petroleum activities.

AUSTRALIA

Recovery of expenditures.—A taxpayer is permitted to recover allowable capital expenditures in regard to exploration and producing activities before any production income becomes subject to income tax. This provision accumulates expenditures for formation, exploration/development and production as deductions against future income from the sale of petroleum production. Income tax is thus postponed until the deductions have been fully offset against producing sales. A petroleum exploration company is allowed to transfer the tax deduction for any producing or exploration expenditures from itself to its shareholders. In this way, the shareholder can claim the deduction for the stock investment in a petroleum exploration company against current taxable income and the deferred deduction of the exploration company is correspondingly reduced.

Partial additional deduction for investment.—A deduction for ⅓ of the "calls" on shares to the stockholder investing in the exploration venture is allowed. Since the exploration company may claim a tax deduction for its expenditures, this will result in an aggregate deduction of 133⅓% between the company and its shareholders.

Direct subsidies.—Subsidies are also used to create favorable conditions for petroleum exploration activities. Originally limited to a subsidy of ½ the cost of a company's approved-stratigraphic drilling program; now extended to include off structure drilling, detailed structure drilling, borehole surveys, and geophysical surveys employing magnetic, seismic, gravimetric or other physical methods of obtaining petroleum exploration information. Both past and future subsidies are not taxable, but the taxpayer's deduction for exploration expenditures has to be reduced by the amount of subsidy received. The government now pays up to 30% of the cost of all geophysical surveys and test drilling operations. In the case of stratigraphic drilling the limit is 40%.

BELGIUM

Allows producers a tax-free reserve limited to 50% of the taxable profits from production. Such reserves must be reinvested within 5 years.

BRITISH HONDURAS

Allows percentage depletion of 27½% of gross income limited to 50% of net petroleum income after royalties but before depletion. Intangible drilling costs are deductible when incurred, limited to 50% of net petroleum after royalties but before depletion.

CANADA

Allows percentage depletion at 33⅓% of overall profits. All drilling, exploration and general operating costs on a company-wide basis must be deducted before depletion is computed.

COLOMBIA

Allows normal percentage depletion of 10% of the gross value of production less any royalties or participations, limited to 35% of net income before depletion. In addition, a special depletion allowance, computed on the same base, of 18% in the East and Southeast Region, and 15% in the rest of the country, is also allowed. The total of normal and special depletion is limited to 50% of net taxable income in the East and Southeast Region and to 45% in the rest of the country. Amounts allowed as special depletion must be reinvested within three years in petroleum related facilities. Failure to reinvest results in their restoration to taxable income, but over-investment may be carried forward to apply against future reinvestment obligations.

FRANCE

Allows producers a reserve equal to 27½% of the gross value at the wellhead of the crude oil extracted. This reserve is limited to 50% of the net profit from production and from the first stage of processing in the producer's own refineries. For the tax exemption to be retained such amounts must be reinvested within 5 years, either in the way of fixed assets or research work for new discoveries of oil or gas, or by making investments in certain companies approved by the government. If not reinvested within this time limit, the reserve is required to be restored to the taxable profits of the fiscal year during which such 5-year period expires, and taxed as ordinary income.

GERMANY

German (domestic) oil companies operating outside Germany could obtain through December 31, 1968 low interest loans in amounts of up to 75% of the costs of exploration. Such loans were repayable only when commercial production was obtained. Exploration for or production of oil during the years 1959 to 1962 was a prerequisite. There is a new government incentive for foreign operations which was signed on July 7, 1969, effective for the years 1969 through 1974. Under the new proposal a total of DM 575 million will be allocated under a loan scheme. Loans will be granted up to 75% of exploration expenditures and if there is no discovery, no repayment will be required. Even with discovery, up to 50% of the loan can be waived under certain circumstances. If the financial situation warrants it, the plan contemplates a non-repayable contribution of up to 30% of the costs of acquiring a productive field or shares in a producing company. To be eligible under this new plan, the company must be domiciled in Germany and have produced petroleum in Germany or been processing petroleum within Germany prior to January 1, 1969. Loans will not be granted if the enterprise can reasonably be expected to finance itself. However, it is expected that if a group of the major German-controlled companies form a new company to explore overseas, this new company will not be considered able to finance itself. Until January 1, 1970, oil and gas companies are permitted to write off drilling costs, geological and geophysical expenditures, dry holes, etc., immediately against other income, whether a branch or subsidiary is used. An oil company can also write down its investment in a foreign subsidiary. When production is achieved the investment must be restored, but this restoration can be written off on a very liberal basis. Presumably this legislation will be extended.

GUATEMALA

Allow percentage depletion of 27½% of gross income, limited to 50% of net income. Exploration and intangible drilling costs can be expensed. Losses can be carried forward indefinitely.

GUYANA

Allows percentage depletion and deduction of intangible drilling costs at a "reasonable" level as established by the Commissioner.

HONDURAS

Allows percentage depletion of 25% of gross production, limited to 50% of net taxable profits. Exploration expenses as well as intangible drilling costs can be expensed. Losses can be carried forward for ten years.

ISRAEL

Allows percentage depletion of 27½% of gross income, limited to 50% of net income.

JAPAN

Allows percentage depletion for companies conducting petroleum exploration, subject to a recapture to the extent that, within a 3-year period, an amount equivalent to the deduction has not been invested in further exploration. The amount is 15% of sales revenue, limited to 50% of net income. A current deduction of intangible drilling and development costs for unsuccessful wells is also provided. These incentives apply to both domestic and overseas exploration.

Overseas incentive.—The government has organized the Petroleum Development Public Corporation (PDPC) as a government-owned entity for the purpose of channeling government funds into exploration and production in order to promote the development of petroleum resources and to ensure stabilized supplies of petroleum.

The PDPC accomplishes these objectives by:

(1) Making investments and loans necessary for petroleum exploration in overseas areas,

(2) Guaranteeing debt resulting from loans necessary for overseas petroleum exploration and production,

(3) Leasing equipment required for oil exploration, and

(4) Giving technological guidance on oil exploration and production.

The loans referred to in (1) are extended on favorable terms and repayment is required only if the venture financed is successful. Loans amounts may be as high as 50% of the cost of the undertaking, and joint exploration ventures by Japanese and foreign companies, in which the Japanese interest is at least 50%, may also receive these benefits. To date, the PDPC has committed itself to extend financial support to exploration ventures in Alaska, Southeast Asia, and the Persian gulf.

Domestic incentives.—Presently, the government is in the process of developing a policy to actively encourage development of domestic oil and gas reserves. There is in effect a duty rebate system for certain offtakers of indigenous crude. There has been pressure on the government to extend the above PDPC incentives to domestic production, consequently, the government is now reviewing this possibility.

NICARAGUA

Allows percentage depletion of 27½% of wellhead value less royalties, limited to 50% of net taxable income before depletion. Intangible drilling costs and dry hole costs are deductible once production is attained. Losses may be carried forward ten years.

NIGERIA

Exploration losses, intangible drilling costs and dry holes can be expensed. Losses may be carried forward indefinitely.

NORWAY

The govenrment may grant companies engaged in the exploration and exploitation of offshore oil and gas deposits the right to carry losses forward over a 15-year period rather than the normal 10-year period.

PAKISTAN

Allows percentage depletion at the rate of 15% of the wellhead value, subject to a maximum of 50% of net income.

PERU

Allows percentage depletion from 15% to 27½% of the gross value of production (adjusted for transportation in certain areas) depending on whether a national or foreign company is involved and the region in which production is located. A foreign company with production in the Coastal Region is limited to 50% of net profit after deducting depletion and the 20% minimum advance payment of income tax. All others are limited to 50% of net profit before deduction of depletion and the advance payment of income tax. Deduction for intangible drilling costs is also allowable.

PHILIPPINE REPUBLIC

Allows percentage depletion of 27½% based on gross income, after an amount equal to any rents or royalties paid or incurred in respect to the property has been deducted.

SABAH

Allows percentage depletion at rates deemed reasonable by the Commissioner.

SPAIN

Allows percentage depletion of 25% of the field value of production less royalties, but limited to 40% of the net profit before deducting depletion: Similar rules apply in the Spanish Sahara.

ST. MAARTEN

Allows percentage depletion at rates deemed reasonable by the Commissioner.

TRINIDAD AND TOBAGO

Allows percentage depletion of 20% of the gross value of production of submarine wells limited to 40% of income without the deduction of certain specified allowances.

TURKEY

Allows percentage depletion of 27½% of the gross income from production after deducting rentals and royalties, limited to 50% of net income before deduction of depletion.

UNITED KINGDOM

Cash grants of 20% (40% in certain onshore areas) for oil and gas operations onshore and offshore are available generally as follows:

(1) Geological and geophysical expenses are usually eligible for grant except for the cost of general surveys to determine whether or not to begin exploration in an area.

(2) Lease acquisition costs are not eligible.

(3) Exploration, evaluation and production drilling costs qualify.

(4) Production equipment, certain pipelines and drilling platforms including overheads qualify.

In effect all exploration and drilling expenses (not in excess of investment grants) incurred prior to proving reserves may be expensed. Thereafter until production is achieved, both tangible and intangible drilling costs are capitalized and amortized on a unit of production basis. After production is achieved, tangible costs are still capitalized and amortized, but intangible costs are expensed. Losses may be carried forward for an unlimited number of years. All of the foregoing items that require capitalization must be so treated because only an item that is capitalized is eligible for an investment grant. If for any reason an investment grant is not received, such items may be expensed.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, I listened with great interest to the colloquy between the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Connecticut. I point out that the Senator from Connecticut remembers that in the presidential election of last fall, Vice President Humphrey was asked whether he favored a reduction in the 27.5 percent depletion. And his answer was "No." His reason was that if this depletion allowance were reduced very materially, it would certainly mean increased consumer costs. And with all due deference to my friend, the Senator from Connecticut, I do not believe anyone is more consumer minded than Vice President Humphrey.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, it becomes very obvious, with all due respect to former Vice President Humphrey, that he was running for election. And he was seeking the votes of the oil States in the same way that President Nixon was seeking the votes of the oil States. Without question, the oil industry is a powerful lobby.

The distinguished chairman, for whom I have the highest respect, made some slighting remarks concerning the CONSAD report. However, this report comes under the auspices of the Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Finance.

In that report it says that the elimination of the depletion allowance would reduce the Nation's oil reserve by only 7 percent.

The report continued by saying that only $150 million of oil is found each year which would not be discovered if we abolished the depletion allowance.

In other words the percentage depletion allowance, which costs about $1.6 billion annually returns only $150 million in new reserves.

Furthermore, I cannot understand—and I have the highest respect for the chairman of the Committee and for the Senator from Iowa—when we are talking about closing loopholes, why, Atlantic Richfield between 1964 and 1967 did not pay a single penny of Federal income taxes on earnings of $465 million.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 1 minute?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I think this shows what is wrong with the oil depletion tax rules and regulations. What we are trying to do and what we are supposed to do is write a tax reform bill, and we are not doing it.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 1 minute?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired. Who yields time?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I require at the moment.

With regard to the so-called CONSAD report, that was a report from some private research group commissioned by someone in the Treasury Department. It has nothing to do with the Committee on Finance.

This Congress authorized that the document be printed. I had not even seen the document. I do not know anyone in the Finance Committee who is familiar with the report. It is a document that someone had compiled. Since that time, it has been studied. And the people in the Department of the Interior think that it is fallacious, erroneous, and unreliable.

The people in the oil and gas industry point out a great many reasons why they think it is wrong.

One of the responsible experts in the Department of the Interior notes that there are more than 70 editorial discrepancies in the document.

I have a statement provided by the Department of the Interior, a Department in which the people are supposed to know something about this matter, rather than a statement coming from the outside, from an independent research group that is studying something that they know very little about.

The statement says in part:

> The present report is something of an intellectual and verbal jungle that requires intense study if any meaning is to be extracted. We find the CONSAD study unsatisfactory.

It all winds up with the same conclusion, that the findings of this report are wrong.

A memorandum I have inserted in the RECORD points out some of the glaring errors in the report. When the report makes mistakes that are very striking, it becomes noncredulous and meaningless. I have listed 13 of those striking errors that no one can argue about.

So, if they are wrong on 13 of their basic assumptions and wind up anywhere near the target, it would be an accident such as Columbus discovering a new world thinking that he had discovered India.

One would not know whether it was right or wrong, because so many things are obviously wrong about it.

Someone said something about Atlantic Richfield making money and paying no taxes. I would assume that most of that money was made from overseas development and that they were entitled to a tax credit for it.

Someone said, "Let us eliminate foreign tax credit." The Treasury Department estimated how much we would make out of that. We would make very little money. The foreign governments would make money. And hopefully, we would make $2 million for our Government in the first year. After that, the other governments would raise their taxes and keep the money for their treasuries. We would not get anything.

We would lose a lot of money, including the taxes that Americans pay on oil development overseas.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I had promised to yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Oklahoma. I yield first to the Senator from Oklahoma.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. BELLMON. Mr. President, I have been very interested in the comments about the amount of taxes oil companies pay.

I have the figures for my State of Oklahoma. In my State only the oil industry pays a gross reduction tax. We get no gross reduction tax from other industry.

But the oil companies—the oil industry—pay to the State of Oklahoma $44.8 million of gross production taxes every year. This is the largest single source of income to our State's general fund, and if we do not get this sort of income from the oil companies, it simply means that the State of Oklahoma will not be able to meet its responsibilities and will have to turn more to the Federal Government for help, as has already happened in too many cases.

This is only one of the very small cases showing that the oil industry does meet its responsibilities; and even though it may not pay as much Federal income tax as other industries, it is paying more than its share, as the chart shown by the distinguished Senator from Louisiana has demonstrated.

About 2 weeks ago, at a meeting of the Subcommittee on Minerals, Materials, and Fuels of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, the Federal Power Commission testified that a decrease in the depletion allowance from 27½ to 23 percent would mean that the Federal Power Commission would immediately be required, by its rules and the laws under which it operates, to order an increase in the cost of natural gas to consumers in the amount of 4 cents per thousand cubic feet.

The FPC is required to set a price that will give the companies a sufficient income to continue in business and to make a reasonable profit.

When we talk about cutting back on the depletion allowance, we are simply talking about raising the cost of the product to the consumer, and I believe we should not overlook that fact as we vote today.

To me, the significant point here is that even though the companies raise their price of the product—which they are certain to do and in this way continue to be profitable, as they must be if they are going to continue in business—there is no assurance that the funds they receive from these increased product prices will go into oil exploration; whereas, because of the 27½ percent depletion allowance, the companies and individuals who invest in the oil industry have been encouraged to continue exploring reserves for the future.

Senators must keep in mind that when we talk about changing what is not a loophole or any kind of tax escape but rather an incentive, we are talking about decreasing the incentive for the continuation of oil exploration, and we are talking about reducing the country's oil reserves for the future.

I believe sincerely that the 27½ percent depletion allowance has served a good purpose. I believe that, in the long run, it is going to be in the best interests of this country to see it maintained. If it is cut to 20 percent, as the Senator from Delaware proposes to do, it is going to weaken the industry irreparably.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware has 11 minutes remaining.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, it seems to me that we have met all the other arguments against reducing the oil depletion allowance. But the Senator from Louisiana now comes up with a series of charts that purport to show the oil industry is paying higher taxes than other manufacturing industries as a whole.

I have tried my best, and my staff people have tried, to find out the source of that information. One of the important things in these debates, when we use this information, is to find out who provided it. I asked the staff of the distinguished Senator from Louisiana, and they did not know. I understand the oil industry itself may have supplied this information. We have tried to get details on this information. We have been told, when we have tried, that this information is not for public record, that it is not going to be fully disclosed.

I should like to tell the Members of the Senate—and I have the charts if they would like to see them——

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. That information is in the record, and I will make it available to the Senator before the day is out.

Mr. PROXMIRE. What is the source? The petroleum industry?

Mr. LONG. I will find the source for the Senator.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LONG. The Senator has never challenged it before, and he and I debated this matter before, as he knows.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The SEC does have a record of the percent of taxes—Federal taxes, State taxes, foreign taxes—paid by the oil companies in the country as a percentage of their income. I have that right here. It is true that they have to say "some of the taxes," because the oil companies do not disclose all the taxes when they file with the SEC. But on the basis of the only official governmental source we can get—and this is all the big oil companies in the country—I submit that they pay, on the average, 10, 12, and in some years as much as 15 percent of their income in State, Federal, local, and foreign taxes all together. I have this information available, if anyone wishes to check it.

Furthermore, my staff did make a study of the one company which the Senator from Louisiana's people were able to make available to my staff—Atlantic Richfield—to find out how large a tax they paid as a percentage of their income. In terms of Federal taxes, they paid none; State and foreign taxes, 8.6 percent; severance, production, and property taxes, 18.5 percent. When that is added up, it totals approximately 27.1 percent of their net income. This is less than the percentage that nonoil companies, the other companies, paid to the Federal Government in Federal income taxes alone.

When we reflect on it, we know that every manufacturing concern pays not only Federal taxes but also State taxes, local taxes, including property taxes.

So that the argument made by those who are opposed to reducing the oil depletion allowance does not stand up when we get the only official source of information that seems to be available.

I would be delighted to hear at any time from the Senator from Louisiana as to what his source is.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield, if I have time.

Mr. RIBICOFF. In 1968, the major refiners and producers paid an average of 7.7 percent of their net income in Federal taxes. The lowest individual income tax bracket is 14 percent. Does the Senator from Wisconsin think it is fair for a person who works as a laborer or as a clerk to pay a minimum tax of 14 percent when these large oil companies have an average income tax of 7.7 percent?

Mr. PROXMIRE. This dramatizes why this is a notorious loophole. Just think of that: A man making $600 of taxable income has to pay 14 percent. But the big oil companies, making hundreds of millions of dollars and in some cases billions of dollars in net profits, pay an average of 7.7 percent, or half of what the poorest income taxpayers in this country pay.

Mr. RIBICOFF. I have another statistic for the Senator's comment: In 1968, manufacturing corporations paid 40.8 percent of pretax earnings in Federal taxes. The oil corporations paid 11 percent.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Again, this dramatizes the point I have been trying to make.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, if there is to be tax reform this year—reform in deed as well as words—the excessive tax favors granted to the oil industry must be ended.

No other step will so effectively demonstrate the desire of Congress to close off tax loopholes.

The sheltered oil industry has long been the symbol of tax inequity.

Today, in this year of reform, it remains the symbol of special privilege in the tax code.

There is something wrong with our sense of fair play when our laws permit a single oil company to escape all taxation on nearly half a billion dollars of net income.

The provisions in the tax code which favor the oil industry are now familiar. Oil's unparalleled position has been established by: First, percentage depletion; second, "intangible" costs deduction; and third, foreign tax credits. Percentage depletion is a deduction of 27.5 percent of gross revenues not to exceed 50 percent of net income from a property. "Intangible" costs are all those associated with drilling other than the machinery itself. The foreign tax credit is a dollar-for-dollar write-off for all taxes paid to a foreign government.

The goal of encouraging exploration and development of petroleum reserves is a worthy object of national policy. It should be achieved, however, in a manner consistent with the tax treatment afforded other industries.

Percentage depletion enables the cost of some operations to be deducted 20 times. In effect, it gives 27.5 percent of gross revenues full immunity from Federal taxation.

"Intangibles" include any item with no salvage value—for example, expenditures related to drilling, clearing, preparing the land, or constructing the physical plant. This sum equals 75 percent of the cost of an oil well. The difference, of course, is deductible over the life of the asset.

Many companies have elected to deduct "intangibles" immediately and to take percentage depletion over the life of the facility.

These two tax devices are not merely cost recovery mechanisms. Rather, they constitute what the authoritative Treasury Department Study of 1969 calls "a substantial subsidy to the oil industry."

Substantial is hardly the word for it. This subsidy amounts to $1.6 billion annually.

The statistics are revealing.

The Federal corporate tax rate is 48 percent.

Only 44 percent to 51 percent of actual profit for the oil industry, as compared to 97 percent for other manufacturing companies, is considered taxable income.

In 1965, actual Federal income taxes as a percentage of net income was 37.5 for all industries and 21.1 for petroleum.

In 1968, the major refiners and producers paid an average of 7.7 percent of net income in Federal taxes. The lowest individual income tax bracket is 14 percent.

In 1968, manufacturing corporations paid 40.8 percent of pretax earnings in Federal taxes; oil corporations paid 11 percent.

Atlantic Richfield paid no Federal income taxes between 1964 and 1967 on earnings of $465 million. Consider the top five companies in 1967: Standard Oil of California paid 1.2 percent; Texaco, 1.9 percent; Mobil, 4.5 percent; Gulf, 7.8 percent; and Standard Oil of New Jersey, 7.9 percent of net income.

Between the depletion allowance and related loopholes, the oil import quota system, and State market proration laws, the American taxpayer is paying a subsidy in excess of $7 billion per year to the oil industry.

The oil industry has advanced one basic argument on behalf of percentage depletion: The incentives of the market place are insufficient to encourage exploration and development necessary to maintain a level of reserves adequate to potential emergencies.

However, the most recent survey shows that elimination of the depletion allowance would reduce our known reserves by only 7 percent. Further, only $150 million worth of oil would not otherwise have been discovered in a year. The Federal subsidy program which costs $1.6 billion returns $150 million in product.

Gross revenue is a most inefficient basis for an incentive to explore and develop. It emphasizes production, not search. It rewards the nonoperator as well as the operator. It favors a few companies over the rest of the industry—8.5 percent of the companies collected 99 percent of the depletion allowance in 1966.

If there must be a depletion allowance, it should be a cost depletion deduction. It should apply to those who actually explore and drill. It should also encourage the perfection of new techniques for finding and extracting petroleum.

The recent discoveries on the North Slope in Alaska have greatly increased the Nation's potential oil supply. While exact figures are unavailable at this date, the Alaskan discoveries have insured a greater reserve of petroleum products for domestic use than could have been envisioned only a few years ago.

Additionally, our known reserves of oil shale contain over half a trillion barrels of oil—or a supply for 100 years. The Secretary of the Interior has estimated that the expenditure of far less than the amount lost to the Federal Treasury in 1 year through percentage depletion would finance a successful research and development program enabling us to tap this rich supply.

While proponents of depletion claim its value toward promoting national security by encouraging domestic exploration and development, the fact is that 40 percent of percentage depletion is claimed either for interests in foreign oil or nonoperating interests in domestic wells. Thus, almost half of this Federal subsidy is not directed toward the extensive exploration which is claimed to be its justification.

The foreign tax credit also permits the oil industry to receive a special break.

The tax credit permits a company to write off each dollar of taxes paid to a foreign country directly against dollars owed in taxes to the United States. Foreign taxes are often merely a disguise for royalty payments to the host nation where the oil operations are situated. Thus, what is normally considered an ordinary cost of doing business is treated not as a simple deduction from gross income, but a direct offset against Federal taxes.

Mr. President, the present oil depletion allowance is unjustified.

Congress must end its reluctance to consider this particular provision on its merits.

Depletion is little more than a direct subsidy to a powerful interest group.

Economically, it is unnecessary; socially, it is undesirable.

Our taxes are the means by which this society sustains itself. The tax laws reflect many of this Nation's most fundamental values.

It is time Congress terminated instances of special favoritism in the tax code.

I shall support amendments which would reduce the percentage depletion allowance for oil.

Mr. PROXMIRE. If we take the argument relied upon by those who oppose the reduction of the depletion allowance—that is, that the oil companies pay more in taxes—if we consider State, local, and Federal, we still find, even adding all that in, that they pay less in total taxes than other corporations pay to the Federal Government, because the 40-percent figure which the Senator from Connecticut has given us is higher than the total taxes of all kinds paid by the oil industry.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield whatever time I have remaining.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Wisconsin talk about a certain percentage of pretax earnings. I think the record should show exactly how they computed those pretax earnings. Did they take into account the deductions for intangible drilling and development costs? Did they take into account the net operating loss carryovers?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The figures I have came from the SEC. The SEC has done its best to make these figures comparable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time? Each side has 5 minutes remaining.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin asked about sources of information.

I ask unanimous consent to have pages 4454 through 4464 of the hearing record printed at this point in the RECORD. Some of this is by an oil company witness, but he makes reference to the sources upon which he is relying. Some of this is from the Chase Manhattan Bank.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF ROBERT G. DUNLOP, PRESIDENT SUN OIL COMPANY, PHILADELPHIA, PA., AMERICAN PETROLEUM INSTITUTE; MID-CONTINENT OIL & GAS ASSOCIATION; AND WESTERN OIL AND GAS ASSOCIATION

SUMMARY

1. The United States economy is heavily dependent upon petroleum energy; oil and gas today provide nearly three-fourths of all energy consumed in this country.

2. Assured supplies of petroleum are vital to the national security of the United States.

3. With present tax incentives, the domestic petroleum industry has met this country's essential petroleum needs.

4. Present tax and other incentives have enabled the industry to develop a reserve producing capacity amounting to 3,000,000 barrels daily in 1968.

5. Similarly, the United States today has a spare producing capacity—producible and deliverable with existing facilities—of 1,000,000 barrels daily, which is available to meet emergency needs of this country and its Allies.

6. With existing tax incentives, the industry has made oil and gas available to consumers at reasonable prices.

7. Since it is based on production, the depletion provision is a particularly effective incentive for research leading to technological improvement; as such it has contributed significantly to broadening the nation's petroleum resource base.

8. Existing tax incentives have contributed significantly to improving the international payments balance of the United States and to world economic progress.

9. Tax incentives have contributed to the conservation of natural resources by encouraging the use of marginal oil.

10. The petroleum industry earns only average profits on investment.

11. The petroleum industry carries an overall tax burden equivalent to or exceeding that borne by other industries.

12. The combination of sharply rising costs and modestly rising prices is limiting funds available for investment; reserves of oil and gas declined both relatively and absolutely in 1968.

13. Federal control of natural gas well-head prices is partially offsetting the effect of tax incentives and creating a serious supply problem for the future.

14. Increased taxes would likely result either in higher petroleum prices or in reduced investment; neither alternative is desirable.

15. Complete elimination of tax incentives would make the United States heavily dependent on foreign oil; that dependency would range up to 48 to 58 percent of supplies.

16. This dependency could very well involve this country in a Middle East conflict, through our attempting to insure stability in the area.

17. Contrary to popular notions today, the United States is not running out of oil. Neither is it indicated that Alaska will produce enough additional oil to meet our future needs.

STATEMENT

I am Robert G. Dunlop, president of Sun Oil Company, Philadelphia, Pa. My appearance today is on behalf of the American Petroleum Institute, the Mid-Continent Oil and Gas Association, the Rocky Mountain Oil and Gas Association and the Western Oil and Gas Association.

I will attempt to give you an over-view of the present petroleum situation in the United States and of the likely impact of proposed tax changes on that situation. Appearing with me are Mr. William Spencer, executive vice president of the First National City Bank of New York, who will discuss future petroleum requirements and capital investment needs; Mr. George V. Myers, executive vice president, Standard Oil Company (Indiana), who will evaluate the impact of the proposed tax changes on domestic operations; and Mr. Emilio G. Collado, executive vice president of Standard Oil Company (New Jersey) who will close our presentation with a discussion of the tax treatment of foreign petroleum operations.

My colleagues and I appreciate this opportunity to present the petroleum industry's views on proposed tax changes for oil and natural gas. We feel strongly that this Committee's decisions on petroleum tax policies will significantly affect the Nation's future economic progress and its security. Accordingly, we feel that it is vitally important that the Committee's decisions be based on a comprehensive review of the effect of the proposed changes on our Nation and all of its citizens. It is our intent to contribute to this review by providing you with pertinent background information on the present petroleum situation and how it would be affected by the tax changes now under consideration.

In providing an over-view, I will attempt to define the role of tax incentives in the Nation's petroleum progress; to place the industry's tax payments, prices and profits into perspective; to discuss the relevance of petroleum tax policy to national security; to describe the present status of the industry; and to look at the impact of the tax proposals on the United States petroleum supply position.

First, however, I would like to state the industry's basic position on proposed changes in tax policy. It is this. Our experiences as oil men demonstrates that the tax incentives provided by the Congress in present law have very effectively achieved the purpose for which they were created: to provide an incentive for development of our petroleum resources. That our resources have, in fact, been effectively developed is a matter of record—a record of which we in the industry are indeed proud.

We observe two kinds of pressure being applied for a reduction in petroleum tax incentives. One is the pressure of emotional argument for boosting taxes on oil companies, come what may. The second is a more reasoned approach, recognizing the need for incentives but questioning whether the present level is necessary.

The facts of the situation appear to be of little interest to those who have been advancing the emotional arguments. But we are hopeful that the facts will be of paramount importance to those who are sincerely interested in reaching tax policy decisions that will be in the long-run best interests of the people of the United States.

We seek to be open-minded. We are not blindly opposed to change. If petroleum tax policy changes can be demonstrated to be in the best interests of the American public, we will surely not oppose them. But we strongly oppose change based on emotion rather than reason—change which is inimical to the progress of this Nation and to its security.

PETROLEUM ENERGY IN THE UNITED STATES

Against that background, I want first to look with you at the role of petroleum energy in the United States today. I submit that it would not be overstating the case to say that petroleum is the virtual lifeblood of this country. The Department of the Interior has aptly summed up the Nation's heavy dependence upon oil and natural gas in these words:

"The importance of petroleum to the national life of the United States at this particular moment in history is abundantly in evidence. It supplies nearly three-fourths of all energy consumed. Virtually all movement of goods and people depend on it. The Armed Forces would be immobilized without it. Countless industrial processes employ it exclusively, and nine-tenths of all space-heating is provided by it. And quite apart from its use as a fuel, petroleum forms the base for 88 percent of all organic chemicals manufactured in the United States."

I have taken a moment to include that quotation because I feel that it points up sharply why we are here today. Petroleum is vital to our country—so vital that the Nation could not exist today as we know it without adequate supplies of oil and natural gas.

The industrial revolution which is at the base of our prosperity could just as accurately be characterized as an energy revolution. Our ability to substitute inanimate energy for muscle power has made possible the tremendous increase in per capita production which is the essential measure of economic development.

The correlation between energy consumption and income is one of the significant facts of modern life. (See Exhibit I.) [Graphs not printed in RECORD.]

Petroleum is also essential to our defense capability, although in this age of nuclear weapons some observers seriously challenge this view. I would remind those challengers that, fortunately, the nations of the world have so far avoided nuclear war as a means of solving differences. And we all live in the hope that they will continue to do so. Conventional warfare, on the other hand, is likely to be with us for the foreseeable future. So petroleum is now, and will continue to be, vital to our national security.

Although surprising to many, the truth is that petroleum is becoming increasingly important to our defense capability. In 1968, defense procurement of petroleum per man under arms was twice the peak World War II level—even though the fighting in progress last year was restricted to a very limited geographic area.

The Department of Defense has put it this way:

"The part that oil plays in the defense posture of the United States is vitally important. It is a strategic material and one of the few items that is absolutely essential and foremost in the minds of military commanders. Along with weapons and ammunition, the needs of petroleum get the most attention."

In my view, these facts add to an inescapable conclusion: The future of the United States as we know it is vitally dependent upon assured supplies of oil. Realistically, we have only two routes to travel in obtaining oil:

(1) maintaining a strong domestic industry capable of meeting our essential needs, or

(2) turning increasingly to foreign supplies and, ultimately, becoming dependent upon those less secure foreign sources.

PETROLEUM DEVELOPMENT UNDER EXISTING TAX POLICIES

Up through the present day we have chosen to travel the first route, seeking to provide the incentives necessary to assure the continuance of a strong domestic petroleum industry capable of meeting the essential oil and gas needs of the Nation.

Was this a wise course of action?

Petroleum needs fully met

The record affirms that it was. For under past and present policies the United States petroleum industry has historically met the petroleum supply needs of this Nation and at the same time contributed immeasurably to the needs of our friends and allies. I need not recount to this Committee the major supply crises we have successfully met in the past.

It would perhaps be of interest and value, however, to show by example how petroleum tax incentives, working in conjunction with other incentives, have contributed to the development of our petroleum resources.

At the close of World War II, the heavy war-time drain on United States petroleum supplies had resulted in a situation where productive capacity was barely equal to demand.

The tax incentives, together with the thrust of rising prices during the late 1940's enabled the industry steadily to improve the supply situation. By 1955, as shown in Exhibit II, [graphs not printed in RECORD] we had reserve capacity of more than 2,000,000 barrels daily. In 1968, reserve capacity was 3,000,000 barrels daily.

I suggest that this is a dramatic demonstration of the role played by the depletion provision and other incentives in helping to assure adequate supplies of petroleum for the United States.

To carry the discussion one step further, we might with profit examine our present available spare producing capacity in the light of potential requirements. I am referring now to deliverable capacity—that capacity which can be produced and transported with existing facilities.

I can best demonstrate this by posing a hypothetical situation. Assume for a moment a Middle East war in which the United States, Canada, Western Europe and Japan would be denied Arab bloc oil—that is, all oil from North Africa and the Middle East with the exception of Iran.

Assume also that the United States, Canada, Latin America and Iran choose to supply oil to the maximum of their ability to Western Europe and Japan, which are heavily dependent on Arab bloc oil.

First, what would be the oil supply position of the United States and Canada in this hypothetical situation? And, second, what would be the combined position of the United States, Canada, Western Europe and Japan?

A table demonstrating the supplies that could be made available in relation to requirements is attached as Exhibit III.

In response to question one, the figures show that the United States and Canada would lose 400,000 barrels daily of supply from the Arab Bloc. However, our country and Canada have a combined spare capacity of some 1,200,000 barrels daily, and could cover that loss.

EXHIBIT III.—EFFECT OF LOSS OF ARAB BLOC SOURCES OF CRUDE OIL FOR THE UNITED STATES, WESTERN EUROPE, AND JAPAN

[In thousands of barrels per day]

	United States and Canada	Western Europe and Japan	Combined
1968 requirements	14,700	12,700	27,400
Available from—
Domestic production	11,700	400	12,100
Present production from non-Arab sources	2,600	3,000	5,600
Spare capacity:
United States	200	800	1,000
Canada	200		200
Iran and Latin America		1,100	1,100
Total available sources	14,700	5,300	20,000
Shortage		[1] 7,400	7,400
Total	14,700	12,700	27,400
1968 imports from Arab sources	400	9,300	9,700

[1] If the United States were to share the burden, there would be a shortage in the United States and a correspondingly lower shortage in Western Europe and Japan.

In regard to question two, by making the best possible use of existing pipeline connections between the U.S. and Canada, we would have, together, remaining spare capacity of only 800,000 barrels daily. Assuming that we made this oil available, and that Latin America and Iran similarly made their spare capacity available, Western Europe and Japan would then be short 7,400,000 barrels daily, or 58 per cent of their needs. If the U.S. were to share this burden, there would then be a shortage in the U.S. and a correspondingly smaller shortage in Western Europe and Japan.

This example clearly demonstrates two important points. First, the United States, with its total deliverable capacity of 10,000,000 barrels daily, is the bulwark of Western oil supply. And, second, even with the spare capacity now available in the United States, there is a significant gap between oil supply and normal requirements in the West. We can permit that gap to continue to grow only at our peril.

Petroleum Provided at Reasonable Prices

In addition to stimulating the development of adequate supplies of petroleum to meet our domestic needs, existing tax policies have helped to make that oil and gas available at reasonable prices to consumers. In terms of real purchasing power, the average price of crude oil has declined in the neighborhood of 20 per cent since 1926. Price comparisons over a more recent period show that since 1957–59 the wholesale price index for crude oil has risen just five per cent while the index for all commodities has increased by 13 per cent.

Gasoline prices, excluding direct taxes, are up only 10 per cent, or approximately two cents per gallon, since 1926. Over the same period, the consumer price index has doubled. Again, over a more recent period, the price of gasoline has advanced approximately 10 per cent since 1957–59 while consumer prices generally went up some 28 per cent. (See Exhibit IV.) [Not printed in the RECORD.]

Technological advances benefit the Nation

I also want to point out that tax incentives have helped to create benefits for the Nation over and above the development of adequate supplies of petroleum at favorable prices.

The depletion provision, for example, through encouraging investment in the industry and helping to keep it strong, has spurred technological advances in finding and recovering America's oil and gas. The economic impact of these advances has been substantial.

It should be emphasized that percentage depletion is a particularly effective incentive for research leading to technological improvement, since it is based on production. A direct subsidy to exploratory drilling might stimulate that activity, but percentage depletion stimulates both exploration and technological advance after discovery. Percentage depletion rewards the successful explorer in proportion to the amount of oil he finds and produces—and hence in proportion to his contribution to the national interest. After successful exploration, it rewards successful research designed to increase producibility of the reserves discovered. It applies in neither case in the event of failure because it becomes effective only when oil is produced. In contrast, a subsidy applies regardless of failure or success.

In exploration technology, improved drilling capabilities have enabled the industry to recover oil and gas at depths that were formerly impossible to drill. In 1930, the deepest well yet drilled went down only slightly more than 9,200 feet. Today the industry is drilling below 25,000 feet.

On another front, offshore drilling in the United States was negligible until the latter half of the 1940's. Today, in contrast, offshore production accounts for some 10 per cent of oil output and 12 per cent of gas output, and the offshore search is one of our brightest prospects for the future. Again, improved technology was the key.

To cite one more example, improved exploratory and drilling know-how is playing an important role in tapping the tremendous reserves of the Alaskan Arctic.

Technological advance is also opening many new horizons in older fields once thought to be nearly depleted. Before World War II, production was limited to primary recovery—pumping out the oil until the flow became so small as to be uneconomic. This procedure left five or six times more oil in the ground than was recovered, with only 15 to 20 per cent of the oil in place actually produced.

The development of waterflood and other secondary stimulants changed this picture sharply. By upping recovery to 30 to 35 percent of the oil in place, the new techniques have essentially doubled the Nation's recoverable reserves.

I repeat, technology has doubled recoverable reserves. It has increased the estimated ultimate recovery of crude oil from proved reservoirs by almost 60 billion barrels—20 times current annual production.

In the future, the industry should continue to increase cumulative recoverability through broader application of existing techniques and the development of new techniques.

In brief, invention and innovation encouraged in part by tax incentives have substantially augmented our recoverable reserves and in doing so have contributed importantly to the goal of strengthening the domestic supply position of the United States.

Other economic benefits attributable to tax incentives

Finally, existing petroleum tax policies have contributed significantly to improving the international payments balance of the United States and to world economic progress which has in turn been beneficial to this country.

In regard to international payments, the key plus factor has been the substantial inflow of earnings from past investments abroad.

These same investments have also played a major role in the economic progress of developing nations. Revenues generated by petroleum development projects have provided these nations with the foreign exchanges so essential to economic development, and have contributed to secondary benefits such as the creation of modern transportation and communication systems.

Tax incentives have likewise made a contribution to the conservation of natural resources by encouraging the use of marginal oil rather than abandoning this oil. To leave oil of marginal value in the ground is an inexcusable waste of an exhaustible, non-replaceable natural resource. If a marginal well it shut down, the likelihood of its again producing is remote. If it is reopened, it will only be at a considerably higher price for its output. If the production is lost, the country is the poorer.

Incentives provided are not excessive

All of these benefits—adequate oil supplies, favorable oil prices, technological progress—have been achieved with the aid of incentives which are not excessive.

If the percentage depletion rate were excessive, for example, this should be reflected in petroleum industry profit performance considerably better than that of other industries. This is not the case. Rather, figures compiled by the First National City Bank of New York demonstrate that the petroleum industry earns only average profits. In 1968, 99 petroleum producing and refining companies earned a 12.9 per cent return on net assets compared with an average return of 13.1 per cent for all manufacturing companies. In fact, the rate of return on net assets for the petroleum industry was higher than the average for all manufacturing companies in only two of the last 10 years. (See Exhibit V). [Not printed in the RECORD.]

The May 15, 1969 issue of Fortune magazine published 1968 financial data of the 500 largest industrial companies in the United States. These data show that, of the 25 largest companies (determined on the basis of sales), seven were oil companies. From a profitability standpoint, however, the record is quite different. Only one of those seven oil companies that rank in the top 25 on the basis of sales was even in the top 100 when ranked on the basis of return on invested capital—and that company ranked only 99th. The companies in the Fortune study included 27 oil companies, whose weighted average rate of return on invested capital was 12.0 per cent compared to 12.3 per cent for the other companies.

Similarly, the petroleum industry carries an overall direct tax burden exceeding that borne by other industries, even though its federal income tax bill is reduced by the depletion provision. Lower income taxes are offset by the heavier burden of other direct taxes such as severance and property taxes. As a result, studies have shown that total taxes paid by the petroleum industry, exclusive of motor fuel and excise taxes, in 1966 were equivalent to 6.0 per cent of revenues. (See Exhibit VI). Mining and manufacturing corporations paid direct taxes equivalent to 5.8 per cent of revenues in that year, and all business corporations paid taxes equal to 4.8 per cent of revenues.

Current problems and future prospects

Against that background of past experience, I would like now to direct your attention to the petroleum industry's present situation and to its future prospects.

Very frankly, the industry today is eyeball to eyeball with some very serious problems. Steady and substantial increases in petroleum demand have collided head-on with sharply-rising oil finding and development costs, with the result that reserves relative to requirements have been declining. Last year the decline was not only relative, but absolute. Proved petroleum reserves dropped across-the-board during 1968, with the life index of crude oil reserves falling to under 10 years and that of natural gas reserves decreasing to less than 15 years. This does not include the new Alaska reserves which are still being evaluated.

The industry's capability to respond successfully to this challenge could well be determined by the decisions made by this Committee. For this reason I will take a few moments to delineate our major difficulties.

First, the domestic industry is caught squarely between sharply rising costs and moderately rising prices. As I noted earlier, the price of crude oil has risen considerably less than the wholesale price index over the past decade. On the other hand, inflation has boosted exploration costs sharply, and, more significantly, unit costs have been rising because fewer giant fields are being discovered. This upward trend in unit costs is likely to continue since the major new successes are occurring in offshore areas and in Alaska where per well costs are several times higher than onshore ventures in the "lower 48." Parenthetically, it should be recognized that in the long run the cost of crude from Alaska's North Slope will likely average substantially above the unit cost of the enormous field initially discovered.

While improvements in exploration technology have helped to offset rising unit costs a gap continues to exist, particularly in onshore areas where economic exploration ventures are becoming increasingly scarce. A similar problem exists in regard to recovery technology. The most attractive opportunities have already been developed, and further expansion will be dependent upon improved economics based on new technology and the continuance of effective tax incentives.

The natural gas problem differs somewhat from that of crude oil in that the federal government has provided incentives with one hand and taken them away with the other. In other words, the positive effect of tax incentives has been offset by Federal Power Commission regulation of well-head natural gas prices. Under regulation, natural gas sold in interstate commerce is priced below its free market value. In carrying out its gas regulatory responsibilities, the Commission has unfortunately focused its efforts on costs at the expense of supply. It has attempted to apply regulatory techniques developed for public utilities to an intensely competitive industry where survival depends on not investing in low or negative return areas. As a result, only the most favorable natural gas prospects warrant investment in an exploratory venture today.

The serious nature of the present situation was pointed up recently by Federal Power Commissioner Albert B. Brooke, Jr., who declared that the gas industry today faces a "crisis situation." He said that the most obvious, urgent and pressing problems is that of gas supply, and that the next five years "may well prove to be the crucial years." Estimating that demand would grow at a 5 to 7 per cent annual rate, he added that it was unquestionably certain that eliminating or modifying any of the provisions of the tax incentive package would lead to higher consumer prices or more restricted supplies.

In spite of the gas industry experience, it appears that some observers would like to see the crude producing sector of the petroleum business follow the same course as that mandated for gas—to produce at minimum short-run costs regardless of the effect on supply and long-run costs to consumers. If we had followed this advice in the past, the giant fields where our reserve productive capacity is concentrated would be largely depleted, and encouraging new discoveries offshore and in Alaska would probably not have been made. As a result, we would have no reserve capacity today and we would be unduly dependent on foreign oil. In contrast, I believe that proposals for modification of the incentive structure should be directed toward increasing the efficiency of resource development in the long run.

Problems exist also for United States oil companies operating abroad. First, economic factors have led to a deterioration in return on investment. Second, host governments, to further improve their positions, are establishing national oil companies and demanding participatory shares in the development and sale of their crude oil. At the same time, crude deficient countries are establishing their own oil companies to discover and develop new supplies. As a result, United States firms find the going increasingly difficult. They must compete with nationally supported companies to obtain the right to explore and develop new areas, and then, having done so, must compete with national producing companies in selling their crude in foreign markets.

In the financial area, sharply increased capital requirements pose additional problems for the industry. I will mention just two points for your consideration. First, there has been a substantial increase in the debt to equity ratio of the larger oil companies. Since this trend cannot, of course, continue indefinitely, any further reduction in internally generated funds must necessarily lead to reduced expenditures on petroleum exploration. And, second, present tax proposals that would reduce the availability of funds to independent operators will immediately and directly reduce their exploratory activities.

As I noted earlier, the petroleum industry is not excessively profitable. To the extent that tax change proposals are geared to the assumption that it is, they are off base, indeed.

In brief, our present petroleum situation suggests that the industry today requires increased rather than reduced incentives.

THE IMPACT OF HIGHER TAXES ON PETROLEUM

Now, in the light of the current petroleum situation and the problems faced, what would be the impact of higher taxes on the industry?

Increased taxes, in the absence of any remedial action, must affect either profits and investment or prices. The alternative effects would be (1) reduced earnings and consequent reduction in capital invested in petroleum exploration and development; (2) increased product prices; or (3) some combination of the two.

Since the petroleum industry at present earns only average profits, a decline in profitability due to higher taxes would impair its earnings position relative to that of other industries. Since added tax costs cannot reasonably be expected to be absorbed, a tax increase would mean a reduction in the rate of investment by the industry. However, decreased investment in the face of a declining reserve trend and a steady increase in petroleum requirements is an unacceptable alternative if we are to continue our present policy of maintaining a strong domestic industry capable of meeting essential petroleum requirements.

The second alternative would be to shift the increased tax costs to consumers through product price increases. Because of the relative price of competitive fuels for other uses, price increases would probably be limited to fuels supplying transportation energy, such as jet fuel, diesel fuel and gasoline.

To the extent these products are used in business endeavors, the added cost would simply shift the deduction from one industry to another with no net gain to the Federal revenues, or shift the impact further along the line through succeeding price increases. The Federal Government, as the largest single consumer of petroleum products, would bear a significant portion of any price increase Only to the extent such additional costs were borne by individuals in non-business pursuits can it be assumed that, in the short run, the federal revenues would benefit.

An examination of this phenomenon discloses the effect to be regressive. A recent study indicates expenditures for gasoline per dollar of income are greater for the low income group than for middle and high income groups. The lowest income group, with earnings of less than $3,000 annually, spends an average of 6.2 cents of every dollar of income on gasoline, compared to only 1.5 cents per dollar in the group earning $15,000 or more. Because much of the driving of the low income group is work-oriented, their demand is relatively fixed, according to this study. Hence, the impact of an increase in gasoline prices would be four times greater on the lowest income group than on the highest income group.

Thus, a price increase to offset a tax increase would bear more heavily on the federal government and on low income households. It is by no means clear to me that this would be a net social gain.

Before leaving this topic, I would like to present some background information indicating the effect on the industry of complete elimination of tax incentives. In my view, these data point up very sharply the importance of present petroleum tax provisions to our national security.

Elimination of all petroleum tax incentives would have approximately the same impact on the domestic industry as the elimination of import controls, which would reduce revenues per barrel by about one-third. In the view of most industry respondents to the questionnaire issued by the Cabinet Task Force on Oil Import Control, the key effect of a one-third drop in revenue per barrel would be the "virtual cessation" of exploratory drilling. According to one company, elimination of the import control program or an equivalent decrease in revenue would result in an 85 per cent drop in the volume of exploratory drilling. According to another, the resulting reduction in industry cash flow would mean a "sharply curtailed" exploration program with a resultant permanent loss of "supporting industries, technology and trained people."

What this reduction in exploratory drilling might mean for future reserves was examined by another respondent. According to this estimate, "the amount of oil not discovered—which otherwise would be discovered—might approximate 1 to 2 billion barrels each year in the established older exploration provinces." This would amount to some 10 to 20 billion barrels lost over the next decade, not including the unknown amount which "otherwise would be discovered" in newer or future geologic provinces. The same respondent estimated the loss in reserves in existing developed fields at 6 to 10 billion barrels. The loss in reserves in fields which have been discovered but not developed was estimated at 5 billion barrels.

Six companies estimated that by 1980 the United States would be dependent on foreign sources for one-half to two-thirds of its petroleum supplies if oil import controls were eliminated. (See Exhibit VII). The average of these forecasts was 57 per cent dependency on foreign oil. And this allows for remaining production from reserves already discovered today, including the prolific discovery on the North Slope of Alaska, which has not yet been produced. The estimates made by these companies are in close agreement with projections made by the United States Department of the Interior, which predicted 48 percent (optimistic) to 58 per cent (pessimistic) dependency on foreign oil by 1980 if oil import controls were eliminated.

Source: Computed from data in submissions in July 1969 to the Cabinet Task Force on Oil Import Control.

Earlier, I indicated that the only alternative to maintaining a strong domestic industry was increased reliance on foreign oil. The above data clearly indicate how heavy that reliance would be if all petroleum tax incentives were eliminated.

In respect to the security aspect of these foreign supplies, I would like to quote from the summary of a recent API statement on this subject:

"Interference with foreign petroleum supplies can come from any of three sources: (1) military action during war; (2) shutdown (or sabotage) for political reasons; or (3) shutdown for economic reasons. The first of these is most important in general wars. Even in the absence of general war, however, there can be serious petroleum security problems in all three categories. Since World War II, there have been eight noteworthy interruptions of overseas petroleum supply—all in the prolific Middle East and African producing areas.

"None of these interruptions has succeeded in obtaining economic or political concessions from the United States or its allies—primarily because there has been a large, viable North American oil industry on which to rely in the event of emergency.

"If the United States were to adopt public policies which would make further exploration in North America generally unattractive, the United States would then have to turn to the Middle East-North Africa region for the bulk of its petroleum supplies because 86 per cent of overseas reserves are concentrated in this area (Venezuela currently accounts for 17 per cent of production but has only 4 per cent of reserves—See Exhibit VIII.) While no single overseas producing country has a sufficiently large share of reserves to be able to dominate the international oil market, groups of countries having common interests do have large shares.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. President, one of the factors that I think deserves serious consideration by all Americans today as we consider the tax reform proposal is what effect lowering of the depletion allowance from 27.5 percent to 20 percent would have upon the production of natural gas. One-third of all the energy this Nation has at its command today comes from natural gas. Natural gas heats a large percentage of the homes in America.

As the Assistant Secretary of the Interior for Mineral Resources, Mr. Hollis Dole, testified, as Mr. John Nassikas, Chairman of the Federal Power Commission, testified, and as has been testified to by John Carver, of the Federal Power Commission, and others appearing before the committee, gas is found in combination with petroleum today. We could make domestic petroleum production so unprofitable as to discourage the production of natural gas. That is what we have been doing, because the ratio has decreased from 20 to 1 to 14.6 to 1, where it is today, and within the next 4 to 6 years we probably will get down to a ratio of 10 to 1, which is a critical point for this country. If we get up to that point our entire economy is going to suffer.

More than that, the thrust this country is making today in order to clear up the air would be set back because no fuel supplies energy with as little pollution to the environment as does the production of energy through the burning of natural gas.

I suggest that before we further cripple the oil industry we consider very closely what will happen if we have a cutback on natural gas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, I understand the theory of the Senator from Wisconsin but I believe there is a misunderstanding when they use the term "earnings" without showing us how those earnings are computed.

The Senator from Connecticut talked about Atlantic Richfield with millions of dollars earned and not paying a tax. How were those earnings computed? Were they computed taking a deduction for the net loss operating carryover? I do not know.

However, we are talking about an amendment to the percentage depletion and the law makes clear the percentage depletion cannot exceed 50 percent of net income. So, in my judgment, Atlantic Richfield would have had to pay a tax on one-half of its net income if that were the only thing we are talking about. As I understand it, Atlantic Richfield decided to plow everything they could into discovering new resources and that is how they happened to pay no tax, and this is how we ended up with the Alaska strike which will benefit all of this country.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I wish to be heard in opposition to the pending amendment, which would reduce the percentage depletion allowance to 20 percent rather than the 23-percent figure approved by the Finance Committee.

Mr. President, in the Committee on Finance I sponsored and supported a minimum income tax bill and an allocation of deductions provision which would have applied to intangible drilling costs as well as the depletion allowance, among other things. Those provisions would have raised some $1.5 billion. There was insufficient support for these proposals, and I thereafter supported the 5-percent minimum tax provision eventually adopted. Thus, I have made clear by my actions that the oil industry should not be singled out for exclusion from general tax reform. But neither do I believe that any industry should be singled out for more than its share of the impact of tax reform.

A recent report published by the Department of the Interior indicates that our need for domestic crude in 1980 will be 54 percent greater than the 2.7 billion barrels produced in 1965, and implies a total production requirement of 52 billion barrels over the 15 years between 1965 and 1980. This figure is rather impressive when it is realized, as set forth in the report:

> This is half again the amount of crude oil produced over the immediately preceding 15-year period, and nearly half the total additions to proved reserves that have been made since 1859.

The projected demand for natural gas by 1980 also shows a significant increase over present demands in the Department of the Interior report it is stated:

> If domestic production of natural gas were exactly balanced by additions to proved reserves, the reserves to production ratio at the end of 1980 would be 11.9 to 1. This appears to be too low.

Our concern for 1980, however, is somewhat overshadowed by what appears to be a current shortage of gas reserves and supply. Recently Mr. Ivan Nassikas, head of the Federal Power Commission, expressed his concern over our dwindling gas reserves and indicated that the supply-demand curves will intersect much sooner than 10 years from now, unless the present supply trend is reversed.

As appealing as it may appear to some, dependence on foreign energy supply is unwise. The disruptions of world petroleum supply and transportation in 1951, 1956, and 1967 are examples of what could happen if we relied primarily on foreign sources. During the 1967 disruption, over two-thirds of the oil supply of Western Europe was interrupted while only 3 percent of the oil supply of the United States was affected.

Of course, due to the difficulties of transporting gas long distances, we must depend almost entirely on our domestic reserves for our natural gas supply.

Under these circumstances, I think it is imperative that we maintain a strong domestic petroleum industry. This does not mean, nor do I intend to imply, that in maintaining a strong domestic petroleum industry we unduly favor this industry. But it should be realized that the petroleum industry's return on its average invested capital in 1966 was 12.6 percent as compared with 11.2 percent for all other industries and that since 1957 the petroleum industry returns have fluctuated between 13.5 percent and 9.9 percent while the industry aggregate has moved within a range of 11.2 percent to 8.6 percent.

Tax incentives available to the oil industry must be placed in a proper context—a context which recognizes that in only 20 to 30 percent of all exploratory wells drilled was oil or gas located.

Taking all these matters into consideration, I am concerned over the effect of any drastic reduction of present tax incentives to the petroleum industry. The projected needs of 1980 clearly indicate a need to encourage further exploration and development.

At the present time a great percentage of the exploratory wells are drilled by independents. In my home State, Oklahoma, 86.5 percent of the exploratory wells are drilled by independents.

A survey conducted by the Bureau for Business and Economic Research of the University of Oklahoma, indicated that the effective percentage depletion rate for major oil companies was around 23 percent and the effective rate for independents was approximately 21 percent. A reduction of the percentage depletion allowance to 23 percent would reduce the effective rate of percentage depletion to approximately 18 percent. A reduction to 20 percent would be even more serious and could result in the curtailment of much of the exploration being accomplished by our small producers.

Our future needs suggest we proceed with great caution before we drastically reduce tax incentives upon which those engaged in exploration so heavily depend. In the report of the Department of the Interior, the following comment concerning tax incentives is made:

> They are an integral part of the petroleum industry's structure of income and expense, and the available evidence suggests that any substantial change in them would have a direct and significant effect upon the future availability and cost of oil and natural gas.

I therefore oppose the pending amendment.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, I do not think we need to be reminded that our actions today will tell the American people whether the Congress is really serious about tax reform. No tax privilege in recent years has evoked such universal indignation as the percentage depletion allowance applied to income from mineral properties. That subsidy is the symbol of tax inequity in the public mind. It should be corrected in our present efforts at tax reform.

Designed as an offset for the exhaustion of natural deposits, the depletion allowance was originally limited to the recovery of cost. But percentage depletion, introduced in 1926, bore no relation to cost and permitted tax-free recovery vastly in excess of actual investment outlays. And the size of the depletion allowance—27½ percent—was the product not of precise actuarial calculations on the exhaustion rate of domestic petroleum deposits; it was rather a political compromise between the 25-percent rate suggested by one House of Congress and the 30-percent rate suggested by the other.

Mr. President, there are no arguments left to support this continued tax preference in its present form for investments in oil and gas. In 1950, President Truman said that no tax loophole was "so inequitable as the oil depletion allowance." He proposed cutting the allowance to 15 percent—and he renewed that request in 1951. Since then, Congress has considered a great variety of amendments to reduce the allowance. But in 1958, 1960, 1962, and 1964, the Senate rejected proposals to close off or reduce the depletion loophole.

We cannot follow that old script again in 1969. The Senate must prove itself finally able to honor a clear public mandate for tax reform. The percentage depletion allowance for oil and gas should be reduced to the House-approved level of 20 percent; and the allowance for other minerals should be lessened proportionately.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Mississippi.

PETROLEUM AND NATIONAL SECURITY

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I am concerned about the serious impact the reduction in oil and gas depletion will have on this important Mississippi industry. I am convinced that the 27½ percent allowance has been a major factor in the growth and expansion of the petroleum industry in my State. Petroleum is Mississippi's most important mineral resource. Last year the Mississippi petroleum industry produced over 60 million barrels valued at $190 million. However, as chairman of the Armed Services Committee, I am also concerned about the impact the reduction will have on the security of our Nation and our people. And it is this concern that is the subject of my remarks today.

Most think of national security in terms of the military and the need to preserve the order and freedom of our country from foreign aggression. And while that is correct, it is not quite complete. The economy of a nation as technologically developed as the United States must also be assured stability and order if it is to continue to function and grow. And the two are interrelated. An effective military protects the economy. An efficient economy is necessary to support the military. Although our nuclear armaments are vital to our security, their only realistic role is to prevent an all-out nuclear or nonnuclear attack.

Thus, today, the military is built upon the concept of flexible response. Mobility is the key to conventional military defenses. In the last decade, mechanized army units have more than doubled their requirements for tanks and trucks. Look how important the helicopter is tactically in Vietnam. The need for the strategic movement of troops has greatly expanded our airlift capabilities. In fact, military consumption of petroleum products per man is now twice what it was during World War II. Over 80 percent of the supplies shipped into Vietnam are petroleum fuels. According to the Department of Defense:

> Oil is a strategic material and one of the few items that is absolutely essential and foremost in the minds of military commanders. Along with weapons and ammunition, the needs of petroleum get the most attention.

Obviously, then, a growing and stable supply of petroleum will be needed to meet military requirements.

From the standpoint of our economy, the U.S. industry produces one-third of the entire world's goods and services. We have achieved this with only 6 percent of the world's population but with one-third of the total world production of energy. These are impressive facts. They demonstrate how technologically oriented our Nation is and technology means more and more fuel. But these facts should also be a warning. Our progress in the years ahead hinges upon a dependable source of energy. Since petroleum provides three-fourths of our Nation's energy, our future economic security will be no stronger than our future supply of oil and gas.

At this point, let me pose a few questions. First, without an adequate domestic supply, where could the United States get its oil? The Federal Power Commission has expressed grave concern over the possible shortage of natural gas in the 1970's. The Department of the Interior has expressed concern over our declining oil reserves. If the tax incentives are changed beyond the Finance Committee recommendations, we could find ourselves having to depend on imports for more than 50 percent of our petroleum needs by 1980. That would be about 10 million barrels a day. At the present and for the foreseeable future, there is only one place where that much oil is available. And that is the Middle East—and I include in the Middle East, North Africa. No other existing or potential area could possibly meet the vast energy needs of our Nation. More than 86 percent of the free world's proved petroleum reserves outside the North American Continent are there. But how reliable a source is the Middle East? Can the United States depend on it for its future petroleum needs? Before answering these questions, let us take a close look at what has been going on in that area.

In the 1956 crisis, Egypt closed the Suez Canal attempting to exert political pressure by stopping the flow of oil to Europe. In June 1967, at the start of the Six Day War, the Suez was closed again and it is still closed. The Trans Arabian Pipe Line was also shut down for a time. This pipe line has been sabotaged three times during 1969. For 3 months, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Iraq, and Libya prohibited the export of oil to the United States, United Kingdom, and Germany. Nonetheless, by increasing production in the United States and other countries with spare productive capacity, by rescheduling tankers and shipping oil from the Persian Gulf around Africa, by judiciously drawing on inventories, the oil and gas industry managed to keep both of these crises from attaining any greater proportions.

I dread to imagine what the consequences might have been if the United States had itself been dependent on Middle East oil.

Against that background, let us consider present petroleum supplies in North America, Western Europe, and Japan. As I see it, the situation is already perilous. Western Europe and Japan are heavily dependent on Middle East oil. If another full-scale war were to erupt in the Middle East, all shipments of Middle East oil would stop—with the possible exception of Iran. With our present spare capacity, we in the United States could cover our Mid-East imports. Together with Canada we could export 800,000 barrels a day to Western Europe or Japan. Spare capacity in Latin America and Iran could supply them with another 1.1 million. But that would still leave our allies in Western Europe and Japan approximately 7.5 milliion barrels a day short. That is about 60 percent of their demand.

I am convinced that we cannot depend on the Middle East to supply our petroleum needs and that it would be under present circumstances pure folly to do so.

President Nixon has spoken several times about the need to defuse the Middle East area. That is a good metaphor, because the area is explosive. Historically, the United States has always had the flexibility of being independent of Middle East oil and making our allies likewise independent. Weaken the domestic industry and we sacrifice that independence and the flexibility it gives our foreign policy, now, when we need it most. We would be lighting the fuse we should be extracting.

Mr. President, a reduction in percentage depletion below 23 percent would be an unfortunate mistake which would seriously curb the incentive for oil and gas exploration, thereby reducing domestic petroleum reserves. The Senate Finance Committee has reduced tax incentives for the petroleum industry in several areas and a further reduction of any of these provisions will have a devastating impact on domestic producers and would be a serious threat to our national security.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Delaware.

Mr. President, I think one or two points may have been overlooked in this debate. We are not talking about only the depletion allowance in this bill. In addition there is the 5 percent tax on intangibles over $30,000. In addition to the cut we had in the Committee on Finance from 27.5 to 23 percent, there is an additional tax of 5 percent on intangible cost, so we are really dealing with a big cut in terms of the amount of tax free expenses on income, which is far greater than just the amount of the depletion we are talking about. This should be taken into account in determining whether or not we are going to agree to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

I am strongly against it. I think it is a punitive measure.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, when the figure of 27.5 percent was first arrived at, corporate and individual tax rates were about 15 percent. Since then the rate has increased on every type of taxpayer, with corporate taxes going as high as 52.8 percent and individuals as high as 77 percent.

Mr. President, this is an industry which heretofore has not been paying its proportionate part of the operating costs of Government. The average tax rate being paid by this industry is now 8 percent on their income. The time is long overdue when we should correct this inequity and let this industry pay more nearly its proportionate share.

I hope the amendment is agreed to as a minimum step in this direction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FULBRIGHT (after having voted in the negative). On this vote I have a pair with the Senator from Missouri (Mr. SYMINGTON). If he were present and voting, he would vote "yea"; if I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay." I withdraw my vote.

Mr. GRIFFIN (after having voted in the affirmative). On this vote I have a pair with the Senator from Illinois (Mr. SMITH). If he were present and voting, he would vote "nay"; if I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea." I withdraw my vote.

Mr. KENNEDY. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS), and the Senator from Missouri (Mr. SYMINGTON), are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. ANDERSON), would vote "nay."

Mr. GRIFFIN. I announce that the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) and the Senators from Illinois (Mr. PERCY and Mr. SMITH) are necessarily absent.

The Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MUNDT) is absent because of illness.

The Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER) is detained on official business.

If present and voting, the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MUNDT) and the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY) would each vote "nay."

The pair of the Senator from Illinois (Mr. SMITH) has been previously announced.

The result was announced—yeas 38, nays 52, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendment is open to amendment.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with. I will explain the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PROXMIRE's amendment is as follows:

On page 350, line 23, insert the following:

"DRAFT OF TREASURY FOREIGN TAX CREDIT RECOMMENDATION TAX REFORM ACT OF 1969

"SEC. 508. FOREIGN TAX CREDIT WITH RESPECT TO CERTAIN MINERAL INCOME

"(a) LIMITATION ON AMOUNT OF FOREIGN TAXES ALLOWED.—Section 901 (relating to taxes of foreign countries and possessions of the United States) is amended—

"(1) by redesignating subsection (e) as subsection (f), and

"(2) by inserting after subsection (d) the following new subsection:

"'(e) FOREIGN TAXES ON MINERAL INCOME.—

"'(1) REDUCTION IN AMOUNT ALLOWED.—Notwithstanding subsection (b), the amount of any income, war profits, and excess profits taxes paid or accrued during the taxable year to any foreign country or possession of the United States with respect to foreign mineral income from sources within such country or possession, which would (but for this paragraph) be allowed under such subsection shall be reduced by the amount (if any) by which—

"'(A) the amount of such taxes (or, if smaller, the amount of the tax which would be computed under this chapter with respect to such income determined without the deduction allowed under section 613), exceeds

"'(B) the amount of the tax computed under this chapter with respect to such income.

"'(2) FOREIGN MINERAL INCOME DEFINED.—For purposes of paragarph (1), the term "foreign mineral income" means taxable income from mines, wells, and other natural deposits within any foreign country or possession of the United States, to the extent such taxable income constitutes taxable income from the property within the meaning of section 613. Such term includes, but is not limited to—

"'(A) dividends received from a foreign corporation in respect of which taxes are deemed paid by the taxpayer under section 902, to the extent such dividends are attributable to foreign mineral income, and

"'(B) that portion of the taxpayer's distributive share of the income of partnerships attributable to foreign mineral income.'"

"(b) Election of overall limitation.—Section 904 (b) (relating to election of overall limitation) is amended—

"(1) by striking out 'with the consent of the Secretary or his delegate with respect to any taxable year' in paragraph (1) and inserting in lieu thereof '(A) with the consent of the Secretary or his delegate with respect to any taxable year or (B) for the taxpayer's first taxable year beginning after December 31, 1969', and

"(2) by striking out 'If a taxpayer' in paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof 'Except in a case to which paragraph (1) (B) applies, if the taxpayer'.

"(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply with respect to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1969.

"DRAFT OF TREASURY FOREIGN TAX CREDIT RECOMMENDATION TAX REFORM ACT OF 1969

"SEC. 509. FOREIGN TAX CREDIT REDUCTION IN CASE OF FOREIGN LOSSES

"(a) Reduction in Foreign Tax Credit Limitation.—Section 904 (a) (relating to alternative limitations on foreign tax credit) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"'(3) Reduction in limitation.—

"'(A) Deduction of foreign losses.—In determining under paragraph (1) or (2) the taxable income for the taxable year from sources within a foreign country or possession of the United States or the taxable income for the taxable year from sources without the United States, as the case may be, there shall be deducted an amount equal to (i) the foreign loss carryovers to such year plus (ii) the foreign loss carrybacks to such year.

"'(B) FOREIGN LOSS CARRYBACKS AND CARRYOVERS.—For purposes of this paragraph—

"'(i) A foreign loss for any taxable year (hereinafter in this subparagraph referred to as the "loss year") shall be a foreign loss carryback to each of the 2 taxable years preceding the loss year and a foreign loss carryover to each of the 10 taxable years following the loss year. A foreign loss shall not be carried to a taxable year beginning before January 1, 1970. A foreign loss shall not be carried to a taxable year for which the taxpayer does not take the benefits of this subpart, but the number of taxable years to which such loss must otherwise be carried over under the preceding sentence shall be increased by the number of taxable years to which the loss must otherwise be carried which are years for which the taxpayer does not take the benefits of this subpart.

"'(ii) The entire amount of the foreign loss for the loss year shall be carried to the earliest of the taxable years to which such loss must be carried. The portion of such loss which shall be carried to each of the other taxable years to which such loss must be carried shall be the excess, if any, of the amount of such loss over the sum of the taxable income from sources within the same foreign country or possession of the United States in which the foreign loss occurred or the sum of the taxable income from sources without the United States, as the case may be, for each of the prior taxable years to which such loss must be carried. For purposes of the preceding sentence, the taxable income for any such prior taxable year from sources within a foreign country or possession or from sources without the United States shall be computed without regard to the foreign loss for the loss year or any taxable year thereafter and without regard to section 172(b) (relating to net operating loss carrybacks and carryovers) and section 1212 (a)(1) (relating to capital loss carrybacks and carryovers of corporations).

"'(iii) The Secretary or his delegate shall by regulations prescribe the manner for carrying a foreign loss from sources within a foreign country or possession of the United States for a taxable year to another taxable year to which the limitation provided by paragraph (2) applies, or for carrying a foreign loss from sources without the United States for a taxable year to another taxable year to which the limitation provided by paragraph (1) applies.

"'(C) Foreign loss defined.—For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'foreign loss' means a loss sustained in any taxable year which is from sources within a foreign country or possession of the United States or from sources without the United States, as the case may be. For such purposes, a loss shall be the amount (determined without regard to section 172(b) and 1212 (a) (1)) by which the gross income from sources within a foreign country or possession of the United States or from sources without the United States, as the case may be, is exceeded by the expenses, losses, and other deductions properly apportioned or allocated thereto and a ratable part of any expenses, losses, or other deductions which cannot definitely be allocated to some item or class of gross income. If the taxpayer does not take the benefits of this subpart in a taxable year, the amount of his loss, if any, shall be determined as if the limitation provided by paragraph (2) applied.

"(b) Conforming Amendment.—Section 6501 (i) (relating to limitations on assessments and collection in case of foreign tax carrybacks) is amended—

"(1) by striking out 'Tax' in the heading and inserting in lieu thereof 'Loss or Tax',

"(2) by striking out 'carryback under' and inserting in lieu thereof 'carryback under section 904(a)(3)(B) (relating to foreign loss carrybacks and carryovers) or', and

"(3) by striking out 'of the excess taxes described in section 904(d) which result' and inserting in lieu thereof 'of the foreign loss, or of the excess tax described in section 904(d), which results'.

"(c) Effective Date.—The amendments made by this section shall apply with respect to losses sustained in taxable years beginning after December 31, 1969."

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the majority leader.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, with the concurrence of the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE) and the distinguished Senator from Delaware (Mr. WILLIAMS), I ask unanimous consent that there be an hour's limitation on the amendment, the time to be equally divided between the Senator from Wisconsin and the Republican leader, or whoever he may designate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object to the unanimous-consent request, may we know what the amendment is all about?

Mr. PROXMIRE. This is the foreign tax credit amendment. It is very similar to, but not exactly the same as, the printed amendment. A summary of the amendment is on the desk of each Senator. It is one that was before the Finance Committee, as the Senator from Nebraska is aware. It is similar to what the Treasury Department proposed to the Finance Committee. In fact, I asked the Department to draft an amendment to conform with the recommendation it made to the Finance Committee.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CURTIS. What is the unanimous-consent request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A limitation of 1 hour, one-half hour to each side. The proposal has already been agreed to by unanimous consent.

Who yields time?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield one-half minute to me?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, as I understand, the time is to be equally divided between the Senator from Wisconsin and the minority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Between the Senator from Wisconsin and the minority leader.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I yield my time in opposition to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I ask unanimous consent that I may suggest the absence of a quorum without the time being taken out of either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to withdraw my amendment. I expect to offer it at a later date, but, to accommodate the leadership, I withdraw it at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SAXBE in the chair). Is there objection? Without objection, the amendment is withdrawn.

AMENDMENT NO. 292

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendment is open to amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I call up my amendment No. 292.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to waive the reading of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment (No. 292) is as follows:

On page 350, after line 22, insert the following new section:

"SEC. 508. PERCENTAGE DEPLETION RATES ON HARD MINERALS

"(a) CHANGE IN RATES.—Section 613(b) (relating to percentage depletion rates) is amended by striking out paragraphs (2), (3), (4), (5), (6), and (7) and inserting in lieu thereof the following new paragraphs:

"'(2) 17 percent—

"'(A) sulfur and uranium; and

"'(B) if from deposits in the United States—anorthosite, clay, laterite, and nepheline syenite (to the extent that alumina and aluminum compounds are extracted therefrom), asbestos, bauxite, celestite, chromite, corundum, fluorspar, graphite, ilmenite, kyanite, mica, olivine, quartz crystals (radio grade), rutile, block steatite talc, and zircon, and ores of the following metals: antimony, beryllium, bismuth, cadmium, cobalt, columbium, lead, lithium, manganese, mercury, nickel, platinum and platinum group metals, tantalum, thorium, tin, titanium, tungsten, vanadium, and zinc.

"'(3) 15 percent—if the mines or deposits are located in the United States—

"'(A) gold, silver, copper, and iron ore mines, and

"'(B) oil shale.

"'(4) 11 percent—

"'(A) metal mines (if paragraph (2)(8) or (3) (A) do not apply), rock asphalt, and vermiculite; and

"'(B) if neither paragraph (2)(B), (6), or (7)(B) applies, ball clay, bentonite, china clay, sagger clay, and clay used or sold for use for purposes dependent on its refractory properties.

"'(5) 7 percent—asbestos (if paragraph (2)(B) does not apply), brucite, coal, lignite, perlite, sodium chloride, and wollastonite.

"'(6) 5 percent—clay and shale used or sold for use in the manufacture of sewer pipe or brick, and clay, shale, and slate used or sold for use as sintered or burned lightweight aggregates.

"'(7) 4 percent—

"'(A) gravel, peat, pumice, sand, scoria, shale (except shale described in paragraphs (3)(B) and (6)), and stone (except stone described in paragraph (8));

"'(B) clay used, or sold for use, in the manufacture of drainage and roofing tile, flower pots, and kindred products; and

"'(C) if from brine wells—bromine, calcium chloride, and magnesium chloride.

"'(8) 11 percent—all other minerals (including, but not limited to, aplite, barite, borax, calcium carbonates, diatomaceous earth, dolomite, feldspar, fullers earth, garnet, gilsonite, granite, limestone, magnesite, magnesium carbonates, marble, mollusk shells (including clam shells and oyster shells), phosphate rock, potash, quartzite, slate, soapstone, stone (used or sold for use by the mine owner or operator as dimension stone or ornamental stone), thenardite, tripoli, trona, and (if paragraph (2)(B) does not apply) bauxite, flake graphite, fluorspar, lepidolite, mica, spodumene, and talc (including pyrophyllite), except that, unless sold on bid in direct competition with a bona fide bid to sell a mineral listed in paragraph (4), the percentage shall be 4 percent for any such other mineral (other than slate to which paragraph (6) applies) when used, or sold for use, by the mine owner or operator as rip rap, ballast, road material, rubble, concrete aggregates, or for similar purposes. For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'all other minerals' does not include—

"'(A) soil, sod, dirt, turf, water, or mosses;

"'(B) minerals from sea water, the air, or similar inexhaustible sources; or

"'(C) oil and gas wells.'

"(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1969."

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, on the same understanding, I ask unanimous consent that there be a limitation of 1 hour on this amendment, the time to be equally divided between the Senator from Delaware and the manager of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I do not think I want to object, but I would like to have at least enough time to find out what the basis of the amendment is.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana withhold his request?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I will withhold my request.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. The House bill would have cut the depletion allowance on all minerals by an average of 25 percent. This amendment does not deal with oil or gas but with all other minerals. The House cut the depletion allowance an average of 25 percent on all minerals except gold, silver, and copper. That reduction was rejected by the Senate committee. My amendment would reinstate the provisions of the House bill.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, I did not understand that there was a time limitation request pending, and I had registered a suggestion that I would like to be notified when such a request was made.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I did not know about it. We had one 5 minutes ago, on an amendment that the Senator from Wisconsin offered, to which the Senator's colleague from Nebraska demurred.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, last week I took exception to the fashion in which this legislation is being considered. This bill goes deeply into the economic, fiscal, and monetary life of this country, but we are going about it as if it were a matter of very routine degree. I do not think that is at all in keeping with the fashion in which a bill of this nature and this importance should be handled.

I know there is thinking on both sides that these matters are important. They are vital; they are complicated; they are intricate, and yet we take them up on the basis of limited debate, so that we are scarcely able to get into the matter of determining what they are and what the arguments are pro and con.

I suggested last week that I would be constrained to enter an objection to any limitation of debate. Unfortunately, the leadership did not find it possible to locate me at the time, so it was asserted. I was on the premises. Now we have a repetition of it. I would suggest that either the request for the limited debate be withdrawn, or that, if it has been granted, that we reconsider the request at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been granted.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, this is the second time that we have been caught tonight; the first time was by the colleague of the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. CURTIS). After we had the yeas and nays ordered and a time limitation agreed to, then, as a courtesy to him, since he stated he would like a little more time, and a few other Senators agreed, the Senator from Wisconsin withdrew his amendment.

All concerned understood that the Senator from Delaware (Mr. WILLIAMS) would call up an amendment having to do with the depletion allowance for metals only, and we are faced with this situation.

If there is anyone in this body in whom I have the utmost confidence as far as matters financial and economic are concerned, it is the distinguished Senator from Delaware, the watchdog of this body. Certainly no one is more interested in the economic well-being of this country and its financial standing than is the Senator from Delaware.

In view of the fact that this situation has developed, and despite the fact that the leadership would like to have the matter disposed of in a reasonable length of time—and may I say, before I make my request, that surely everyone understands what an increase from 23 to 27.5 percent in the oil and gas allowance is; anyone can understand what a decrease to 20 percent is; and anyone can understand what an increase in the exemption from $600 to $1,200 is; so I do not think that the Senate has been wasting its time. I think we have been facing up to our responsibilities, staying on the job. The attendance at present is well in excess of 90, despite the fact that at least two of our Members are in the hospital at this time.

We have six appropriation bills to contend with. We will have to face them somehow, sometime this year, if it takes all year; and if we cannot finish them, they will have to go into the next year.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unanimous-consent agreement for a time limitation on the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Delaware—and I do this reluctantly—be vacated. Does the Senator from Delaware agree?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I agree.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That it be withdrawn?

Mr. MANSFIELD. That the time limitation be vacated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to vacating the 1-hour limitation? If there is no objection, the order for the time limitation is vacated.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, for the information of the Senate I shall be very brief, and we can still vote tonight.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Delaware yield for that purpose?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I yield.

Mr. TOWER. It is my understanding that the controlled time situation was vacated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was vacated.

Mr. TOWER. So there is no controlled time?

Mr. MANSFIELD. That is correct, but the Senator from Delaware has the floor.

Mr. TOWER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I shall be very brief, and I hope we can vote on this amendment tonight.

I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, in the House bill they cut the depletion allowance on all minerals except gold, silver, and copper an average of about 25 percent. The Senate Finance Committee, in acting on those reductions, rescinded the House action and restored the depletion allowance on all of those minerals to the rates in present law.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. President, I cannot hear a word. The amendment deals with an extremely important subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. The Senate committee rescinded the House action and struck that section from the bill, with the result that they thereby restored the depletion rates to those under the existing law.

For example, under the existing law and under the Finance Committee bill, sulfur, uranium, and certain specified minerals from domestic deposits are listed at 23 percent. The House bill would reduce it to 17 percent, and my amendment would restore this House figure of 17 percent.

Gold, silver, copper, iron ore, and oil shale were not changed from 15 percent by the House bill, and those are left at 15 percent in this amendment.

The remaining minerals now rated at 15 percent under existing law are dropped to 11 percent under both the House bill and my amendment.

Asbestos, coal, sodium chloride, and so forth, were reduced from 10 percent to 7 percent, while clay and shale for use in the manufacture of sewer pipe or brick, and clay, shale, and slate for use as sintered or burned lightweight aggregates were reduced from 7½ percent to 5 percent.

Gravel, peat, shale, and certain other minerals which are now at 5 percent would be reduced to 4 percent.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I yield.

Mr. LONG. If I understand correctly, what the Senator is seeking to do is take the House language with regard to all other minerals, other than oil and gas?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. That is correct. We have acted on oil and gas already. Our vote on this amendment merely decides whether or not we want to stand by the House provisions for reductions on other minerals or retain the existing law. There is approximately $55 million new revenue involved in this amendment.

Mr. President, as far as I am concerned, I am ready to vote.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I yield.

Mr. DOMINICK. Do I understand that the House language on gold, silver, copper, and iron ore is 15 percent, that the report of the Senate committee recommends 15 percent, and the Senator from Delaware would leave it at 15 percent?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. That is correct.

Mr. DOMINICK. So there is no change with respect to subparagraph (3) of the bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. No change from what the House did.

Mr. DOMINICK. And is there any change from what the Senate Finance Committee did?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. No.

Mr. DOMINICK. So everything is changed except subparagraph (3) on page 2; is that correct?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. That is correct.

Mr. DOMINICK. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the majority on the Senate committee felt that the House reduction in depletion allowances on minerals other than oil was a 27.5-percent reduction on all of them, with the exception of the three the Senator has mentioned, and it was felt that that 27.5-percent reduction on these other minerals was an arbitrary judgment, for the reason that, since the oil depletion allowance was reduced by the House of Representatives by 27.5 percent, therefore they would reduce all other minerals by 27.5 percent, and there was really no more logic to it than that.

It is my understanding that all the cost of depletion allowances, if you want to look at how much money is involved, all the other minerals put together involve 20 percent, as a matter of fact, in terms of dollar value, as much as does the depletion allowance on oil.

In other words, oil and gas in dollar figures account for about 90 percent of the total depletion allowance. And all the other minerals put together account for about 10 percent of the depletion allowance. So that, in terms of dollars, not a great deal is involved.

The Senator pointed out that it is $55 million. However, that amount covers a great many minerals. The Senator is talking about almost 100 minerals.

The committee's feeling was that the case was made with respect to oil and gas and that the entire House case was made on one industry and there was an across-the-board cut in the same percentage figure on all others.

We did not feel that the other minerals should be cut on the basis of the case that had been made and in view of the fact that in terms of dollars and cents, only a 10 percent depletion allowance is involved with respect to all other minerals. The others should not be reduced on that basis.

The committee voted that it would reduce the depletion on oil and gas, but not with respect to the other minerals.

Mr. President, if other Senators wish to debate the matter further, they may do so. However, I personally hope that the amendment will be rejected. That is all I care to say.

Does the Senator from Alaska wish to discuss the matter?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, as I go home through the Yukon territory and the British territory, I see the mines in Canada thriving.

When we look into the matter and consider why their mines are thriving and all of the Alaskan mines are closing down, we find that Canadian mines have been offered new incentives with reference to hard rock minerals at the very time when our mining industry is sick, and there is no other way in which to describe it.

There is an intention here to reduce the amount of incentives given through tax deduction to our mine operations. With all due respect to my friend, the Senator from Delaware, I cannot understand why this is proposed.

I sometimes wonder if we were able to add up the amount of income taxes that the unemployed miners would pay if they were employed and we had a viable policy for our mining industry, what these miners would then pay in taxes. At the present time we have our heads in the sand and are shutting off economic development. Unless we wake up and realize that demand is increasing, productive capacity is declining, and we are getting more and more dependent upon foreign sources for oils, minerals, and raw materials, we will find ourselves in a position one of these days in which we will have to fight for these vital resources because we will not have our own.

I cannot understand this. I think that instead of reducing the allowance, we should try to increase it. I could understand it if we were to say that we need to give greater incentives to the mining industry for development, because 15 percent of nothing is nothing, and the 11-percent depletion allowance for all other minerals is not understandable.

The way by which to get more mineral production is to give incentives for production somehow and then to restore their potential. This would eliminate the paradox of the United States, one of the richest nations in the world in terms of mineral reserves, watching its mineral stockpiles dwindle dangerously low.

I hope that we can at least hold to the present depletion allowance provisions.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, every time we talk about changing the depletion allowance rates on any mineral we hear arugments that we are trying to wreck the whole economy.

How is a 5-percent depletion on sand and gravel justified when it is a natural resource and it is not being depleted?

We have more coal than we can ever use, yet the present law allows a 10-percent depletion allowance on coal.

There is no argument but that this is a special tax provision which cannot be justified.

The one question that needs to be answered is, Do we want some tax reform? That is what we have all been talking about. If the Senate does want it then vote against these amendments. Let us recognize that tax reform means that we must eliminate some of the inequities in our tax laws and raise the taxes on some industries that have not been paying their proportionate part of the taxes.

Everything that we do here will affect some State, but we are dealing with the United States of America.

If we are going to eliminate everything that affects a constituent of our own States then we may as well fold our hands, strike out all the tax reform provisions of the bill, and just write a flowery speech describing this as tax reform in name only, putting in a few tears and passing it on to the American people.

If we want tax reform let us vote for it. If not let us stop talking about it.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. President, I have listened with great interest to my great friend the Senator from Delaware. He is a great friend and hopefully will remain so.

I cannot understand his argument. We have been told by every authority that we will have a population as high as 300 million by the year 2000. Inflation is on the rise, and we have to do something about it.

One reason that inflation is on the increase is that natural resources are in hard supply and we cannot get them at reasonable prices.

If we cannot develop them, mine them, and put them into the construction of ordinary houses and buildings, we will not be able to hold down the rising prices.

I look at the matter and think of what we need for the development of the natural resources of this country. We are cutting down on the incentives at the very time when industry is not making any money and is not getting any depletion allowance because they have very little net earned income on which they can exercise their depletion allowances.

If we are trying to do something to help out in the home construction industry and in the industrial construction with the idea of constructing new housing cheaply and well, we ought to give an incentive to people to produce that housing and get the economy on a stable basis once again.

I cannot understand why, if we want extra revenue for the Government, we increase the tax burden so that the consumer has to pay more for everything in sight.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, it is a fact that under the present law with its high depletion rates, the cost of living has gone to the highest level in the history of our country and inflation is out of hand. We are told that we should continue with this if we are to control both the cost of living and inflation.

I ask if the Senator did not contradict himself slightly.

Mr. DOMINICK. I did not contradict myself. I did not say that. I said that we are trying to control it now and that this would not control it but would make it worse.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, of course, I disagree with my good friend, the Senator from Colorado.

I think that this is the time when we should make some correction.

As I said before, why do we need a 10-percent depletion allowance on coal? We have more coal than we need or can use.

The same is true with respect to sodium chloride, slate, clay, gravel, and sand. These depletion allowances are tax credits. The question is whether we want to continue them at the high rates?

I am ready to vote.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. President, one of the items in extremely short supply is sulfur. Once again we propose to cut this in the pending amendment by some 6 percent.

I cannot understand why we would do it when the mineral is in short supply.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I hope that the Senate rejects the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

Our distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee correctly stated the view of the committee.

The Ways and Means Committee sustained their depletion allowance by arbitrarily reducing the depletion allowance for every other mineral in America in the same proportion.

A great many of these minerals are in short supply. Some of the companies have difficulty in staying in business.

There was no sentiment in the Finance Committee in support of the views of the Senator from Delaware. The views of the committee were overwhelmingly adopted.

I think that it would be the height of folly if we were, at one fell swoop on the floor of the Senate, to overrule the Finance Committee, which gave the matter mature consideration for some 8 weeks or more.

I hope this amendment will be rejected. Most of these provisions have been in our Internal Revenue Code for a great many years. I think it would be foolhardy to overrule them just because the Ways and Means Committee did so in the House.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, because of the appearance of conflict of interest or the possibility of a conflict of interest, due to my personal and my family's stockholdings, which I have previously reported in the RECORD, and which directly relate to several of the minerals affected by the pending amendment, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to vote "present" on the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I should like to direct a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair upon the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ALLOTT. Earlier this afternoon, I sent to the desk an amendment to section 508 which would raise the percentage upon molybdenum from 15 to 23 percent. As it is now in the bill, it is 15 percent. I suggested this amendment in the Finance Committee at the time the Finance Committee was meeting. This would reinsert molybdenum in section 508(a) after mercury, placing it at the same place in the bill as the other ferro alloys.

I ask this question of the Chair: If the pending amendment is adopted or rejected, will this prevent the suggestion of the amendment I filed this afternoon with respect to molybdenum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair announces that this would have to be studied. If the amendment is agreed to, then any amendment touching only specific language inserted by that amendment would not be in order. But if the amendment is rejected, then, of course, any amendment would be in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLOTT. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, it was not my intention to preclude the Senator from Colorado from the opportunity to offer his amendment. If it is all right, I ask unanimous consent that the adoption of my amendment not preclude him from offering his amendment at a later date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chairs hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ALLOTT. I thank the distinguished Senator very much, because this is a very great inequity which has been occurring for some time—at least, in the minds of some of us. Based upon the outcome of this vote, either way, I can offer my amendment at a subsequent time.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I am not sure that I would support the Senator's amendment, but I think he has a right to offer it and to get a vote on it, and this would take care of it.

Mr. ALLOTT. I thank the Senator.

Mr. JORDAN of Idaho. Mr. President, I hope the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Delaware will be rejected.

Demand for hard rock minerals in the United States is expected to increase to four times the present level by the year 2000. Worldwide demand will increase even more. Since mineral production in the United States is not expected to increase nearly as much, we must also increasingly rely on foreign sources for minerals.

The mining industry will require tremendous amounts of capital investment to meet the future demand. Mining now requires more capital per employee than any other industry and its ability to attract capital will depend upon the after-tax rate of return. If the industry is to generate the capital to meet the increased demands of the future, then the present depletion rates should not be cut.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SCHWEIKER (when his name was called). Present.

The rollcall was concluded.

Mr. KENNEDY. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS), the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MCGOVERN), and the Senator from Missouri (Mr. SYMINGTON) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Missouri (Mr. SYMINGTON) would vote "nay."

Mr. GRIFFIN. I announce that the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) and the Senator from Illinois (Mr. SMITH) are necessarily absent.

The Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MUNDT) is absent because of illness.

The Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BOGGS), and the Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS) are detained on official business.

If present and voting, the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER) and the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MUNDT) would each vote "nay."

On this vote, the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BOGGS) is paired with the Senator from Illinois (Mr. SMITH). If present and voting, the Senator from Delaware would vote "yea" and the Senator from Illinois would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 64, as follows:

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR DOMINICK FOR 20 MINUTES ON TOMORROW

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, immediately following the prayer and disposition of the reading of the Journal on tomorrow, the able Senator from Colorado (Mr. DOMINICK) be recognized for not to exceed 20 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR TIME LIMITATION ON TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS ON TOMORROW

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, on tomorrow, following the prayer and disposition of the reading of the Journal, the time for the transaction of routine morning business not extend beyond 1 hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TAX REFORM ACT OF 1969

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 13270), the Tax Reform Act of 1969.

AMENDMENT NO. 304

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I call up my amendment and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CRANSTON in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered; and the amendment will be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The amendment offered by Mr. GORE is as follows:

In the committee amendment at page 454, beginning with line 5, strike out all through page 497, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"SEC. 801. PERSONAL EXEMPTIONS.

"SEC. 802. STANDARD DEDUCTION.

"(a) MINIMUM STANDARD DEDUCTION FOR TAXABLE YEARS BEGINNING IN 1970, 1971, AND 1972.—Effective with respect to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1969, and before January 1, 1973, section 141(c) (relating to the minimum standard deduction) is amended to read as follows:

"'(c) MINIMUM STANDARD DEDUCTION.—The minimum standard deduction is an amount equal to $1,000 ($500, in the case of a separate return by a married individual), reduced, in the case of a taxable year beginning in 1970, 1971, or 1972, by an amount equal to one-fourth of the amount by which—

"'(1) the adjusted gross income for the taxable year, exceeds

"'(2) the sum of—

"'(A) $1,000 ($500, in the case of a separate return by a married individual), plus

"'(B) the amount of each personal exemption provided by section 151 for the taxable year, multiplied by the number of such exemptions for the taxable year'.

"(b) STANDARD DEDUCTION FOR TAXABLE YEARS BEGINNING AFTER 1972.—Effective with respect to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1972, section 141 (relating to the standard deduction) is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 141. STANDARD DEDUCTION.

"'The standard deduction referred to in this title is $1,000 ($500, in the case of a separate return by a married individual)'.

"(c) DETERMINATION OF MARITAL STATUS.—Section 143 (relating to determination of marital status) is amended—

"(1) by striking out 'For purposes of this part—' and inserting in lieu thereof '(a) GENERAL RULE.—For purposes of this part—'; and

"(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"'(b) CERTAIN MARRIED INDIVIDUALS LIVING APART.—For purposes of this part, if—

"'(1) an individual who is married (within the meaning of subsection (a)) and who files a separate return maintains as his home a household which constitutes for more than one-half of the taxable year the principal place of abode of a dependent (A) who (within the meaning of section 152) is a son, stepson, daughter, or stepdaughter of the individual, and (B) with respect to whom such individual is entitled to a deduction for the taxable year under section 151,

"'(2) such individual furnishes over half of the cost of maintaining such household during the taxable year, and

"'(3) during the entire taxable year such individual's spouse is not a member of such household, such individual shall not be considered as married'.

"(d) TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

"(1) Section 4(a) (relating to number of exemptions) is amended to read as follows:

"'(a) NUMBER OF EXEMPTIONS.—For purposes of the tables prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate pursuant to section 3, the term "number of exemptions" means the number of exemptions allowed under section 151 as deductions in computing taxable income'.

"(2) Section 4(c) (relating to married individuals filing separate returns) is amended to read as follow:

"'(c) HUSBAND OR WIFE FILING SEPARATE RETURN.—

"'(1) A husband or wife may not elect to pay the optional tax imposed by section 3 if the tax of the other spouse is determined under section 1 on the basis of taxable income computed without regard to the standard deduction.

"'(2) Except as otherwise provided in this subsection, in the case of a husband or wife filing a separate return for a taxable year beginning before January 1, 1973, the tax imposed by section 3 shall be the lesser of the tax shown in—

"'(A) the table prescribed under section 3 applicable in the case of married persons filing separate returns which applies the 10-percent standard deduction, or

"'(B) the table prescribed under section 3 applicable in the case of married persons filing separate returns which applies the minimum standard deduction.

"'(3) The table referred to in paragraph (2)(B) shall not apply in the case of a husband or wife filing a separate return if the tax of the other spouse is determined with regard to the 10-percent standard deduction; except that an individual described in section 141(d)(2) may elect (under regulations prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate) to pay the tax shown in the table referred to in paragraph (2)(B) in lieu of the tax shown in the table referred to in paragraph (2)(A). For purposes of this title, an election under the preceding sentence shall be treated as an election made under section 141(d)(2).

"'(4) For purposes of this subsection, determination of marital status shall be made under section 143'."

"(3) Paragraph (4) of section 4(f) is amended to read as follows:

"'(4) For computation of tax by Secretary or his delegate, see section 6014'.

"(4) Section 1304(c)(5) (relating to special rules for income averaging) is amended by striking out 'section 143' and inserting in lieu thereof 'section 143(a)'."

"(e) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by subsections (c) and (d) shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1969.

"SEC. 803. TAX RATES FOR SINGLE INDIVIDUALS AND HEADS OF HOUSEHOLD; OPTIONAL TAX.

"(a) HEADS OF HOUSEHOLD.—Section 1(b)(1) (relating to rates of tax on heads of household) is amended to read as follows:

"'(1) RATES OF TAX.—There is hereby imposed on the taxable income of every individual who is a head of a household a tax determined in accordance with the following table:

Over $100,000----	$53,090, plus 70% of excess over $100,000.

"(2) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—Section 1(a) (relating to rates of tax on individuals) is amended by striking out so much of such section as precedes the table in paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"'(a) GENERAL RULES.—There is hereby imposed on the taxable income of every individual (other than a head of a household to whom subsection (b) applies and an unmarried individual to whom subsection (c) applies) a tax determined in accordance with the following table:'.

"(c) OPTIONAL TAX TABLES FOR INDIVIDUALS.—Section 3 (relating to optional tax if adjusted gross income is less than $5,000) is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 3. OPTIONAL TAX TABLES FOR INDIVIDUALS.

"'In lieu of the tax imposed by section 1, there is hereby imposed for each taxable year beginning after December 31, 1969, on the taxable income of every individual whose adjusted gross income for such year is less than $7,500 (or such higher amount, less than $10,000, as may be prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate by regulations) and who has elected for such year to pay the tax imposed by this section, a tax determined under tables, applicable to such taxable year, which shall be prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate. In the tables so prescribed the amounts of tax shall be computed on the basis of the taxable income computed by taking the standard deduction and on the basis of the rates prescribed by section 1'.

"(d) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

"(1) Section 6014(a) (relating to election by taxpayer) is amended—

"(A) by striking out '$5,000' in the first sentence, and inserting in lieu thereof '$7,500', and

"(B) by striking out the last two sentences.

(2) Section 1304(b)(1) (relating to special rules) is amended by striking out 'if adjusted gross income is less than $5,000'.

"(e) Section 21(d) (relating to changes in rates during a taxable year) is amended to read as follows:

"'(d) CHANGES MADE BY TAX REFORM ACT OF 1969 IN CASE OF INDIVIDUALS.—In applying subsection (a) to a taxable year of an individual which is not a calendar year, each change made by the Tax Reform Act of 1969 in part I or in the application of part IV of subchapter B for purposes of the determination of taxable income shall be treated as a change in the rate of tax.'

"(f) EFFECTIVE DATES.—The amendments made by subsections (a) and (b) of this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1970. The amendments made by subsections (c) and (d) of this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1969.

"SEC. 804. COLLECTION OF INCOME TAX AT SOURCE ON WAGES.

"(a) REQUIREMENT OF WITHHOLDING.—Section 3402(a) (relating to requirement of withholding) is amended to read as follows:

"'(a) REQUIREMENT OF WITHHOLDING.—In the case of wages paid after December 31, 1969, or the 15th day after the date of the enactment of the Tax Reform Act of 1969 (whichever is later), every employer making payment of wages shall deduct and withhold upon such wages (except as otherwise provided in this section) a tax determined in accordance with tables prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate. Such tables shall correspond in form to the tables in effect under this subsection on December 31, 1969. For purposes of applying such tables, the term "amount of wages" means the amount by which the wages exceed the number of withholding exemptions claimed, multiplied by the amount of one such exemption as shown in subsection (b)(1)'.

"(b) PERCENTAGE METHOD OF WITHHOLDING.—

"(1) WAGES PAID IN 1970.—Effective with respect to wages paid during 1970, the table contained in section 3402(b)(1) is amended to read as follows:

"'Percentage Method Withholding Table

"'Payroll period	Amount of one withholding exemption:
Weekly	$13.50
Biweekly	27.00
Semimonthly	29.00
Monthly	58.00

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, in the temporary absence of the leadership, I should like to address a question to the distinguished Senator from Tennessee (Mr. GORE) or the chairman of the committee as to whether any more votes are contemplated today.

Mr. LONG. The answer is "No"; none tonight.

Mr. ALLOTT. That is as succinct as I could hope for. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, let it be said that some Members have requested that a vote on my amendment not come before 4 p.m. tomorrow.

I think that Senators may well expect a vote some time near 4 o'clock or 5 o'clock tomorrow afternoon on the pending amendment.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield further, so that I could ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment?

Mr. GORE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the pending amendment, on which it is hoped the Senate may be able to reach a conclusion tomorrow, will provide for the Senate a clear-cut choice in providing tax relief.

The pending bill provides tax relief for individual income-tax payers by way of changing the Federal income tax rates.

The pending amendment which I have called up on behalf of myself and several other Senators is proposed as a substitute for the rate changes. This is a fundamental choice. The choice will be very meaningful. The proposal is simple. It is easily understood but will be quickly effective.

The amendment would increase the personal exemption for each taxpayer and each dependent from $600 to $700 next year, to $800 the following year, to $900 the following year, and to $1,000 in 1973 and thereafter.

It would appear unnecessary, Mr. President, that I discuss the amendment at this time in detail because the day on which the Senate last met, last Wednesday, I discussed and engaged in extended colloquy on the amendment with the distinguished chairman of the committee.

Senators will find that debate, beginning on page 35929 of the RECORD; thus, instead of taking a great deal of time now and burdening the RECORD with repetition, I invite attention to that RECORD.

Mr. President, I do desire to have printed in the RECORD a table which makes a comparison between the tax reduction provided by the pending bill and the tax reduction to various income level taxpayers provided by the amendment which I offer as a substitute for the tax rate changes. The table shows, Mr. President, that, for a typical taxpayer with three dependents and with an adjusted gross income of $10,000, the pending bill would provide a tax reduction of $56. That is all. My amendment would provide a tax reduction for this same taxpayer of $304.

Let us take another taxpayer. For a typical taxpayer with an adjusted gross income of $5,000 and three dependents, the pending bill would provide a tax reduction of $30. Mr. President, what can a man with a wife and two children do with $30? My amendment would provide a tax reduction for this same taxpayer of $230. Frankly, a family of four, with the cost of living going up every month, cannot do much with $230, but at least $230 is $200 better than $30.

Let us take another example, a typical taxpayer with a wife and two children earning $7,500 per year. The bill would give him a tax reduction of $36. My amendment would give him a tax reduction of $262.

Let us go to another. For a typical taxpayer with an adjusted gross income of $12,500, again with three dependents, the pending bill would provide a tax reduction of $76. My amendment would provide a tax reduction of $304.

For a typical taxpayer, again with three dependents and an adjusted gross income of $20,000, the pending bill would provide a tax reduction of $152. My amendment would provide a tax reduction of $400.

Mr. President, it is when you get into the high brackets that the big differences between the bill and my amendment appear. A typical taxpayer with an adjusted gross income of $100,000 and three dependents would receive a tax reduction under the bill of $2,256. By my amendment he would receive a tax reduction of $928.

Beyond this point, the differences grow. For a taxpayer with an adjusted gross income of $500,000 and three dependents, the pending bill would provide a tax reduction of $22,656. My amendment would give him a tax reduction of $1,120.

And thus it goes.

Mr. President, both the pending bill and my amendment would provide tax reduction liberally for the low-income groups. The differences between the bill and my amendment appear with respect to the tax treatment of people in the middle-income groups and in the high-income groups.

I submit, Mr. President, that people in the lower-middle-income group are the most hard pressed. They are being pressed from the bottom and the top of the economic spectrum.

In order to show the effect of the bill and the amendment, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a table which, as I have said, compares tax reduction from present law under the bill before the Senate and under the personal exemption increase which I propose.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, on tomorrow I shall once again discuss in some detail what I regard as the merits of the pending bill, but since I cited for the RECORD a lengthy discussion the last day the Senate was in session, I shall close by asking unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD, an analysis prepared by the staff of the Finance Committee of the amendment which I and other Senators have submitted. A copy has been distributed to the desk of each Senator, but, for the benefit of the RECORD, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMENDMENT 304, GORE AND OTHERS

TAXATION OF INDIVIDUALS

This amendment is a substitute for that part of the Committee amendment which relates to the low-income allowance, increase in the standard deduction, and reduction in tax rates. It would provide the following:

INCREASE IN PERSONAL EXEMPTION

The personal exemption of $600 under existing law would be increased as follows:

Year:	Amount
1970	$700
1971	800
1972	900
1973 and thereafter	1,000

STANDARD DEDUCTION—LOW INCOME ALLOWANCE

In lieu of the standard deduction and the minimum standard deduction provisions in present law and the low income allowance in the Committee amendment, this amendment would provide a flat $1,000 allowance for all taxpayers after 1972 unless their itemized deductions are larger ($500 for married couples filing separate returns.) A special feature (also contained in the Committee amendment) permits an abandoned spouse to claim the full $1,000 allowance where there are dependent children in the household.

SINGLE PERSONS

The amendment adopts the formula in the Committee amendment for reducing the tax burden on single persons. However, the rates are modified to relate to the rate schedules for married persons in existing law rather than the lower rate schedules in the Committee amendment.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I shall discuss the Senator's amendment tomorrow at an appropriate time. Meanwhile, I invited the Treasury to express its views with regard to the amendment, and I have received a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Edwin S. Cohen, which reflects the Treasury's strong opposition to the amendment.

It will be noted that the Treasury opposed it on the fiscal ground that the revenue loss is something the Government cannot stand without running a substantial deficit. In addition, the Treasury favors the concept agreed to by the committee and voted by the House of Representatives—that, assuming one had the amount of revenue involved available for tax reduction, the approach pursued by the bill before the Senate, agreed to by both the House committee and the Senate committee and voted favorably by the House of Representatives, is the better approach to use.

I ask unanimous consent that the Treasury letter appear in the RECORD at this point.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—which I shall not do—I wonder if Secretary Cohen took into consideration the announcement that appeared today from the Department of Labor that the poverty level had been officially increased. I ask this question because at the time the committee was considering the matter, the distinguished Assistant Secretary cited the statistics of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare to the effect that one could not warrant an exemption beyond $600.

The Labor Department has now raised the poverty level estimates. For example, the poverty level for an urban family of four is now considered by the Department of Labor to be $3,600. Since my amendment would provide an exemption from Federal income tax of $3,800 for a family of four in 1970, it seems that my amendment is more realistic in light of the new estimates of the Department of Labor than the proposal of the Treasury Department. That is why I ask the question.

Mr. LONG. My understanding is that the earlier poverty level figures of HEW for 1966 were adjusted to take into account the rise in the cost of living from 1966 through 1968.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BYRD of West Virginia in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Louisiana?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D.C., December 1, 1969.

HON. RUSSELL B. LONG,
Chairman, Senate Finance Committee, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In accordance with your request, we are writing to summarize the results of our studies of the proposals of Senator Gore for an increase in the personal exemption and a flat $1,000 standard deduction in lieu of the larger standard deductions and the rate reductions provided in the bill as reported by the Committee on Finance.

We join with the Senate Finance Committee in preferring the provisions of the pending bill to the amendment proposed by Senator Gore. The analyses and computer studies which lead us to agree with the conclusions you yourself reached in your eloquent address to the Senate upon the opening of debate on the bill may be briefly stated as follows:

1. Fiscal Considerations. Senator Gore's first proposal is for a $1,000 personal exemption and a flat standard deduction of $1,000 (hereinafter called the Gore $1,000 plan). Adoption of such an amendment would increase the net long-term revenue loss from $2.3 billion under the Committee bill to $8.1 billion a year. We have already expressed serious concern about the $2.3 billion long-term annual revenue loss under the bill in its present form; such a large further increase could not be countenanced.

Senator Gore's alternate plan involving a personal exemption of $900 would produce a long-term annual revenue loss of $5.3 billion. This would be $3 billion more than the Committee bill—again a loss that could not be countenanced.

Senator Gore's further alternate proposal for a personal exemption of $800 (hereinafter called the Gore $800 plan) would produce a net revenue loss in the long run substantially the same as that under the Committee bill. However, for the calendar years 1970 and 1971 the Gore $800 plan would lose approximately $4.8 billion in revenue as contrasted with the Committee bill. This loss would be reflected in fiscal years as follows:

Year ended:	Loss in revenue in billions
June 30, 1970	$0.9
June 30, 1971	2.5
June 30, 1972	1.4
Total	4.8

In view of current budget restrictions and the intense need for fiscal restraint to combat inflation, we believe such a large loss would be most unwise.

2. Basic Concept of the Personal Exemption. In preparing the Administration's proposal for a Low Income Allowance, we adopted the concept that through the standard deduction and the personal exemption the income tax law should impose no tax on persons whose income is below the poverty level. We found that by current HEW standards the minimum income needed to support a single person is approximately $1,700 and that the minimum additional income needed for additional persons in the family rises about $600 per person. This is what the Committee bill allows—$1,700 income without tax for a single person, $2,300 for a married couple without children, $2,900 for a married couple with one child, etc., rising $600 for each additional child. These are the levels at which the tax is zero under the Committee bill.

It is true without doubt that most persons will spend more than $600 on the maintenance of each additional member of the family. But when incomes rise above the minimum level we believe it is then appropriate for the persons involved to begin to contribute something to the cost of maintaining the Federal Government. Present law imposes a high tax rate upon the incomes above the exempt minimum. We believe that efforts should be concentrated, through increases in the standard deduction and through reduction in the tax rates, upon reducing the tax payments required upon incomes above the exempt minimum. The Committee bill proceeds on this theory and we believe that it is sound and desirable policy.

Senator Gore's proposal would exempt from tax an amount per person that substantially exceeds the minimum amount needed to sustain each individual. This would require foregoing increases in the standard deduction above $1,000 and foregoing rate reductions, thus imposing a greater tax burden on incomes above the levels set under his proposals. We believe it is fairer and sounder policy to exempt only the amounts needed as a minimum living standard and to reduce the burdens on amounts above the minimum.

3. Shift in Tax Burden to Single Persons and Smaller Families. Senator Gore's $800 plan would significantly shift the tax burden from large families to single persons and smaller families. Under that plan—

(a) Persons with three or fewer exemptions (single persons and married couples with no children or one dependent child) would pay additional taxes of $1.2 billion.

(b) Persons with four exemptions (generally married persons with two dependent children) would have their taxes reduced by $0.2 billion.

(c) Persons with five or more exemptions (generally married persons with three or more dependent children) would obtain tax reductions of almost $1.0 billion.

Thus the burden of supporting children above the minimum HEW standards would be shifted from the large families which have the children to the single persons and smaller families. Through appropriations for education and other purposes the costs of raising large families is already borne to a considerable extent by those who did not beget the children. We believe the Committee has acted wisely in lowering the burden on all taxpayers whose incomes are above the minimum HEW levels, particularly upon those whose incomes are modestly above such levels, rather than distributing the tax relief by size of families.

The average additional tax payable by persons with less than four exemptions under the Gore proposal as compared with the Committee bill would be:

Adjusted gross income	Percent of additional tax: Single persons	Married, no children	Married, 1 child
$5,000	+2.7	(1)	(1)
$7,000	+4.1	(1)	(1)
$10,000	+11.7	+7.8	+4.5
$12,500	+11.9	+9.0	+6.4
$15,000	+8.9	+6.7	+4.6
$17,500	+5.6	+4.8	+2.6
$20,000	+3.4	+2.9	+1.5

[1] Less tax under the Gore proposal. The table is based upon personal deductions of 10 percent of adjusted gross income

4. Loss in Simplification of the Tax System. The Committee bill through the low income allowance removes 5.6 million persons from the tax rolls and through the standard deduction increases permits 11.6 million persons to shift from itemizing personal deductions to the simple standard deduction. This raises the percentage of total taxable returns that can be filed on the simplified standard deduction basis from 58 percent to 74 percent.

The Gore $800 plan removes 8.4 million persons from the tax rolls but permits only 4.4. million taxable persons to shift from itemizing deductions to the standard deduction. Thus the Gore plan forfeits the benefit of simplification for a large number of taxpayers and for the Internal Revenue Service.

5. Reduction in the Tax Base. The Committee bill, primarily through the low income allowance, reduces the taxable income base to which the specified rates of tax are applied from a present aggregate of $372 billion at present to $350 billion. The tax rate reduction in the bill does not lower the taxable income base.

The Gore $800 plan, by confining the relief to the standard deduction and the personal exemption, would reduce the taxable income base to $327 billion, some $23 billion below the Committee bill level and $45 billion below the current level. This further reduction would seriously affect our fiscal flexibility. If for any reason tax increases should become necessary in the future, the smaller tax base would make larger increases in tax rates necessary to raise the same amount of additional revenue. The effect would be to shift more of the burden of any future tax increases to the middle income groups, where the bulk of the taxable income base is concentrated. We believe that greater flexibility for future changes in the tax structure can be provided if only the minimum sustenance levels are removed from the tax base.

6. Overall Impact of the Bill and the Gore $800 Plan. Taking into account both the reform and the relief provisions, the Committee bill reduces the existing tax burden by about 66 percent on persons with incomes below $3,000 and grants decreasing percentage reductions as income levels rise until it increases the tax by 2.6 percent on incomes above $100,000. Senator Gore's $800 plan would generally follow the same pattern, but with somewhat further reductions in income levels below $10,000 and lesser reductions above the $15,000 level, and a 10.3 percent increase on incomes above $100,000. The overall impact of the Committee bill and Senator Gore's proposal is shown below:

Adjusted gross income class	Committee bill increase or decrease from present law (percent)	Gore $800 plan increase or decrease from present law (percent)
0 to $3,000	−66.1	−72.5
$3,000 to $5,000	−30.3	−36.2
$5,000 to $7,000	−17.0	−23.0
$7,000 to $10,000	−10.9	−16.2
$10,000 to $15,000	−10.3	−10.5
$15,000 to $20,000	−8.6	−7.5
$20,000 to $50,000	−7.2	−5.0
$50,000 to $100,000	−4.8	−.6
$100,000 and over	+2.6	+10.3
Total	−10.1	−10.0

We believe that the Committee bill allocates the overall relief with proper emphasis on incomes below $10,000. Senator Gore's proposal would not be significantly different in overall effect except in its impact on persons with above $50,000. In that category the Committee bill has taken important action to close loopholes and reduce or eliminate tax preferences in the upper brackets, and we believe that having done so it is appropriate for the bill to allocate some part of the tax relief to persons in the higher levels. This was done in the Revenue Act of 1964 and earlier laws when the tax burden was significantly reduced, and we believe it would be unfair and unwise to alter that course in the present bill.

Our studies lead us to conclude that the Committee bill avoids the added fiscal problems of Senator Gore's proposal; proceeds upon a sounder theory in exempting entirely from tax only the income needed to maintain living standards; avoids shifting the burden of tax from larger families to single persons and small families; achieves greater simplification of the tax system; avoids an unwarranted narrowing of the tax base and achieves a more equitable and sounder allocation of the tax relief.

For these reasons the Treasury strongly supports the provisions of the Committee bill in preference to Senator Gore's proposals.

Sincerely yours,

EDWIN S. COHEN,
Assistant Secretary

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, on Thursday, November 27, there was published in the Washington Post an editorial entitled "Senator GORE's Tax Bonanza," opposing the pending amendment. I ask unanimous consent that that editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATOR GORE'S TAX BONANZA

The major fight on the tax bill now before the Senate is likely to center on Senator Gore's proposed amendments. The Senator from Tennessee has devised a seemingly attractive substitute for the chief tax reduction provisions of the bill passed by the House and the version approved by the Senate Finance Committee. But acceptance of his formula by the Senate might seriously complicate the essential compromise between the House and Senate versions and jeopardize enactment of the tax-reform bill.

The Gore substitute features a proposed increase in the personal exemption granted every taxpayer from $600 to $1,000. Combined with a low-income allowance and a lower rate scale for single persons, it is said that this would take more than 11 million taxpayers off the rolls. Undoubtedly this generous gesture will have a wide appeal for beleaguered taxpayers throughout the land, but that is scarcely the test which a responsible Congress will have to apply. Mr. Gore himself concedes that the revenue loss from his bill would be $7.7 billion in 1971, when its terms would be only 50 per cent effective. Estimates of its cost to the Treasury when its goodies would come into full bloom in 1973 run as high as $14 billion.

Just what is there in the present economic outlook with the war in Vietnam still in progress, with mammoth social needs still unmet at home and with inflationary pressure still running strong, to warrant the extension of such a bonanza to taxpayers? Senator Gore seems to be living in a dream world where it is possible for people to eat their cake and have it too. Regardless of how pleasant it is to muse about tax relief on this scale, every thinking citizen must realize that only an irresponsible Congress could actually vote it.

Substantial tax reductions have been included, of course, in both the House and the Finance Committee bills. This is part of the original concept of passing on to hard-pressed taxpayers the savings from the closing of tax-escape valves. Actually the spread between the new revenue to be realized and the reductions to be granted by both bills is causing a good deal of concern, although the short-fall is far below that of the Gore proposals. To meet the criticism of fiscal irresponsibility Senator Gore has suggested additional reforms which he says would produce more than $5 billion in revenue, but there is no indication that these are likely to be enacted.

The Senate's emphatic rejection of Senator Allen's proposed $1,200 personal exemption and its approval of the scaled-down surtax for the first half of 1970 suggest that it may well deal realistically with the Gore substitute. But the major test is yet to come, and every senator will need to remember that revenue to meet the nation's urgent national needs is no less essential to a secure future than fair and equitable division of the burden.

IN SUPPORT OF SENATOR GORE'S TAX AMENDMENTS

Mr. MONDALE. Mr. President, half a loaf may be better than none at all, but it is still not good enough.

The tax bill which has come out of committee is just that—half a loaf.

It is not an insignificant bill. In any other year, I would probably applaud its provisions for reform and relief. Surely, they go far beyond anything we have had for years.

But this year we have made promises to the American people. We have exposed our current tax laws for what they are—riddled with loopholes for the rich and placing an ever-greater burden on the average wage earner. We have talked reform and we have talked relief.

Now we are faced with the question: "Can we put our legislation where our talk has been?" Can we give the people a tax system which is both reasonable and equitable? Can we, in short, keep the promises which we have been making to the taxpayers since last spring?

As I said, the bill before the Senate is at least half a loaf:

It does provide some relief, particularly for those below the poverty level.

It reduces some of the discrimination upon single taxpayers.

It narrows a few of the worst loopholes such as hobby farms, multiple corporations, unlimited charitable deductions.

It makes an attempt to see that no American escapes taxes altogether.

And it even takes a faint swipe at one of the worst loopholes of them all—the oil depletion allowance.

But there are still innumerable loopholes through which the wealthy taxpayer can escape. And more important, the average taxpayer continues to be caught in the viscous squeeze between a soaring cost of living, and a tax burden which is swollen with huge military and space expenditures along with the cost of paying for the rich man's loopholes.

With inflation and taxes, the average American must run to stay in the same place. A minimal urban family budget—only the bare necessities—has been estimated by the Bureau of Labor Statistics to be about $6,000—a minimal "decent" budget at about $9,000. Yet the average blue collar worker today makes less in real purchasing power than a year ago.

Part of this is the tax burden which the average American must bear to pay for what the rich and the corporations may avoid.

Everyone has heard of those 155 returns in 1967 showing incomes in excess of $200,000 and paying no taxes. But even the millionaires who do pay taxes pay only at an average of 25 percent. And the 20 largest oil companies paid all of 8½ percent on their profits.

I do not wish at this time to go over the all-too-familiar list of perversions and inequities. You know them all too well. Rather, I wish to point out the dual nature of our mission: reform and relief—a more equitable tax system and a lighter load for the average American. These are the inseparable parts of our promise to the American people.

The tax bill we have before us in the Senate falls short of this promise. Almost 25 percent of the tax relief goes to taxpayers in the top 5 percent of the tax bracket.

While the committee's tax bill would rightly and sensibly remove some 5 million of our poorest from the tax rolls altogether, it does far less for those whose incomes fall between $3,000 and $15,000

To bring meaningful relief to this broad range of wage earners and salaried workers, I strongly support the proposals put forth by Senator GORE.

Senator GORE, who serves on the Finance Committee and who has a thorough grasp of both the strengths and the weaknesses of this current bill, has given us a series of proposals to bring about this relief.

The key feature is raising the personal exemptions—that portion of income for one's self and one's dependents set aside to be free of all taxation.

In 1948, this exemption was set at $600 per person. It is still $600. In over two decades of rising prices and eroding dollars, the family of four still gets to exclude only $2,400 before it must begin paying Federal income taxes.

An exemption ought to reflect in some way what it costs to feed, clothe, raise and educate a child.

Since 1948, when the exemption was set at $600, the basic cost of living has gone up almost 50 percent.

The cost of public higher education has risen by almost 75 percent.

And the cost of a private college education has gone up well over 90 percent.

A personal exemption of $600 simply makes no sense in 1969. Raising this to some reasonable figure—such as the $1,000 suggested by Senator GORE—would be a way to bring relief to each and every taxpayer.

There have been objections to using the personal exemption as a vehicle for tax reform. Opponents of this tactic have pointed out that an increased exemption is worth far more to the individual in the higher brackets than to those in the lower brackets, who would not have paid as much as on that income anyway.

This would be a valid objection to a simple increase in the personal exemption. But a combinaton of adjustments in the personal exemption, and on the standard deduction, with changes in the basic rate structure in the committee bill can easily overcome this problem.

Senator GORE'S proposals, starting with a $1,000 personal exemption and a $1,000 minimum stardard deduction, for example, would provide significantly greater relief than would the committee's bill for all individuals with incomes below $20,000. Particularly noticeable relief would be felt by those with incomes of $10,000 and under. Senator GORE'S amendment would cut taxes by 98 percent on incomes below $3,000; by 47 percent on incomes from $3,000 to $5,000; by 36 percent on incomes from $5,000 to $7,000; by 29 percent on incomes from $7,000 to $10,000; and by 20 percent on incomes from $10,000 to $15,000.

It is important to note, however, that this device is not just a procedure for more relief; it is also a procedure for a more equitable distribution of relief. For example, combining increased exemptions of $800 and an increased minimum standard deduction of $1,100 would, under Senator GORE'S approach provide the same total dollar relief as the current tax package reported by the Finance Committee. Yet, the distribution of this relief would be shifted toward the middle income taxpayer, giving significantly greater relief to all taxpayers up through those with adjusted gross income of $15,000.

Increasing personal exemption, then, can be a device for achieving greater equity in our tax system. It is a break for the average taxpayer, and it follows common sense of adjusting to the changing economic realities of the last decade.

Some may ask the reasonable question: "Where is the money for relief to come from?" How do we finance the over $5 billion additional cost of the Gore proposal—especially when many of us are urging expanded programs elsewhere in the Federal budget.

I submit that it is both philosophically consistent and fiscally responsible to urge more spending upon education and human programs and, at the same time, press for tax relief for the average American.

Both of these changes—tax relief and expanded human programs—can be funded from two sources: tax reforms, and a restructuring of spending priorities.

The Senate bill before you raises $6.5 billion largely through closing of loopholes. There is more where that comes from. Former Senator Paul Douglas has estimated a potential $12.5 billion in reforms, and Philip Stern back in 1962 suggested a possible $50 billion from tax reform. We must continue to quest for further reforms which can be translated into relief for the average American.

The other source, of course, is to cut from our incredible defense budget. Look at what happens to every $100 collected in taxes by the Federal Government: We spend $4 on education; we spend $1.85 on housing and community development; $1.25 goes to the preservation and utilization of our natural resources; and we spend $66 for wars—past, present, and future.

We seem to find $600,000 to give to the University of Mississippi to find out how to make birds into soldiers, and we are asked to make cuts in education and other human programs.

We manage to get to the moon—an admirable goal—but achieved without reference to its cost. On our last jaunt to that moon, we left behind $67 million worth of junked equipment including boots at $4,000 a pair, $70,000 worth of cameras, backpacks at $300,000 apiece, and hammers and chisels worth $45,000.

The irresponsibility lies not with those of us who seek to combine tax relief with a restored sense of priorities. It must lie with those who are content with half a loaf of tax reform and with the perpetuation of a Federal budget which places wars and things above people.

SCHOOL ENROLLMENTS IN WASHINGTON, D.C.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, according to IBM data, from HEW's official files, based on the 1968–69 elementary and secondary school enrollment, Washington, D.C., has a total enrollment of 148,725 students in 188 schools, of which 139,006—or 93.4 percent—are Negro students, 8,280—or 5.5 percent—are white, and the remaining 1,439—or 1.1 percent—are made up of orientals, Spanish Americans, and American Indians.

There are 3,636, or 43 percent of the 8,280 white students, attending majority Negro school; only 1,253—or 0.9 percent—of the Negro students are attending majority white schools. There are 56 schools with 41,109 students that are 100 percent Negro. There are another 57 schools that have 99 to 99.9 percent Negro students, which makes an aggregate of 113 schools with enrollments totaling 96,518 which are 99 to 100 percent Negro. Another 16 schools are 98 to 99 percent Negro. Another 13 schools are 97 to 98 percent Negro, and another 10 schools have Negro enrollments of 95 to 97 percent—making a total of 152 schools with total enrollment of 125,158 that are 95 to 100 percent Negro. In a great percentage of these schools which have enrollments of from 1,000 to 2,000 students, there are only one, two, or three students listed as white.

Of the 188 schools in Washington, D.C., there are only 18 that have a majority white enrollment. These range from the Capitol Page School with an enrollment of 41, of which 7.1 percent are Negroes, to an elementary school of 253, which is 43.1 percent Negro.

In other words, it would be difficult to find any school district that is more segregated than the public schools of Washington, D.C., and perhaps there is significance in the manner in which, and the speed with which, this has occurred.

The District of Columbia, by law, formerly had a dual school system based upon race. According to information set forth in the case of U.S. v. Jefferson County Board of Education (372 Fed. 2d 836, 1966), at page 904, the District of Columbia desegregated following the Supreme Court decision of 1954, at a faster rate than did the South, along with some other border States, and by the 1961–62 school year had more than half of its school enrollment attending desegregated schools. At page 905, information is set out with respect to enrollment and percentage of Negroes in white schools in southern and border States, and it is reported that the District of Columbia had 109,270, or 84.81 percent, of its Negro student enrollment in schools with whites.

Senate hearings on H.R. 8569, District of Columbia appropriations, 90th Congress, first session, fiscal year 1968, part I, at page 693, et seq., set forth the pupil membership of the Washington, D.C., schools by school and race for the school years 1954–55 and 1966–67. The school year 1954–55 was the first following the 1954 Supreme Court decision. These tabulations reflected that in the 1954–55 school year, there was a total of 102,920 students, 40,313—or 39 percent—of whom were white and 62,607—or 61 percent—of whom were Negroes. The 1966–67 school year figures reflect a total enrollment of 145,933, of which 12,678—or 8.7 percent—were white and 133,273—or 91.3 percent—were Negroes. As previously indicated, the 1968–69 Washington school enrollment totaled 148,725, of which 8,280—or 5.5 percent—were white, 93.4 percent were Negroes, and 0.9 percent consisted of other minority groups.

I ask unanimous consent that a table entitled "Summary of Pupil Membership by School and Race" for the Washington, D.C., schools for the school year 1954–55 and the school year 1966–67, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C., SUMMARY OF PUPIL MEMBERSHIP BY SCHOOL AND RACE

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I present these official figures as a part of the picture of enforced school integration being followed by a natural resegregation when parents act on their own rather than through compulsion. Testimony has been given by Health, Education, and Welfare that after they attain integration of students in the desired proportion in a school, either through administrative action or a court order, that they will then withdraw their surveillance and leave the school district on its own. As testified, Health, Education and Welfare's further position is that should the board of education engage in any discriminatory action, Health, Education, and Welfare would reenter the case. Thus all school districts can expect perpetual surveillance and police action. If the parents are left free to act, there will be a resegregation of the schools in large part.

Mr. President, these figures speak for themselves. I shall refer to them again in further presentations.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the will of the Senate?

TAX REFORM ACT OF 1969

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 13270), the Tax Reform Act of 1969.

CAPITOL GUIDE SERVICE

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana (Mr. MANSFIELD) and I have a bill pending, the purpose of which is to provide for free guide service for tourists and schoolchildren visiting the Nation's Capitol. On research, we found that the Capitol of the United States is about the only capitol in the Western World which does not furnish free guide service. Even the schoolchildren have to pay to get a tour of our Capitol.

The same measure has been passed by the Senate at least once, and possibly twice; however, it has not been acted upon by the House.

I have discussed the matter with the majority leader and with the chairman of the committee. I ask the chairman of the committee if we could not include the measure in the pending bill. I realize that it is not germane to the pending bill; however, I ask if the chairman will be willing to take to conference the bill as an amendment to the pending bill.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator be permitted to offer his amendment at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CRANSTON in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment we dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered, and the amendment will be printed in the RECORD.

The amendment ordered to be printed in the RECORD reads as follows:

At the end of the act add the following new section:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Capitol Guides Act".

"ESTABLISHMENT AND PURPOSES

"SEC. 2. (a) There is hereby established, within the Congress of the United States, an organization to be known as the Capitol Guide Service, which shall provide, without charge, guided tours of the interior of the United States Capitol Building for the education and enlightenment of the general public. The Service shall be under the direction, control, and supervision of the Capitol Police Board (hereafter referred to as the 'Board').

"(b) The Board may also detail guides to assist the United States Capitol Police by providing ushering and informational services, and other services not directly involving law enforcement, in connection with the inauguration of the President and Vice President of the United States, the official reception of representatives of foreign nations and other persons by the Senate or House of Representatives, and other special or ceremonial occasions in the United States Capitol Building or on the United States Capitol Grounds which require the presence of additional Government personnel and which cause the temporary suspension of the performance of the regular duties of the Capitol Guide Service.

"GUIDES

"SEC. 3. (a) (1) There shall be appointed to the Capitol Guide Service such guides as may be necessary, including a chief guide, to carry out effectively and efficiently the activities of the Service. The chief guide shall be appointed by the Board, and one-half of all other guides shall be selected for appointment by the Board by the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and the other one-half selected for appointment by the Board by the Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives.

"(2) The annual (gross) rate of pay of the chief guide shall be $9,417, and the annual (gross) rate of pay of any other guide shall be $8,322.

"(3) Section 106(a) of the Legislative Branch Appropriation Act, 1963, as amended (2 U.S.C. 60; (a)), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new clause: '(8) Guides of the Capitol Guide Service.'

"(b) No guide of the Capitol Guide Service shall charge or accept any fee, or accept any gratuity, for or on account of his official services.

"(c) Section 2107 of title 5, United States Code, relating to the definition of 'congressional employee', is amended—

"(1) by striking out the word 'and' at the end of paragraph (7);

"(2) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (8) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and the word 'and'; and

"(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"'(9) a guide of the Capitol Guide Service.'.

"(d) Section 8332(b) of title 5, United States Code, relating to creditable service for retirement purposes, is amended—

"(1) by striking out the word 'and' at the end of paragraph (5);

"(2) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (6) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and the word 'and';

"(3) by adding immediately after paragraph (6) the following new paragraph:

"'(7) subject to sections 8334(c) and 8339 (h) of this title, service performed on and after February 19, 1929, and prior to the effective date of the Capitol Guides Act, as a United States Capitol guide."; and

"(4) by inserting at the end thereof the following sentence: 'The Civil Service Commission shall accept the certification of the Capitol Police Board concerning service and rates of pay for the purpose of this subchapter of the type described in paragraph (7) of this subsection and performed by a guide.'

"(e) Notwithstanding the other provisions of this section, the Board and the Sergeants at Arms of the two Houses shall afford, to each person who is a member of the United States Capitol Guides immediately prior to the effective date of this Act, the opportunity to be appointed under this Act to the Capitol Guide Service. For the purposes of the initial appointments of such persons, the appointments and number of such persons shall be considered to have been authorized and approved for the Capitol Guide Service under subsection (a)(1) of this section.

"POWERS OF THE BOARD

"SEC. 4. (a) The Board is authorized—

"(1) to prescribe the duties and responsibilities of the guides;

"(2) to prescribe a uniform dress, including approprate insignia, which shall be worn by such guides when on duty;

"(3) from time to time as may be necessary, to procure and furnish, without charge, such uniforms to such guides;

"(4) to enter into contracts or other arrangements, or modifications thereof, to carry out the purposes of this Act; and

"(5) to take such actions and make such expenditures as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act.

"(b) The Board may take appropriate disciplinary action, including suspension or removal, against any guide who violates any provision of this Act or any regulation prescribed by the Board pursuant to this Act, except that a guide may not be suspended from duty without pay, demoted, removed, or have his pay reduced unless (1) in the case of the chief guide, a majority of the members of the Board so decides, and (2) in the case of any other guide, the Sergeant at Arms who appointed that guide consents.

"(c) All expenses and salaries of the Capitol Guide Service shall be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the Chairman of the Board, out of funds appropriated for the Service.

"TRANSFER PROVISIONS

"SEC. 5. (a) On the effective date of this Act, all personnel records, financial records, assets, and other property of the United States Capitol Guides, which exist immediately prior to such effective date, are transferred to the Capitol Guide Service.

"(b) As soon as practicable after the effective date of this Act, but not later than the close of the sixtieth day after such effective date, the Board shall, out of the assets and property belonging to the United States Capitol Guides immediately prior to such date, on the basis of a special audit which shall be conducted by the General Accounting Office—

"(1) settle and pay any outstanding accounts payable of the United States Capitol Guides;

"(2) discharge the financial and other obligations of the United States Capitol Guides (including reimbursement to purchasers of tickets for guided tours which are purchased and paid for in advance of intended use and are unused); and

"(3) otherwise wind up the affairs of the United States Capitol Guides; which exist immediately prior to such effective date. The Board shall dispose of any net monetary amounts remaining after the winding up of the affairs of the United States Capitol Guides, in accordance with the practices and procedures of the United States Capitol Guides, existing immediately prior to the effective date of this Act, with respect to disposal of monetary surpluses.

"EFFECTIVE DATE

"SEC. 6. The provisions of this Act shall become effective on the first day of the first month which begins after the thirtieth day after the date of enactment of this Act."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, on behalf of the Senator from Montana (Mr. MANSFIELD) and myself that a statement explaining the amendment be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the explanation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXPLANATION OF THE FREE GUIDE SERVICE AMENDMENT

This amendment would establish a Capital Guide Service that would offer the public guided tours of the Capitol building without charge.

The guides will be under the jurisdiction of the Capitol Police Board and will be given the same status in all respects as the present "trained" Capitol Police Force. For example, salaries will be equivalent to trained police salaries, selection will be made—one-half from the Senate, one-half from the House—by the respective Sergeants-at-Arms as they now are for the Police Force, and the guides are brought under the legislative retirement, health and insurance programs.

It will be recalled that on March 7, 1967, the Senate adopted an amendment to the Legislative Reorganization measure that established a free Capitol guide service. With minor changes, that proposal approved by a Senate vote of 74 to 8, is identical to the provisions of this amendment.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, is not the Gore amendment to be the pending business when the Senate meets tomorrow morning?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

ADJOURNMENT TO 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr President, if there be no further business to come before the Senate, I move in accordance with the previous order that the Senate stand in adjournment until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 53 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned until Tuesday, December 2, 1969, at 10 a.m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate December 1, 1969:

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

HUBERT F. LEE, EDITOR OF DIXIE BUSINESS MAGAZINE, WAS ONCE IN ARMY BALLOON CORPS

HON. HERMAN E. TALMADGE

OF GEORGIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, an article entitled "Hubert F. Lee, Reporter, Editor of Dixie Business Was Once In Army Balloon Corps," written by Fran Fossett, and published in the Decatur-DeKalb News, states that Mr. Lee may have been the only man in history to serve accidentally in the Army Balloon Corps.

I ask unanimous consent that this interesting account be printed in the Extensions of Remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HUBERT F. LEE—REPORTER, EDITOR OF DIXIE BUSINESS WAS ONCE IN ARMY BALLOON CORPS

(By Fran Fossett)

DeKalb's Hubert F. Lee may be the only man in history to have served accidentally in the Army Balloon Corps. Not too many men in history, as well as can be determined, served in the Balloon Corps even on purpose.

"Back in July, 1919," Mr. Lee tells us, "I enlisted in the Army in Cleveland, Ohio, to go to Russia and fight the Bolsheviks. They said they needed some troops for Russian service. Well, instead they sent us to balloon school, first at Camp Knox, Kentucky and then the one next to Camp Eustis, Virginia." Mr. Lee never got to Russia, and everybody knows how the Bolsheviks made out.

"Balloons were used for observation purposes," Mr. Lee says, "much as helicopters are used now, except of course the balloons couldn't do all the other things that helicopters can. I suppose the helicopter dealt the last blow to the use of balloons in the services."

Mr. Lee's main function was being, in his words, a human sandbag. "The balloons were inflated with hydrogen gas from cylinders," he explains, "and it was quite a job getting them launched right. While the balloon was still in its hangar, we would hook it up to a four-wheel-drive truck with a huge winch.

"Then we'd have men all the way around the balloon holding onto ropes (these men were the sandbags) and once it was out of the hangar we'd ease it off hand over hand." Mr. Lee's balloons were the sort that remained attached to a base point on the ground; as far as he recalls none ever broke loose and floated off into the ever after. This was just as well, since there were a couple of men who would have floated off also.

"Ordinarily," says Mr. Lee, "the balloons would carry two men in the basket, to take pictures or send back information. I had an electrical engineering course at the Virginia school, and helped install radios in the balloons as part of my duties."

Having survived the hazards of peacetime ballooning, Mr. Lee left the Army in the summer of 1921, in favor of the more down-to-earth job of news reporting. "I'd been writing for the Columbus, Georgia paper, and my boss there wrote the Atlanta Constitution and told them I had a 'nose for news.'

"So I went to work as a cub reporter for the Constitution. After a while at that I did advertising supplement writing, then went with United Press for a couple of years, and then to LaGrange for the LaGrange Reporter."

With a capital investment of $15, Mr. Lee started Dixie Business magazine which he edits and publishes out of his Covington Road home and offices. Dixie Business is best known for its annual Man of the South award, which has gone to prominent southerners since 1946, and for its Hall of Fame for Living, comprised of distinguished living Americans.

Mrs. Lee assists her husband with the managing and editing of Dixie Business, and with keeping track of the voluminous stores of books, magazines and clippings that overflow every corner of the house. The Lees have two sons and a daughter who live in California, New York and Texas, but come visiting whenever they can with the four grandchildren.

Asked which branch of service he would choose if he were entering today, Mr. Lee said "the Air Force," without a moment's hesitation. Even if they don't always assign everyone as planned, Mr. Lee believes the air-minded people offer the best chance for adventure.

RESPONSIBLE VIEWS

HON. W. C. (DAN) DANIEL

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. DANIEL of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished senior Senator from Virginia, HARRY F. BYRD, JR., has expressed sound views on many timely subjects throughout the State of Virginia in the last 2 months.

These are responsible views on topics that are important to every American citizen and deserve wide distribution.

I submit for inclusion the following excerpts in the RECORD:

VIEWS—IN BRIEF

LEXINGTON.—Senator Byrd called for a "balanced view" of the American military establishment in a speech here at the dedication of a new alumni hall at Virginia Military Institute.

The notion that the nation's defense is run by "bloodthirsty generals" backed by an insidious military-industrial complex is refuted by the careers of men like Dwight D. Eisenhower and VMI's George C. Marshall, Byrd said.

Byrd cautioned against flying to an opposite extreme and assuming that the military is above criticism. "Responsible criticism of the military is both healthy and democratic," he said.

"What is needed," he declared, "is a balanced view—skepticism without hostility, loyalty without blindness."

MARINE SCIENCE

GLOUCESTER POINT.—While probing outer space, the United States should devote more resources and energies to exploring the seas which cover 80 per cent of the earth's surface.

That was Senator Byrd's message at the dedication of a marine science building here. The building named for the Senator's uncle, the late Admiral Richard E. Byrd, is part of the Virginia Institute of Marine Science.

"America cannot much longer afford to mark time in oceanography," Byrd warned.

DRAFT REFORM

BLACKSBURG.—Draft reforms urged by President Nixon won endorsement from Senator Byrd in a speech before the Chamber of Commerce here.

Byrd pointed out he had suggested to former President Johnson changes in the draft similar to those now advocated by Nixon.

The reforms included calling 19-year-olds first, virtually eliminating their chance of later callup except in time of war, temporary educational deferments and a lottery system for choosing among those eligible.

TWO VICTORIES

RICHMOND.—The American Revolution and the exploration of the moon have something in common. Senator Byrd said at a Knights of Columbus banquet here.

"The one was a victory of the spirit, the other a victory of technology," he said. "But both show the force behind our total commitment to a goal."

PROPER PROTEST

PETERSBURG.—Anti-war demonstrators should protest Hanoi's treatment of U.S. prisoners, Senator Byrd said here at an American Legion Veterans Day observance.

"In time of war," he said, "we must present a united front."

Byrd pointed out that North Vietnam bars Red Cross visits to prisoners, will not permit letters to be written home or received and refuses to release the names of captives.

"I cannot imagine anything more cruel and inhumane," he said.

HOME RULE FOR SCHOOLS

HAMPTON.—"All of us should work together to get Washington's finger out of the local school board's pie," Senator Byrd told a meeting of the Virginia School Boards Association here.

"Those who serve on our school boards have a heavy responsibility. I admire you, but I do not envy you," Byrd said.

"I know that you spend weeks and months putting together programs you consider beneficial," he said, "only to get the last-minute word that your scheme doesn't jibe with the policy of the month at the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare."

"Under the present system, school districts often find dollars available for frills while basic needs go unmet for lack of funds," the Senator said.

AID AND TAXES

WEST POINT.—Eliminating or substantially reducing foreign economic aid would remove the need for the income tax surcharge beyond 1969, Senator Byrd said here at a meeting of the King William Forestry Club.

Byrd pointed out that the foreign economic aid budget of $2.2 billion is almost double last year's. "I do not believe the American people should be called upon to pay a surtax to finance this kind of increase," he said.

A total of about $5.2 billion in foreign economic aid money has been carried over from previous years and could take care of contingencies, the Senator said.

Later in the Senate, Byrd introduced amendments to halt the surtax at the end of 1969.

CONSUMER BILL

ARLINGTON.—The best consumer legislation is that which fights inflation, Senator Byrd told the Arlington Business and Professional Women's Club. "Inflation is eating heavily into the housewife's dollar," he said.

AFTER THE FLOOD

LOVINGSTON.—Senator Byrd saluted the "courage and generosity" of citizens who came to the aid of their neighbors in the section of Virginia stricken by severe floods on August 19.

He spoke at the annual dinner of the Chamber of Commerce of Nelson County, the hardest hit subdivision in the state.

The "strong spirit" of the flood victims is proof that the devastated areas will be rebuilt, the Senator said.

FOREIGN POLICY

STAUNTON.—The Senate must re-assert its constitutional role in foreign policy, Senator Byrd said here at the 46th annual banquet of Shenandoah Valley, Inc.

He presented the Shenandoah Bowl for service to the valley to E. Lewis Knowles, retired managing editor of the Staunton Leader and former mayor of Staunton.

SPEAKING OUT

HON. PAUL J. FANNIN

OF ARIZONA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. FANNIN. Mr. President, last week I received from the Reverend James F. Hughes a reprint of a Memorial Day address delivered by the Reverend John J. Atwell, an Episcopalian clergyman at Apache Junction, Ariz. His address was reprinted in the Phillips County News in Malta, Mont.

The Reverend Mr. Hughes is himself a former combat infantryman who fought in Italy in World War II with Gen. Mark Clark.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the address be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A TRIBUTE TO THE DISSIDENTS

(By John J. Atwell, May, 1969)

Where were YOU when Washington fought in the rain, snow, and ice at Valley Forge?
YOU were not there.
Where were YOU when the shot which was heard around the world was shot at Concord Bridge?
YOU were not there.
Where were YOU when brave men fought, bled, and died at Bunker Hill, and at Bull Run?
YOU were not there.
Where were YOU when Washington needed strong men to cross the icy Delaware?
YOU were not there.
Where were YOU when YOU were needed at Yorktown, and at the Alamo?
YOU were not there.
Where were YOU at the signing of the Declaration of Independence, at the writing of the Constitution of these United States, at the writing of the Bill of Rights, at the composing of the Star Spangled Banner, and the sewing of the American flag?
YOU were not there.
Where were YOU during the Battle of New Orleans, and San Juan Hill?
YOU were not there.
Where were YOU at the battles of the Philippines, and in the Argonne Forest?
YOU were not there.
Where were YOU when the United States armed forces marched under the Arch of Victory in France?
YOU were not there.
Where were YOU at the fall of Corregidor, and at the liberation of the Philippines?
YOU were not there.
Where were YOU when brave Americans stormed the beaches of Iwo Jima and Normandy and Utah on D-Day?
YOU were not there.
Where were YOU at the time of the Johnstown Flood, at the Chicago fire, at the San Francisco earthquake, and Texas City?
YOU were not there.
Where were YOU when YOU were needed for the Korean conflict, in Vietnam, and on Hamburger Hill?
YOU were not there.
I never saw YOU at any of the battles, nor any other place where brave and valiant men fought and died. And I cannot be wrong because there were many millions of faithful Americans with me, and they never saw YOU either.
Where were YOU when this country needed strong arms, clear minds, and valiant spirits and proud defenders of her principles and honor?
YOU were not there.
Where were YOU during the time of peace?
I know where YOU were. YOU were demonstrating. YOU were making trouble and destroying our beautiful cities. YOU were wrecking our colleges and universities. YOU were burning your draft cards, and defaming the Flag of these United States of America.
For three long, difficult centuries YOU have had thousands of opportunities to serve, to defend, and to honor this country.
BUT YOU were NEVER there when and where YOU were needed.
YOU know very well WHO has been the custodian of the peace, the security, the honor, the liberty, the freedom, and the wealth YOU have enjoyed. He's the Armed Forces of the United States of America and over two hundred millions of faithful and patriotic Americans who have fought, died, and labored long, tedious hours to be free people.
And YOU were not there.
And YOU have the gall to say "I have rights"?
May I ask YOU "What rights do YOU have that you really deserve?"
When YOU have done absolutely nothing to deserve them?
YOU were not with Washington at Valley Forge, nor at any of the battles, nor at any other place which I have named, when YOU were needed, and where YOU were needed. And YOU still insist "I have rights".
YOU have neither fought, nor died for the rights you speak of, nor have YOU even tried to live for those rights, nor have you honored the principles of this great republic.
I merely call YOU friend, because I cannot consider YOU to be an American, because an American is always there when HE is needed.
YOU have "rights" but only those that are delegated and given to YOU by those who have deserved them, who have died, and live for them.
Rights, liberty and freedom belong only to those who are ready and willing to die, and moreover to live for their beloved country, for her honor and for her principles and ideals.
YOU are living by the blood of honorable, faithful, and true Americans. And not until YOU are ready and willing to follow their fine examples have YOU any "rights" of which YOU speak.
Where will YOU be when the diplomas are handed out this year?
Will you be there in your cap and gown?
Where will YOU be when YOUR country calls YOU to fight for her honor, for her "rights," her liberty, and her freedom?
Will YOU proudly volunteer YOUR services?
IF YOU are NOT ready and willing to be there and do YOUR part when YOU are needed, don't tell me about YOUR "rights".
What about the "rights" of those who died to make us free?
I was with Washington at Valley Forge. I was proud to die for the country that gave me life, freedom, and wealth.
I will always be ready and willing to die for my countrymen, and for their freedom as well as for my own. I have been in all of the battles of this Republic, I have been every place, every time I was needed and where I was needed, and I have been at every important event that has taken place in American history. I will always be there waiting for her call to do my part for her sacred honor.
YOU or no one else have any "rights" until YOU have made some effort to secure and obtain them for others as well as for yourself.
WHO am I? I am only one of over two hundred million of Americans who enjoy the "rights" we live by and for every day.
I don't believe that my service which I have given for my country has been in vain.
Neither do I believe that my fellowmen who have made the supreme sacrifice have wasted their precious lives, because we Americans are still free.

THE PRICE OF FUN

HON. E. Y. BERRY

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, one of the very interesting columns which appeared this past week was printed in the December 1 issue of Newsweek. It is the column of Stewart Alsop, a well-known writer which is most appropriate to be inserted in the RECORD today as the House considers the Vietnam resolution.

The column is as follows:

THE PRICE OF FUN

(By Stewart Alsop)

WASHINGTON.—Wandering about this city, during the weekend of the "peace march," I made a profound politico-sociological observation. "The kids" were having a lot of fun.

The political implications of this startling discovery are clear. The kids will want to have a lot of fun again. Even if Mr. Nixon orders all U.S. troops home from Vietnam tomorrow, and asks for the nationalization of all defense industries the day after, the kids will have their fun. This conclusion was confirmed by The Washington Post's Nicholas von Hoffman, this city's chief kidologist.

"These enormous scenes of communion and contact will continue," he wrote. "They love the coming together, the touching and sharing of food and bodies; they love the improvising of crash pads . . . they love getting high on each other and they dig the feeling that they are part of something very large . . ."

The touching and sharing process was widely visible during the speechmaking on Saturday afternoon. The slopes below the Washington Monument were dotted with undulating caterpillar tents made of blankets, into or out of which boys or girls would pop from time to time. It was clear that there was a good deal of touching and sharing going on, and it was also clear that the motivations which brought the kids to the blankets were not wholly political. It certainly looked like great fun.

EXCITING GAME

There is another kind of fun which these "scenes of communion and contact" provide. This is the game of Cops and Kids, which is a lineal descendant of the childhood game of Cops and Robbers. It is much more exciting and hardly any more dangerous.

One player of the game, supported by a pretty girl with blond hair, was walking slowly, with tragic gait, across Dupont Circle late Friday night. The boy had a handkerchief across his mouth, and his eyes were streaming—he had obviously had a good whiff of tear gas. His girl looked up at him adoringly, as they walked together across the circle and down Connecticut Avenue, no doubt to some improvised crash pad. The scene could have been cut from one of the more sentimental old war movies—the wounded hero consoled by his lady love.

A man would have to be very old indeed with a very poor memory indeed, not to understand how much fun that particular kid was having, despite the streaming eyes. The cops-and-kids game gives the kids a chance to be heroes to their lady loves without any danger at all of being badly hurt, much less killed, which is why it is such a popular game and quite certain to continue, no matter what President Nixon does about Vietnam.

Even the cops seem to enjoy the game, although under the current rules a lot more cops than kids get hurt, in proportion to their numbers. In the aftermath of the kids' attack on the South Vietnamese Embassy, I got my car wedged in between two police command cars in a back street behind the embassy. There was nothing to do but roll up the windows against the gas and watch the show.

ENJOYING IT

Every once in a while a little group of shadowy figures would appear, and there would be shouts of "pigs" or "Fascists," and a cop would hurl a canister, and the kids would run off into the night. The young cops were joking with each other as they went about the business of adjusting their masks or arming themselves with more canisters. It was obvious that they were enjoying the game too, not in any sinister way, but because it was a good game.

The game was invented during the Chicago convention last year, and it was played pretty roughly there. But even in Chicago, nobody got killed or even permanently injured, and in Washington, there were hardly any bloody heads or bloody noses at all. As the rules of the game have developed, the cops lose the game if a picture appears on television showing a kid—especially a pretty girl—being hit by a cop. Under the Washington rules, clubs used to push, not club, and crowds are dispersed with tear gas, not billy sticks.

Certain rituals have developed. One ritual which I first witnessed in Chicago's Grant Park last year, I saw again in front of the Justice Department. This is the lowering of the American flag by the kids, and the raising or attempted raising of the Viet Cong flag, followed by the reverse process by the cops. This ritual is a sort of kick-off—it got the game really going both at Grant Park and at the Justice Department.

The kids are undoubtedly "sincere," as their admirers say. They sincerely detest the war in Vietnam, for the very good reason, among others, that theirs is the generation which must fight it. But the non-kids who detest the kids—and the polls show that they constitute a large majority of the population—are sincere too.

This emotion may not have wholly political origins either. "Your generation is just mad at us because we get away with so much stuff you never got away with," one kid (who happens to be a blood relation) sagely remarked. Making the non-kids mad is part of the fun.

The kids do not stop with long hair and peculiar costumes in their efforts to make the non-kids mad. For example, when the Viet Cong flag was raised in front of the Justice Department, before an audience of around 10,000 kids, there were a lot of cheers and no boos at all. When the American flag was raised in its place by the cops, there were a lot of boos and no cheers at all.

RIGHT-WING REACTION

At the main show, around the Washington Monument, there were at least ten Viet Cong flags to every American flag—and a lot of the American flags were worn, derisively, upside down. Anyone who supposes that this sort of thing doesn't make the non-kid majority mad is a victim of self-hypnosis. By every measure, moreover, the kids represent a tiny minority, even of their own generation. It would be interesting, for example, to know just how many holders of union cards there were in the vast crowd around the Washington Monument. Perhaps a dozen?

Any adult who can remember what it is like to be young should be able to understand why "these enormous scenes of contact and communion" are so much fun, and even feel a twinge of generational jealousy. The trouble is that there is a political price to be paid for the fun. The kids already have one major political feat to their credit—the election of Richard M. Nixon, which was ensured by their performance at Chicago. A few mere "enormous scenes" could ensure a right-wing reaction in this country so ferocious that not even Mr. Nixon could control it.

ANOTHER TRIBUTE TO IDAHO'S 116TH

HON. FRANK CHURCH

OF IDAHO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, several weeks ago I had the privilege of participating in ceremonies honoring the 116th Combat Engineer Battalion of the Idaho National Guard on its return from serving in Vietnam.

The outstanding job performed by this unit was the basis of an article published in Army Digest of November 1969. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the Extensions of Remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE LONGEST WEEKEND

(By Lt. Col. Harvey L. Latham)

They were called "NGs" and "Weekend Warriors." They came from little towns like Rixby, Idaho, and Weston, Vt. They were the National Guardsmen who attended weekend drills and summer camps, until one day their units received orders for deployment to Southeast Asia—and their weekends became a long one.

"They" were some 1,000 National Guardsmen of the 116th Engineer Battalion (Combat) and the 131st Engineer Company (Light Equipment). Today, these two Engineer National Guard units are back in the States, with a proud record of nation-building in the Republic of Vietnam to look back upon.

The "Green Mountain Mountain Movers" of the 131st were mobilized at their home station in Burlington, Vt., on May 13, 1968. While located in Dar Lac Province, the Vermont Engineers were a long way from Vermont's cool, green mountains, sugar maples, and famous Morgan horses. Still, there was always a touch of Vermont present at "Camp Swampy" where the 131st made its home. It was the "V" sign, standing not only for victory but for Vermont. It could be seen anywhere the Engineers were working.

The 131st was responsible for surfacing some 50 miles of National Highway 21, of which 20 miles required upgrading. This long ribbon of the highway is the only route the villagers can use to get their goods to the coast of Nha Trang for export.

The success of the economy of another area fell to the National Guardsmen of the 116th Engineers Battalion (Combat). Then the largest single National Guard unit serving in Vietnam, the Idaho Engineers helped restore National Highway 20 from Bao Loc to the II Corps Tactical Zone border.

Not only does this section of highway serve as an outlet for the tea and other produce of that area, but it also is an important lifeline to Lam Dong province, in importing more than 1,000 tons of rice each month to feed the local population. Highway 20 is the only link between the abundant vegetable crops of Dalat and the Saigon markets.

CIVIC ACTION

Lending a helping hand to the local population, the 131st inaugurated its civic action work program only one day after arriving at its base camp. The main thrust of this program was to consolidate and relocate a number of isolated Montagnard villages into a single, secure area under the protection of their own Regional or Popular Force military units.

A new village of Cu Kirk was formed by consolidating 17 separate villages into a single housing development under the leadership of village chiefs. The Vermont Engineers cleared and leveled a squaremile area, constructed streets and drainage ditches, and inclosed the new village by a rugged security fence.

Civic action was also a big concern around Bao Loc, then the main base camp for the 116th Engineer Battalion.

At B'Sar, Alfa and Charlie companies provided water to the outlying Montagnard villages. The local dysentery rate in that area was slashed by 75 per cent. Other volunteer projects included drainage and landscaping for churches, schools and orphanages.

The weekends were indeed long for the Engineer National Guardsmen in Vietnam as they counted the days until they could return to their families and jobs. But now that day has passed, and the Engineers of the 131st and the 116th can look back on their vital contribution to the building of a nation.

THE CRISIS IN HEALTH CARE

HON. BROCK ADAMS

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, in a speech delivered to the Industrial Union Conference, November 13, 1969, George Meany, president of the AFL–CIO, addresses his remarks to "The Crisis in Health Care."

Mr. Meany points out that the unions are interested in three things:

First. To prevent unnecessary illness.

Second. To have the best possible treatment for workers, their families, and all Americans.

Third. To keep the cost of medical care at a reasonable level so that people are not denied needed care simply because they cannot afford it.

He goes on to examine how well we are meeting these objectives. He points out that while we spend a larger percentage of our gross national product for health care—nearly 7 percent—in 1960 we had fallen from the sixth ranking country to the 11th and according to the latest figures, we have dropped to 18th in infant mortality. Our life expectancy has also dropped considerably which would indicate that "our record is getting worse instead of better."

Mr. Meany believes the solution to providing good medical care at a reasonable cost is through a national health insurance program. This is a position which the labor movement has promoted for several years.

Mr. Speaker, I think this speech explains the union position on health care and its reason for such a position. I am inserting it in the RECORD:

THE CRISIS IN HEALTH CARE

I want to congratulate President Abel and the Officers of the Industrial Union Department for convening this conference on "The Crisis in Health Care." This meeting, along with the recent IUD meeting on Occupational Safety and Health, shows that this Department is vitally concerned with the well-being of workers in some of the most important aspects of their lives.

This question of the health of our members and their families is something the labor movement has been concerned with for a long time.

We are not doctors and we don't pretend to be. We are perfectly willing to leave the treatment of illness to the members of the medical profession. That's their business. That's what they are trained to do—for long years and usually at considerable expense.

While we think that medical treatment is the doctor's business, the health of Americans is the nation's business. And, more specifically, the health of workers is a major concern of the trade union movement.

Now there's a very simple reason why we in the labor movement are interested in health care. We are interested in health care because our members and their families get sick and they have to pay to stay well, or to get well when they become sick.

We are mainly interested in three things:

1. To prevent unnecessary illness.

2. To have the best possible treatment for workers and their families—and for all Americans for that matter—when they are sick so that they will recover quickly and completely.

3. To keep the cost of medical care at a reasonable level so that people are not denied needed care simply because they can't afford it.

Now let's see how well we have been doing in meeting these simple objectives.

One way of analyzing how America has been doing in health care is to compare its record in recent years with the record of other advanced industrial countries.

You will often hear it said that the United States has the best medical care in the world. Well, we ought to have the best because we are paying the most for it.

We are now paying more than $60 billion a year for health care. That is nearly 7 percent of our Gross National Product. It is, of course, a lot of money in actual dollars. But we are also spending a large percentage of our GNP for health care than any other country in the world.

Now let's see how our health record compares with these other countries. There are certain figures that are usually cited to make this comparison and, frankly, we don't look too good. Let me cite a few of these figures.

In infant mortality in 1950 the U.S. was the sixth ranking country in the world. By 1960 we had fallen to 11th and, according to the latest figures, we have dropped to 18th.

Now let's look at how long people live. From 1959 to 1965, the latest date for which we have data, we dropped from 13th to 22nd place in life expectancy at birth for males. Women did a little better. Their life expectancy, as compared with other countries, dropped from 7th to 10th place.

So, as compared with other countries, our record is getting worse instead of better. Yet we are devoting to health care more money and a larger proportion of our resources than any other country.

And this is something which bothers us in the AFL–CIO. We don't like the idea of paying a tremendous amount of money for less than adequate health care.

When union people have a problem, they try to deal with it through the best mechanism we in the labor movement have. I am referring, of course, to collective bargaining. For twenty years or more now, we have been trying to meet the health care needs of our members through negotiated health and welfare plans. Some unions have done very well—but many have not.

In fact, many unions have found that they have been on some sort of treadmill. Most of you at this conference know only too well what has been happening. Just as fast as we could negotiate money to provide more and better health services for our members, the doctors raised their fees and the hospitals boosted their charges.

That meant that our members were still paying, after we had negotiated for more health care funds, just as much or even more out of their own pockets as they had before.

Thus, in health care, we have had a very unusual situation which we don't like at all. When we negotiate in collective bargaining, the result is ordinarily to make our members better off. That's the basic purpose of collective bargaining—to improve the conditions of workers.

Now, what's been happening in our negotiations related to health care? We have had a pretty good record in collective bargaining of getting more money for health care. But instead of making our members and their families better off through more comprehensive health services, we have simply been making more money for doctors.

Our members are being priced out of the medical care market by the sky-high, ever-mounting charges of doctors, hospitals and other providers of medical care.

Look at what has been happening. Medical costs have been going up faster than any other item in the Consumer Price Index. You all know that the cost of a visit to a doctor has doubled, and even tripled in many cases, in the past few years.

Hospital care is the most expensive medical care. That's why it costs a lot less money to prevent illness or to treat it before it becomes serious than to have to cure the patient after he gets into a hospital.

Hospital charges have been rising so fast that it's hard to even keep track of them. Daily hospital rates have been soaring at 15 percent or more a year. According to the American Hospital Association, which certainly ought to know, hospital charges will soon average $100 a day. They are already at that figure in some of the better hospitals in large metropolitan areas.

Some people try to blame increased hospital costs on the rise in wages of hospital employees. Let me tell you something. The labor movement fought to bring hospital workers under the minimum wage and we are proud of it. Our unions have fought to get wage increases and better conditions for hospital workers and we are proud of that too.

Hospital workers were—and all too often still are—among the lowest paid and most exploited workers in America. In fact, before they were covered under the Fair Labor Standards Act, over half of the 1.8 million hospital employees were getting less than $1.25 an hour. Even now, after substantial wage increases, their wages still lag considerably behind other workers.

So we have no apologies for what the labor movement has done to increase the wages and better the working conditions of hospital workers.

But the fact is that rising wages of hospital workers have not been the main reason for rising hospital costs. Again the American Hospital Association is the source of my information.

From 1963 to 1968, the daily expense of so-called community hospitals went up by 59 percent. During the same five-year period, the average annual salary of employees in those hospitals went up only 35 percent. So the wages were rising at only a little more than half as fast as the total costs of the hospitals.

We must look to other explanations for the tremendous increase in hospital rates. Hospital bills are now largely paid by so-called "third parties"—private organizations such as Blue Cross and the insurance companies and government programs such as Medicare and Medicaid. They are called "third parties" because they are a fiscal agent between the actual consumers of medical care and the providers.

These third party organizations generally pay the hospitals on the cost-plus basis that we remember from World War II. The hospitals figure out what their costs are and then they are paid something over that. You can see that under this cost-plus system, the hospitals haven't the slightest incentive to increase their efficiency or to hold down their costs.

Most doctors are paid on another basis which isn't good from the consumer's viewpoint either. This is the fee-for-service system. Under this system the doctor gets a certain amount for every office visit or other type of treatment. This is a piece-rate system in which the doctor determines the number of pieces of service as well as the price per piece.

Now we have no objection to people making a decent income—doctors or anyone else. How could we object? It is the very purpose of the labor movement to try to obtain decent incomes for as many people as possible. So we think that doctors deserve to get an adequate income commensurate with their talents and their services.

But we think there is something indecent about a small group of people making a lot of money out of the misery of other people. And I am afraid that is what is happening in America today. This indefensible escalation of medical costs is depriving millions of Americans of the health care they need.

This profiteering by the providers of medical care has had its worst effects in Medicare and Medicaid. Labor fought hard for the establishment of these two programs. Although they are somewhat different, they both have a single goal—to provide needed medical care to people who cannot afford to pay for it themselves.

But what has been happening? Some doctors and other health practitioners have pounced on these programs as if they had been legislated as get-rich-schemes for the medical profession. And instead of controls being placed on fees and charges paid under these programs, the burden has fallen on the disadvantaged people the programs were supposed to help.

The monthly premium older people must pay under Medicare has gone from $3 at the start of the program to $4 and next year it will be over $5 a month for a single person and more than $10 for an elderly couple.

The response to soaring Medicaid costs has been to remove poor people from eligibility altogether and for those still covered to cut back on services.

Yet before Medicaid and Medicare, doctors were either getting nothing at all or reduced fees from their patients now covered by these programs.

Well, what are we going to do about this situation? Is there an answer? Can we get good medical care for all Americans at a reasonable cost?

There is an answer. It is one the labor movement has advanced for many years, but we are more determined to achieve it today than ever before.

That answer is national health insurance, a program that would provide comprehensive health care for every American.

This comprehensive health care would include every kind of treatment that is necessary to maintain or restore good health. I'm talking about preventive services, all types of physicians' services, hospital and nursing home care, home health services, rehabilitation—in fact, the whole spectrum of health care.

It would be financed like Social Security, on social insurance principles but with a government contribution, as we are now advocating for Social Security itself. Since we think that every American is entitled to decent health care, the poor should be exempt from any payment but should be eligible for the same service as anyone else.

Doctors would continue to practice medicine without any interference. But we would expect the national health insurance system to encourage the highest quality of medical care, improvements in the efficiency of its delivery and effective controls on its cost.

For example, this would mean stimulating the development of prepaid group practice plans such as Kaiser Permanente, the Health Insurance Plan of New York and the Group Health Association here in Washington. I know you will be discussing these plans at your conference. I will only say now that we have been impressed by their record of high-quality health care at lower costs than the usual fee-for-service arrangement of doctors in solo practice. That is why the AFL–CIO is cooperating with Group Health Association of America in trying to get such plans underway in a number of cities across the country.

Can we afford National Health Insurance? I say we cannot afford not to have national health insurance. It is the only system that will provide truly adequate health care to all Americans.

First of all, more people would get health care and, in addition, people who today get some care, would get even more care.

Our Social Security Department has made some initial estimates of the cost of national health insurance. Even with the increases in health services under national health insurance, we could probably finance the program for no more and probably less than what we are now spending for medical care.

It is no secret that the trade union movement is for national health insurance. We have been saying that for a long time. But not so many people know that the majority of the American people are for a national health insurance system.

In January 1967, the Louis Harris poll asked the question: "Do you favor or oppose a Federal plan such as Medicare for older people which would cover all members of your family?" Of the 90 percent of respondents who had an opinion, a substantial majority said "yes." This is all the more remarkable when you consider that at that time the issue had not been in the public eye for more than a decade.

The AFL–CIO is convinced that with national health insurance, Americans would have the best health care in the world. The American people deserve no less. We will do everything we can to obtain enactment of national health insurance at the earliest possible date.

And conferences like this will do much to help bring that day nearer.

OLIVER FIELD DEDICATED AT CULVER MILITARY ACADEMY

HON. BIRCH BAYH

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, during impressive ceremonies at its homecoming football game this fall, Culver Military Academy in Indiana honored its longtime head coach, Russell Oliver, by naming its gridiron "Oliver Field." An outstanding athlete in his own right, not only in his prep years but also as one of the few nine-letter men in the history of the University of Michigan, Russ Oliver achieved a remarkable record at Culver as a winning coach for nearly three decades in all major sports.

But it is not only because of athletic ability or coaching success that this recognition was accorded Russ Oliver. He has earned the respect and admiration of thousands of students, alumni, and faculty with whom he has associated through the years because of qualities of character, leadership, and devotion to duty. Their attitude toward this remarkable man is well-expressed in the following sentence which is inscribed on the plaque dedicating Oliver Field:

An ingenious coach, a fierce competitor, a demanding teacher—a friend and inspiration for the one thousand Culver boys who grew to men under his guidance.

Mr. President, as a further tribute to the outstanding career of Russell Oliver, I ask unanimous consent that a brief article from the "Culver in Brief" be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEDICATION OF OLIVER FIELD HIGHLIGHTS HOMECOMING

Russ Oliver's 1000 "boys" honored their coach at homecoming by naming the gridiron "Oliver Field." Many of Oliver's former athletes were on hand for the ceremony at half-time of the traditional Culver-St. John's Military Academy game and for a banquet that evening.

Oliver coached Culver football 29 seasons, achieving a 138–80–2 record. He was head basketball mentor 23 seasons and scored 211 wins against 137 losses. As head coach of baseball 21 seasons he won 105 games and lost 76. He also served many years as athletic director.

Oliver N'28, '31G retired from coaching last year but remains at Culver as fulltime alumni secretary. He was one of the Academy's most outstanding athletes and his skill was once described in Grantland Rice's syndicated column as "about as close to a 'natural' as they come." He was named Culver's best all-around athlete and most valuable player in football and he captained both the basketball and baseball teams. In Naval School he won the heavyweight boxing championship.

From Culver he went on to the University of Michigan where he became the fifth man to win nine varsity letters. He played fullback on Harry Kipke's football squad, guard in basketball and first base and catcher in baseball. While he was on the football team, Michigan won two Big Ten championships.

After graduation, Oliver returned to Culver to coach. His long career was interrupted only by World War II during which he served four years and left as an Army major.

Oliver's football coaching years, in particular, were marked with innovations. As early as 1947, Culver was using the double pass before any other high school had thought of it. "The Oliver Twist"—a wild offense including all kinds of laterals, quadruple passes and fakes—was a famous play for Culver in 1952.

Oliver had a hand in three of Culver's five undefeated football seasons—in 1930 when he was a player on coach Bob Peck's team and in 1936 and 1958 when he himself was coaching.

Oliver also played for Culver in a famous game with St. John's in 1930 in Chicago's Soldier Field. Culver cadets whipped the Wisconsin school 19–0 in that charity game.

And this homecoming Coach Dave Nelson's Eagles did it again—49 to 0—on "Russ Oliver Day." Besides the plaque to be installed on the field, Oliver's boys presented him and his wife Myra with a color television set, an electric golf cart and an all-expenses-paid vacation to Hawaii.

At a testimonial banquet that evening, Russ Oliver paid tribute to the coaches who had influenced his life—including one of his predecessors at Culver, Bob Peck, who was recently named to Sports Illustrated's All-Century Team, the best 11 players in the first 100 years of college football.

RESOLUTION FROM THE CITY OF WINTER PARK, FLA.

HON. LOUIS FREY, JR.

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. FREY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am pleased to present the resolution passed by the City Commission of Winter Park, Fla., on November 12, 1969, supporting President Nixon in his efforts to obtain a just and lasting peace in Vietnam:

RESOLUTION NO. 967 OF THE CITY OF WINTER PARK OF ORANGE COUNTY, FLA.

Whereas, the United States of America is presently engaged in a military conflict in Viet Nam that has caused widespread dissension among the citizens of this nation, and

Whereas, the President of the United States has announced his intention to seek an honorable conclusion to this military conflict, and

Whereas, in times past the citizens of this nation have always united when conditions of peril and danger have confronted us, and

Now, therefore, be it resolved by the city commission of the city of Winter Park, Florida:

1. That the City of Winter Park supports the President of the United States in his endeavor to effect an honorable conclusion to the Viet-Namese conflict.

2. That the City Commission of the City of Winter Park urges all of its citizens to support the President in his effort to seek peace and by so doing display to all, our unity in these perilous times.

Adopted at a regular meeting of the City Commission of the City of Winter Park, held in City Hall, Winter Park, Florida, this 12th day of November, 1969.

DANIEL M. LUNSEN,
Mayor-Commissioner.

Attest:

R. S. WATTS, City Clerk.

FEDERAL CIVILIAN EMPLOYMENT, OCTOBER 1969

HON. GEORGE H. MAHON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted earlier today, I include a release highlighting the October 1969 civilian personnel report of the Joint Committee on Reduction of Federal Expenditures:

MONTHLY REPORT ON FEDERAL PERSONNEL AND PAY FOR OCTOBER 1969

Executive agencies of the Federal Government reported civilian employment in the month of October totaling 2,938,388. This was a net decrease of 19,998 as compared with employment reported in the preceding month of September.

Civilian employment reported by the executive agencies of the Federal Government, by months in fiscal year 1970, which began July 1, 1969 follows:

Month	Employment	Increase	Decrease
1969:
July	3,062,319	9,276
August	3,028,521		33,798
September	2,958,386		70,135
October	2,938,388		19,998

Total federal employment in civilian agencies for the month of October was 1,653,141, a decrease of 8,847 as compared with the September total of 1,661,988. Total civilian employment in the military agencies in October was 1,285,247, a decrease of 11,151 as compared with 1,296,398 in September.

Civilian agencies reporting the largest decreases were Agriculture Department with 4,408, Department of Health, Education and Welfare with 3,161, Treasury Department with 1,985 and Interior Department with 1,101. Commerce Dept. reported a net increase of 2,393, due to build up in temporary decennial census employment.

In the Department of Defense the largest decreases in civilian employment were reported by the Army with 4,282, Navy with 4,019 and Air Force with 2,404.

Total employment inside the United States in October was 2,692,600, a decrease of 17,540 as compared with September. Total employment outside the United States in October was 245,788, a decrease of 2,458 as compared with September. Industrial employment by federal agencies in October was 578,204, a decrease of 7,418 as compared with September.

These figures are from reports certified by the agencies as compiled by the Joint Committee on Reduction of Federal Expenditures.

FULL-TIME PERMANENT EMPLOYMENT

The total of 2,938,388 civilian employees reported for the month of October 1969 includes 2,620,337 full-time employees in permanent positions. This represents a decrease of 12,949 in full-time permanent employment from the preceding month of September. These figures are shown in the appendix (p. 17) of the accompanying report.

FOREIGN NATIONALS

The total of 2,938,388 civilian employees certified to the Committee by federal agencies in their regular monthly personnel reports includes some foreign nationals employed in U.S. Government activities abroad, but in addition to these there were 111,344 foreign national working for U.S. agencies overseas during October who were not counted in the usual personnel reports. The number in September was 112,217.

(NOTE.—The monthly report has been distributed, but a limited supply is usually available at the Committee, room 329, Old Senate Office Building.)

POLITICS DEEP IN OIL IMPORTS

HON. CHARLES A. VANIK

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, the November 23 issue of the Cleveland Plain Dealer contains an excellent article by Donald L. Barlett entitled "Politics Deep in Oil Imports." The article describes the pressures and often hidden influences at work to protect oil profits and to maintain the oil import program. Under particular pressure is the Oil Import Task Force, which is reviewing this oil subsidy program that yearly costs the American consumer about $7 billion.

I would like to include in the RECORD at this point a letter which Congressman SILVIO CONTE and I, as well as 90 others, have sent to the Oil Import Task Force urging a strong public and consumer interest report by the task force. In addition, I would like to include Mr. Barlett's article from the Plain Dealer:

NOVEMBER 19, 1969.

Hon. GEORGE P. SHULTZ,
Chairman, Task Force on Oil Import Control, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: As your distinguished Task Force nears the time for completion of its report to the President, we want you to know that we, and the millions of American consumers we represent, are deeply committed to the position that the oil quota system should be substantially liberalized if not abolished.

This is not the time to reiterate the reasons why reform must come. We are satisfied that your Task Force has more than ample evidence in support of our position.

Our purpose here is simply to remind you that, in addition to the logical and historical evidence against the present system, there is nationwide popular demand for this change.

There has reportedly been of late a concentrated effort on the part of major oil companies and their representatives to persuade you to support the status quo.

While these advocates are certainly entitled to be heard, we want to be sure you know that the millions of American consumers we represent are no longer willing to pay the artificially high prices imposed upon them by this system, particularly since this high cost is imposed upon them without the usual budgetary review.

We are confident that you will hear their voices and hopeful that we can all look forward to a rational national oil policy.

Sincerely,

EDWARD W. BROOKE,
U.S. Senate.
WILLIAM PROXMIRE,
U.S. Senate.
SILVIO O. CONTE,
Member of Congress.
CHARLES A. VANIK,
Member of Congress.

NOTE.—There is attached a list of the signatories to this letter from both the U.S. Senate and the House of Representatives.

POLITICS DEEP IN OIL IMPORTS

(This article on the political implications of a cabinet-level study of the nation's mandatory oil import control program is one in a series of Plain Dealer reports on the oil industry—its unique federal income tax allowances and governmental subsidies.)

(By Donald L. Barlett)

WASHINGTON.—The oil industry is dipping deep into its bag of legendary political tricks to perpetuate the nation's costly mandatory oil import control program.

So far the bag has yielded an assortment of politicians with vested interests in oil and oilmen with influence throughout the federal government—including the White House.

The government's import quota policies—worth billions of dollars annually to oil companies—are undergoing an extended examination by a cabinet-level task force.

The study was ordered last February by President Richard M. Nixon as the result of a controversial proposal to establish a foreign trade zone at Machiasport, Maine.

Now, nine months later, with the political implications looming ever larger, the task force nearing a decision on its recommendations, Nixon is locked into the bitter intra-industry dispute over imports.

On one side are long-time friends of the President who are either oilmen or have ties to the industry.

On the other side is the silent majority and reform-minded congressmen, who earlier this year spurred the House of Representatives into passing legislation overhauling the federal income tax laws.

Creation of a foreign trade zone at Machiasport would enable a company to import cheap foreign crude oil without the usual quota restrictions, refine it and sell it at prices below those of competitors using more expensive domestic crude.

The quota program, which limits the amount of foreign oil that may be brought into the country, costs the American consumer from $4 to $7.2 billion a year in higher prices on oil and gas products.

Import quotas, when coupled with the 27½% depletion allowance, production payments and an array of other subsidies and loopholes, provide oil companies with multi-million dollar profits each year that are tax-free.

Nixon's task force is taking a broad look at the quota system—focusing particular attention on foreign trade zones and Machiasport—to determine what changes, if any, should be made in the 10-year-old program.

The interwoven interests of oilmen and politicians involved in the task force inquiry offer a classic textbook study of the politics of oil, a Plain Dealer investigation has disclosed.

For example:

Item. Before taking office, Nixon and his law firm, Nixon, Mudge, Rose, Guthrie, Alexander and Mitchell, represented one of the principals in the Machiasport affair, John M. Shaheen, a wealthy oil promoter and president of Shaheen Natural Resources Co., Inc. of New York.

Any decision the President makes on future import quota policies will affect Shaheen's companies.

Shaheen, who also is president and chief executive officer of Macmillian Ring-Free Oil Co., Inc., is a personal friend of the President.

He was a Republican Party fund raiser in 1968 and, according to congressional records, contributed at least $13,000 to Nixon's campaign.

Item. U.S. Commerce Secretary Maurice H. Stans is a member of the oil import task force and also heads a three-member board that must approve applications for foreign trade zones.

The Plain Dealer revealed last July that Stans—another Republican fund raiser and Nixon friend—was involved in various oil dealings that date back to the early 1950s.

From 1963 until his appointment as Commerce secretary last January, Stans was a stockholder and director of the Fluor Corp., a California contractor that builds refineries and services American oil companies around the world.

Two weeks ago, the Fluor Corp. pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in Los Angeles and was fined $10,000 for making illegal political campaign contributions in 1964 and 1966.

The company's contributions totaled $30,000 with $25,000 going to an unnamed presidential aspirant in 1964.

The other $5,000 went to congressional candidates in Georgia, Texas and California in 1966.

The Federal Corrupt Practices Act bars political contributions by corporations and labor unions in federal elections.

Item. Walter J. Hickel, a Republican, also is a member of the six-man oil import task force and as U.S. secretary of the Interior is responsible for allocating import quotas to oil companies.

A decision by the task force to sharply increase quotas or phase them out could slow down Alaska's oil boom.

Similarly, a recommendation to continue the present system or reduce quotas would insure further development of the state's oil industry.

Hickel's oil holdings were valued at about $1 million when he was appointed Interior secretary. While governor of Alaska, he was linked closely to oilmen in that state and speculated in oil and gas leases.

Six months after taking office, Hickel sold his oil stocks at a substantial profit.

Item. Robert O. Anderson, Republican, is chairman of the board and chief executive officer of Atlantic Richfield Co., another company that figures prominently in the Machiasport controversy.

Atlantic Richfield says it is studying the possibility of building a refinery at Machiasport—but it doesn't want a foreign trade zone.

Anderson was a major contributor to Nixon's presidential campaign and generally is credited with having recommended Hickel to the president for the interior department post.

Item. Occidental Petroleum Corp. of Los Angeles, headed by Dr. Armand Hammer, advanced the Machiasport foreign trade zone proposal last year.

Occidental wants the trade zone and a special import license to go with it. The company has huge oil fields overseas, but is unable to market the oil in the United States because of the restrictive quotas.

Last spring W. Marvin Watson was appointed president and Tim M. Babcock executive vice president of Occidental International Corp., a subsidiary set up to handle Occidental's foreign operations.

Watson, a Democrat, was postmaster general and special assistant to President Lyndon B. Johnson. Babcock, a Republican, is a former governor of Montana.

Item. Governors of four oil-producing states met two weeks ago with several task force members—including Stans and Hickel—to express their support of continued import controls.

The governors got together with the study group in the White House office of Peter M. Flanigan, a special assistant to Nixon.

Another Nixon fund raiser, Flanigan was a vice president of Dillon, Read & Co., an investment house, before joining the President's staff.

Dillon, Read is an underwriter for oil companies. Flanigan's father, Horace C. Flanigan, was a director of the Union Oil Co. of California.

Item. About the same time the governors met with the task force representatives, Michael L. Haider chatted privately with Nixon.

Haider is the retired chairman and chief executive officer of Standard Oil Co. (New Jersey), the world's largest and most powerful oil company.

He observed that Nixon had a good grasp of the mandatory oil import control program. Haider said that he was confident the task force study would be favorable to the oil industry.

None of this is to say that payoffs—either direct or indirect—have been made to persons associated with the task force or the Machiasport project.

But the web of intricate interrelationships suggests a built-in prejudice in favor of the oil industry and guarantees a sympathetic hearing for oilmen and their political allies.

The group with the most at stake, the taxpayer and consumer who foots the bill, has little or no voice in the matter.

The situation is not unique. Over the years the petroleum industry has had easy access to Washington politicians and key federal officeholders, many of whom have had personal oil holdings.

Congressional critics say this intermingling of oil and political interests has produced the preferred federal income tax status of the industry.

The Plain Dealer learned that before the governors of Texas, Wyoming, Illinois and Kansas met with task force personnel, they huddled with Frank Ikard.

A former Texas congressman, Ikard, is president of the American Petroleum Institute (API), the chief lobbying and information arm of the petroleum industry.

Haider, the former Standard Oil Co. chief executive, is chairman of the API board.

The separate White House meetings of the governors and Haider brought the oil import study full circle.

For it was Haider and Ikard who last February urged Nixon to appoint a cabinet-level committee to study and reevaluate the quota system.

They made the recommendation in a five-page memorandum to Dr. Arthur F. Burns, an economist and special counselor to the President.

A cover letter was signed by Ikard and dated Feb. 5. Two weeks later, on Feb. 20, Nixon ordered a "full review" of oil import policies.

The request for the study came as pressure began to mount on the Nixon administration to approve Occidental Petroleum Corp's plan for a foreign trade zone at Machiasport.

The project had the bipartisan backing of New England governors, congressmen and senators and the support of the business community in the Northeast.

It was opposed by just about every other oil company in the country, including Standard Oil Co. (New Jersey), and the API.

Occidental said it would build a 300,000-barrel-a-day refinery if the federal government OK'd requests for the free trade zone and a special import license.

The special license would mean a sharply increased quota for Occidental, well above the average oil company's allotment.

In return, the company promised New Englanders—who pay more for fuel oil than homeowners in any other section of the nation—a 10% reduction in prices.

Other companies and oil-producing states like Texas and Louisiana viewed the Occidental proposal as an attempt to undermine the rigid restrictions on imports of low-cost foreign crude oil.

After Occidental made its bid, Shaheen Natural Resources Co., Inc., announced that it too, would build a 300,000-barrel-a-day refinery at Machiasport if the government created a foreign trade zone.

Unlike Occidental, though, Shaheen said it would not seek a special import license—unless the interior department granted one to another company.

When the cabinet task force inquiry was well underway, Atlantic Richfield said it was studying the possibility of building a 100,000-barrel-a-day refinery at Machiasport—without seeking either a trade zone or import license.

The entry of Shaheen and Atlantic Richfield into the great Machiasport refinery race added a new dimension to the import dispute—and another layer of interlocking oil and political interests.

For example:

Atlantic Richfield says it does not need a special import license because it would process crude oil from the company's vast new Prudhoe Bay field in Alaska.

Hickel, one of the task force members, was governor of Alaska until last January and has strong ties to the state. He played a major role in attracting industry to Alaska.

An Occidental refinery at Machiasport could give the company a competitive edge in some markets over a Shaheen refinery already under construction at Come-by-Chance, Newfoundland, Shaheen worked out an agreement, described as "a sweet deal," by his Canadian critics, to build and operate the Newfoundland refinery—along with a petrochemical and pulp and paper mill complex—after a bitter political battle in Canada.

Shaheen's lawyer for the project was Nixon.

When oilmen Haider and Ikard asked the President for a review of the mandatory oil import control program, they referred specifically to foreign trade zones.

In their memorandum to Burns, they cited 10 subject areas for the task force to examine, including "foreign trade zones as a device to secure privileged quotas."

The API spokesmen, in an indirect reference to the pending trade zone application for Machiasport, declared:

"Due to the obvious security, economic and political implications of the program, it is critical that a review be undertaken immediately before further changes or exceptions are made."

For more than six months now, the task force staff, headed by Phillip Areeda, a member of the Harvard University Law School faculty, has been assembling data on the quota system.

Oil companies, public officials and special interest groups have submitted to the panel scores of reports outlining their arguments for retaining, modifying or abandoning the quota program.

As the material started pouring in, congressional oil experts told The Plain Dealer, there was a growing concern in the petroleum industry that the staff might recommend substantial changes in import quota policies.

This has resulted, industry critics say, in a series of last-minute visits to federal offices by oil lobbyists and oil-oriented politicians.

Said one observer: "They are talking to anyone they think might be able to help them."

Opponents of the import program are worried about the meeting. An aide to Gov. Kenneth M. Curtis of Maine told The Plain Dealer:

"Our understanding was the task force was to take statements of fact. We're very concerned about these meetings."

TRIBUTE TO OHIO STATE'S REX KERN

HON. CLARENCE E. MILLER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. MILLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, in this 100th anniversary year of college football, we from the State of Ohio are especially proud of the accomplishments of the Ohio State team, coached by Woody Hayes and led by their outstanding field general, quarterback Rex Kern from Lancaster, Ohio.

Rex exemplifies the highest standards of sportsmanship and good citizenship both on and off the playing field. He achieved the rare honor of being chosen Ohio High School All-State in three sports—football, basketball, and baseball. While starring for one of the strongest college football teams in the country for the past 2 years, he has also been an active participant in the Fellowship of Christian Athletes. One of the prime candidates for the 1970 Heisman trophy should be Ohio State's Rex Kern.

PATIENCE

HON. ROBERT H. MICHEL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, the December edition of Reader's Digest has an unusual editorial appropriately entitled "Patience!" It deals with why we are fighting in Vietnam.

I would like to read just a section of this editorial since it is pertinent to what we are discussing here today. I quote:

Vietnam has come to be a crisis point. If America and its allies in South Vietnam were to fail, the cause of freedom would fail and the area of freedom would be diminished. The lesson would be clear for all to read. Defeat lies in store for those who put their trust in the United States. Freedom is a dead dream; the future belongs to the enslaver.

If the world were to witness such a defeat, the United States, leader of the free world, overnight would lose the respect of the world and would lose its self-respect. In a test of will, the United States would have been found wanting. In a test of conscience, the United States would have been found to have no conscience. In a test of strength, the United States would have been found to have not strength enough.

Did 39,000 American boys die for this? Has America forgotten the stuff it is made of, its purpose in this world?

Mr. Speaker, I commend this entire editorial to my colleagues and insert it in the RECORD at this point:

PATIENCE

For nearly five long years our nation has been immersed in a bloody, baffling and undeclared war 12,000 miles from our shores. The immediate aim of the United States in this effort is to prevent the enforced communist domination of a people who ask only to be allowed to live in freedom. Seldom if ever in our history have we endured a more frustrating and traumatic experience.

Into the deltas and jungles of South Vietnam we have poured some 95 billions of dollars of our treasure. We have seen nearly 40,000 of our young men go to their graves. The American objective in this war has been clear and carefully limited. We seek no territory. We seek only to give the people of South Vietnam an opportunity to determine their own destiny. Our immutable, bedrock position is that the communist enslavement of the nations of Southeast Asia must stop at the 17th parallel.

Four American Presidents have committed our nation to this position—in the belief that the defense of South Vietnam is a defense not only of one country but of all of Asia.

Despite the dimensions of the threat, the United States has conducted the most restrained war that any nation has ever fought. Now, at last, we begin to see the successful end to our efforts. The American and South Vietnamese troops, as well as the troops of other nations who have fought, bled and died in this cause, have brought the war to a point where it is impossible for the enemy to win it by force of arms.

As the following article by Joseph Alsop points out, the enemy is in serious trouble. The Vietcong guerrillas control less and less of the countryside, and the North Vietnamese armies are feeling the heavy drain on their manpower. That the United States is able to order the withdrawal of 60,000 troops from Vietnam—with more to come—shows that our position is increasingly strong. The leaders of the communist world know that time is no longer on their side.

Why, then, do they continue to hold out? Where do they look for hope of victory? As they survey the scene of battle, the North Vietnamese leaders and their Soviet and Chinese allies do not yet despair, for they know there still remains one resource that can tip the scale in their favor.

The enemy's greatest hope lies in the division that he has created in public opinion in the United States. This is why the enemy fights on. This is why the Soviet Union has continued to support him in Vietnam. This is why Hanoi holds out in Paris. This is why the enemy refuses concession after concession offered him at the conference table. He clings to the belief that the American patience will run out, that sooner or later the American people will persuade their President to run up the white flag of ignominious surrender.

This is the hope that keeps the enemy going. Were it not for this, the war would have ended before this. No one will ever know how many American boys have gone to their death because the enemy holds on, watching for signs that American resolve is weakening.

To the enemy the constant outcries in the United States must sound like so many bombs being dropped against our troops in South Vietnam. The anti-war speeches in Congress, the campus protests from students and faculty, the barrage of defeatist editorials in some of the most powerful newspapers, these are worth regiments and whole divisions to the enemy. He reads his newspaper, hears the broadcasts, rubs his hands and once more refuses to talk in Paris, refuses to call his invaders back from South Vietnam.

Were it not for his belief that the American patience will crack, the enemy would lose his reason to keep on fighting. It is a monstrous irony that the louder the protest is raised against the war, the longer the war will continue.

Most of those who oppose the war sincerely believe that they are somehow helping to save the United States from error. But against that minority belief must be weighed the cost to the nation. For these are the voices that are listened to in Hanoi—and these are the voices that prolong the months of battle. In the interests of peace, they shonuld now be lowered.

The President of the United States has said that he will not be shaken from his resolve to honor our nation's commitment—and our dead—in Vietnam. In this resolve, he is neither blind nor willful. No matter how loud the clamor from critics in Congress becomes, he will hold his course. He knows the nature of the enemy, the nature of the enemy's designs in Asia and the world. Most of all, he knows the consequences of a craven act of surrender on our part in South Vietnam. The results would haunt us for years to come.

The first consequence would be a blood bath for our friends—the certain slaughter of tens of thousands of South Vietnamese whose only mistake was to have trusted the word and will of the United States. The communists would deal swiftly and unmercifully with these as they butchered their way to power. Lest there be any doubt about this, we have only to look at what happened in Hue, where several thousand South Vietnamese were shot or buried alive during the brief communist occupation of the city during the 1968 Tet offensive.

The next to suffer from our betrayal would be the nearby countries of Cambodia, Laos, Thailand and Malaysia. They could not hope to remain free once the South Vietnamese roadblock to communism had been removed. The communist domination of Southeast Asia would shake countries even farther away—such as Indonesia, India, Japan.

Vietnam has come to be a crisis point. If America and its allies in South Vietnam were to fail, the cause of freedom would fail and the area of freedom would be diminished. The lesson would be clear for all to read. Defeat lies in store for those who put their trust in the United States. Freedom is a dead dream; the future belongs to the enslaver.

If the world were to witness such a defeat, the United States, leader of the free world, overnight would lose the respect of the world and would lose its self-respect. In a test of will, the United States would have been found wanting. In a test of conscience, the United States would have been found to have no conscience. In a test of strength, the United States would have been found to have not strength enough.

Did 39,000 American boys die for this? Has America forgotten the stuff it is made of, its purpose in the world?

If one listened only to the cries of those who urge peace at any price, one would have cause to question—as Hanoi must question—the essential fiber of this nation. But the cries for a dishonorable end to the war do not reflect the will of anything like the majority of the American people. Nor do many of those who urge withdrawal really mean that they would accept peace on the enemy's terms. They simply want—as who does not?—an end to the war.

It is easy for the enemy to underestimate this country. In waiting for us to surrender, he hears the shrill protests and misses the true, patient heartbeat of America. This country has never lost a war; it has never surrendered to an enemy. And it is not about to do so now.

The need today, when an honorable end to the war is within sight, is for courage and patience, in the best American tradition. When their country is in trouble the American people close ranks and stand together. Together, we have brought our country through many storms.

We are now in the midst of a storm, and we will see it through. If the enemy is counting on this nation to falter, he is wrong. The heart of America is as strong as ever, and its patience will endure. Our enemy need not question it. Our allies need not doubt it. Our President need not wonder.

THE NEED TO HONOR AMERICA

HON. J. HERBERT BURKE

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. BURKE of Florida. Mr. Speaker, not long ago, I received a letter from Mr.

Charles W. Wiley, executive director of the National Committee for Responsible Patriotism asking me to endorse the week of November 10 to 16 as "Honor America Week."

I, of course, was delighted to join with the millions of other Americans across the United States in our showing devotion to our Nation.

In a brochure sent to me by Mr. Wiley, the group claims support from President Nixon, former Vice President Humphrey, the late President Dwight D. Eisenhower, and many, many other national leaders.

I am sure several of my colleagues received a similar plea to support this most worthy cause and each of us will attempt to honor America in some way of our own choosing.

I had the honor to be the speaker at a number of Veterans Day ceremonies within my district and as I traveled throughout Central and South Broward and North Dade, Fla., I know now what the President meant by the silent majority.

When I stood in a cemetery on Veterans Day listening to our veterans and others give praise to our country and fighting men past and present, I asked silently why do we need a National Committee for Responsible Patriotism? and Why do we need an Honor America Week?

It seemed to me that each citizen should be so proud to be an American that each day would be an "Honor America Day." But, unfortunately, I am taking the liberty of being too idealistic for we all know full well that this isn't the situation in America today for there are too many individuals and groups intent on ridiculing our Nation and her proud past.

As I thought further about the need for a committee to promote patriotism, I truly felt deeply concerned that our country, which has given so much to so many should need to urge its citizens to honor her, and as I reflected further I concluded that we really do need to promote patriotism by reminding those who prefer to forget the goodness of America and its people.

Thus it appears to me that today there is even a stronger reason for groups to counter the ever-increasing voices who though ill advised are nevertheless rapidly mobilizing forces to work against the America most of us have learned to love.

Surely by now, most of us know these radicals by sight and their sounds. We see them on television and hear their divisive words. They are no longer secret since they are now quite vocal in their aims, which are simply to destroy the United States.

Ironically, as I glanced through the Veterans Day edition of the Washington Post, I noticed a glaring headline that read, "Dr. Levy Says Che Is His Hero."

Who is Dr. Howard Levy? He is the New York doctor who was jailed 2 years ago for refusing to teach medical skills to green berets while serving in the U.S. Army and is now released on appeal bond from Federal prison.

The doctor, who is now working for some group called the Health Policy Advisory Center in New York City, told the American Public Health Association at a meeting last Monday that Ernesto "Che" Guevara was his model hero. He states that:

> A true revolutionary is motivated by feelings of love. Three or four years ago I was a budding practitioner ready to make my $50,000 a year. Now I'm a radical.

This so-called American further challenged the liberals in the group to decide whether they want to support the revolutionaries or the Government of the United States, which has the power which he and the other radicals want. He then said:

> They've got the power, but we're going to get it, and no one is going to stand in our way.

Although the news story indicated that he received only mild applause, yet there were in the audience a few who jumped to their feet and displayed the revolutionary symbol of the clenched fist.

This incident and other similar incidents graphically brought home to me the need for the patriotic forces in our society to stand up and be counted for America before the likes of Dr. Levy and other radicals count them out.

Yes, Dr. Levy was a man who was provided with all the education needed in the United States to earn an excellent income and do good for many, but who now wants to overturn the Government which gave him his golden opportunity.

I can only say then that we need prayer and hope that our veteran organizations, the National Committee for Responsible Patriotism and other similar groups continue to grow in size and prestige and that more and more Americans will take part in the crusade to keep America great.

There is no doubt that we are today fighting a battle of the minds and whether we are called the silent majority or by some other name we all have a role to play in drowning out the voices of the rising radicalism.

The time is now. Awake America, we have slumbered too long and if we wait much longer perhaps very soon we may awake to the sounds of military boots and gunshots under the direction of some Communist or Fascist dictator.

Let us have faith in each other and love and support the America we know.

Yes, I am for "honoring America" this week and each day and week hereafter because your country and my country needs us now more than ever.

PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF SOUTH YEMEN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. ADAM C. POWELL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to pause today to pay tribute to the People's Republic of South Yemen whose second anniversary of independence will be celebrated on November 30. The new nation of Yemen is composed of the port of Aden and desert territory in southwestern Arabia as well as the islands of Perim and Kamaran. Most of the people of Southern Yemen are Moslems.

Preceding its independence, the land which is now Southern Yemen was composed of Aden, a British crown colony, and the protectorate states which were members of the Federation of South Arabia. This area of Arabia has a long history dating back to the beginning of recorded time. Many have suggested that Aden is the original Eden of the Bible. The earliest known mention of the area and its people is in the Biblical reference in Ezekiel to the blue robed spice merchants of Aden. According to the legend of South Arabia, history began with the great flood and the building of a boat by Nuh—Noah. The receding waters shaped the wadis, valleys, and mountains of the region and left the land in the hands of a race of giants, the least of whom became the predecessors of today's Bedouin inhabitants.

Aside from the important port of Aden, the country's economy is dependent on farming, sheep and goat herding, and fishing. Aden is one of the busiest ports in the world and the site of a large oil refinery. The current closure of the Suez Canal, however, has had a negative impact upon Southern Yemen's economic welfare.

The United States was among the first nations to recognize the new People's Republic of Southern Yemen. On December 14, 1967, under the sponsorship of Great Britain, Southern Yemen became the 123d member of the United Nations. This new nation is also a member of the Arab League.

Thus, on the second anniversary of its independence, I call upon my colleagues to join with me in wishing this new nation a peaceful and prosperous future.

INVOCATION BY REV. THOMAS L. DEPA, PASTOR OF ST. STANSLAUS CHURCH, TERRE COUPEE, NEW CARLISLE, IND., AT DEDICATION OF THE BENDIX WOODS RECREATIONAL PARK, ST. JOSEPH COUNTY, IND., OCTOBER 19, 1970

HON. JOHN BRADEMAS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, recently I had the privilege of participating in the dedication of the Bendix Woods Recreational Park in my home county of St. Joseph in Indiana.

On this occasion, I was much moved by an eloquent invocation delivered by the Reverend Thomas L. Depa, pastor of St. Stanslaus Church, New Carlisle, Ind.

I am inserting in the RECORD the text of Father Depa's invocation:

INVOCATION BY REV. THOMAS L. DEPA

We are grateful to Thee God Almighty for the department of parks and recreation, for establishing this facility for the benefit of our bodies, our souls and for the preservation of Your created beauty.

However, dear God, we have one complaint, we lament the unreasonableness of some of our citizenry, who in the name of progress are destroying nature's capital three F's; namely; Fur, Feather and Fish. Instead of relying on their own natural locomotion in hunting and fishing, they are using snowmobiles and swamp buggies to invade the nesting and birth places of Fur, Feather and Fish, thereby speeding up their eventual extermination.

Oh God, we deplore the lack of foresight of some of our officials, who again, in the name of progress and the almighty dollar are destroying the forest, polluting the air and streams; and draining our swamp lands.

My God, in the name of progress we are depleting the precious minerals You have stored in the bowls of the earth for the use of future generations, while billions of tons of metals are rusting away in junk yards.

We beg You, dear Lord, to forgive us for all our sins committed against your created beauty. Inspire our citizenry and officials, to preserve Your irreplaceable beauty and resources. Amen.

REPRESENTATIVE TAFT SUPPORTS COMMEMORATIVE STAMP IN HONOR OF ERNIE PYLE—PRAISES EFFORTS OF CLEVELANDER

HON. ROBERT TAFT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. TAFT. Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the Citizens Stamp Advisory Committee has under consideration the possibility of issuing a stamp in honor of Ernie Pyle.

The drive for this stamp has been spearheaded in large measure by Mr. Nunzio R. Calvo, of Cleveland, Ohio. Mr. Calvo, who serves as commissioner of soldiers relief for Cuyahoga County, and is president-elect of the Greater Cleveland Veterans Council, believes that a commemorative stamp would be a fitting way to mark the 25th anniversary of Mr. Pyle's death, in 1970.

I am pleased to join Mr. Calvo in this regard and to urge my friends and colleagues to support the issuance of this stamp.

The following articles describe some of the effort involved in Mr. Calvo's 3-year campaign for the special Ernie Pyle Stamp:

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Nov. 1, 1969]

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

To the CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR:

On April 18, 1970, it will be 25 years since one of America's greatest and most beloved personalities was lost. Ernie Pyle has not only won a permanent place in the hearts of Americans as evidenced by the thousands who visit his grave in Honolulu, but he has won for our war correspondents the trust and respect of the American people and their fighting men. The memory of Ernie Pyle will continue to inspire today's war correspondents who are again bravely accompanying our fighting men into the swamps and jungles of Vietnam.

Ernie Pyle was responsible in World War II for combat infantrymen and medics receiving an extra $10 a month in pay—he was responsible for the wearing of overseas bars on the left sleeve of uniforms. He was beloved by the men in-combat, as well as the people back home.

The late General Eisenhower said of Ernie Pyle, "we have lost one of our best and most understanding friends," and in the words of President Truman, "no man . . . has so well told the story of the American fighting man as American fighting men want it told. He deserves the gratitude of all his countrymen." These remarks are a lasting tribute for a great person.

Ernie Pyle still has our gratitude, and next April will be the month to remember him. What better way could this be done than to have a commemorative stamp issued to honor this outstanding individual? Next year will be the 25th anniversary of his death. This would be the ideal time to pay homage to him. All former GIs who knew him and served with him, as well as those back home to whom he reported, should entreat the Post Office Department and the Citizens Stamp Advisory Committee in Washington now to authorize the issuance of a commemorative stamp for Ernie Pyle.

N. R. CALVO.

CLEVELAND.

ERNIE PYLE COMMEMORATIVE STAMP BOOSTED BY NUNZIO CALVO

CLEVELAND, OHIO.—An all-out effort is underway for the issuance of a commemorative stamp for Ernie Pyle. The project is spearheaded by Nunzio Calvo of Cleveland, Ohio, a member of Avanti Amerita Lodge No. 133.

Bills have been introduced in Congress to provide for the issuance of the stamp to honor the World War II correspondent. Having been referred to the committee on Post Office and Civil Services, one of the bills calls for date of issuance on April 18, 1970, the 25th anniversary of the death of Ernie Pyle. On that date, it will be twenty-five years that one of America's greatest and most beloved personalities was lost. Ernie Pyle has not only won a permanent place in the hearts of Americans as evidenced by the thousands who visit his grave in Honolulu, but he has won for our war correspondents the trust and respect of the American people and their fighting men. The memory of Ernie Pyle will continue to inspire today's war correspondents who are again bravely accompanying our fighting men into the swamps and jungles of Vietnam.

The late General Eisenhower said of Ernie Pyle, "we have lost one of our best and most understanding friends," and in the words of President Truman, "no man . . . has so well told the story of the American fighting man as American fighting men want it told. He deserves the gratitude of all his countrymen." These remarks are a lasting tribute to a great person.

Ernie Pyle still has our gratitude, and next April will be the month to remember him. What better way could this be done than to have a commemorative stamp issued to honor this outstanding individual? Next year will be the 25th anniversary of his death. This would be the ideal time to pay homage to him.

The original proposal for the stamp was the idea of Nunzio Calvo of Cleveland, he himself a veteran of World War II. He has contacted members of the House and Senate in Washington, and received written approval of the idea from several, two of which introduced the legislation. He has received some national publicity on the project and received enthusiastic replies from individuals throughout the country. Postmaster General Winton W. Blount has also been contacted. The proposal has been placed on the agenda for consideration by the Citizens' Stamp Advisory Committee.

Calvo is urging all former GIs who knew Ernie Pyle and served with him, as well as "those back home" to whom he reported, to contact the Post Office Department and the Citizens' Stamp Advisory Committee in Washington by letter now to authorize the issuance of a commemorative stamp for Ernie Pyle.

Nunzio Calvo serves as commissioner of Soldiers Relief for Cuyahoga County in Cleveland, Ohio, where he is active in veteran affairs and a member of veteran organizations.

[From the Ohio VFW News, October 1969]

ERNIE PYLE STAMP CONSIDERED

Veterans organizations are being asked to support a proposal which has lead to bills being introduced in Congress to provide for the issuance of a commemorative stamp honoring World War II correspondent Ernie Pyle.

Having been referred to the committee on Post Office and Civil Services, one of the bills calls for date of issuance on April 18, 1970, the 25th anniversary of the death of Ernie Pyle.

Pyle has not only won a permanent place in the hearts of Americans, as evidenced by the thousands who visit his grave in Honolulu, but he has won for our war correspondents the trust and respect of the American people and their fighting men. The late General Eisenhower said of Pyle, "We have lost one of our best and most understanding friends," and in the words of President Truman, "No man . . . has so well told the story of the American fighting man as American fighting men want it told. He deserves the gratitude of all his countrymen."

The original proposal for the stamp was the idea of N. R. Calvo of Cleveland—a veteran of World War II. He has contacted members of the House and Senate in Washington, and received written approval from several. Postmaster Gen. Winton M. Blount also has been contacted. The proposal has been placed on the agenda for consideration by the Citizens' Stamp Advisory Committee.

Calvo is urging veterans organizations and all former GIs who knew Pyle and served with him, as well as "those back home" to whom he reported, to contact the Post Office Department and the Citizens' Stamp Advisory Committee in Washington to authorize the issuance of the commemorative stamp.

Calvo is a life member of VFW Post 5799 of Cleveland, and serves as commissioner of Soldiers Relief for Cuyahoga County in that city. He is active in veterans affairs and a member of other veterans organizations.

PUBLIC LAW 90–505

HON. HOWARD W. POLLOCK

OF ALASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. POLLOCK. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to my colleagues' attention a matter of grave concern. I am greatly troubled by the proposed Resolution 23–374 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, which would compel all members of the savings and loan industry to sell all Government bonds with a maturity of more than 5 years at a substantial loss.

This loss is so substantial that it would remove hundreds of millions of dollars from the members of the Federal Home Loan Bank throughout the country and actually throw this money away. The resulting loss can only mean that the associations could make less home loans for our constituents. It seems obvious that we want to avoid this.

This loss would be so substantial that it could cause many of these associations to go into bankruptcy or at the very least, deep indebtedness. This amount of money going down the drain would remove an equal amount of money from the liquidity reserves of these associations and force them to somehow furnish additional money for liquidity, thus taking many more millions of dollars from its intended purpose of helping homeowners acquire and keep their homes.

Is it not true that long-term bonds can be sold and converted into cash in exactly the same time that it takes to sell short-term bonds? Of course that is true. Accordingly, the money invested in long-term bonds is as readily available for liquidity purposes as short-term bonds would be. Then why does the Home Loan Bank Board wish to enact, promulgate, and enforce such a harmful regulation?

When the savings and loan industry was required to furnish liquidity, the individual associations were told that liquidity would be carried on their books at cost price until sold or until maturity. Any deviation from this promise would be very close to bad faith with the members of the savings and loan industry.

Any losses taken on the sale of these bonds would be wasting the money at a time when cash is so vitally necessary to the country and to the industry.

We should each make it or business to check on this situation and vigorously protest what appears to be a ridiculous and dangerous board decision. It would be very simple, I believe, for the Federal Home Loan Bank Board to provide any addition to liquidity to be in the form of short-term maturities, and in a few years the old bonds would have matured. Accordingly, the problem, if any, will have been solved without this terrific wasting of reserves and traumatic damage to the associations of the industry.

This resolution also provides, in conformity with Public Law 90–505, that liquidity be required also on the amount of short-term borrowings by the savings and loan industry, and "short-term borrowings" is defined as "notes due in 5 years or less."

Of course, we all have some responsibility for passing Public Law 90–505, yet, it would seem to me that we might have been a little hasty. Certainly there is no reason whatsoever for a 4- to 8-percent liquidity on borrowed money. If a person wishes to make collection on borrowed money, he does not want to collect 4 to 8 percent of this money; he wants to collect 100 percent to this money. Four to eight percent is not a "drop in the bucket" toward paying off borrowed money.

I am giving some thought to the possibility of our changing Public Law 90–505 and eliminating liquidity against borrowed money. Somehow, liquidity does not seem to be necessary. Resolution No. 23–377 is also being considered by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, and this resolution, simply stated, would encourage the savings and loan industry, after it has "thrown this money down the sink," to carry this wasted and lost money as an asset on their statement for 10 years, charging off 10 percent every year. I do not believe that it is healthy for the industry to offer to the public a statement which comprises as assets moneys which have long since become substantial liabilities.

I have personally written to the Federal Home Loan Bank Board with reference to these matters, and upon receipt of their reply I will be in a better position to discuss it with each and every one of you. Meanwhile, I will deeply appreciate any attention and assistance you, my fellow Congressmen, can give to this most tragic situation.

MOUNT CARMEL, PA., AREA HIGH SCHOOL BAND

HON. HERMAN T. SCHNEEBELI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. SCHNEEBELI. Mr. Speaker, during recent years a young but extremely talented group of musicians has been distinguishing itself as a high school band—namely, the Mount Carmel, Pa., Area High School Band, more popularly known as the "Mounties." Under the expert direction of Mr. Paul Semicek, the Mounties have performed around the United States and Canada, bringing fame and publicity to their home community. Recently they performed at half time at the NFL football game between the Atlanta Falcons and the Chicago Bears, and were lauded by CBS television sports for their performance, which brought the football fans to a standing ovation. On November 25, the proud and appreciative citizens of Mount Carmel honored the Mounties by celebrating Mounties Day. The following excerpt from the Shamokin News-Item of November 24, will point up the high esteem in which this outstanding high school band is held and the fine reputation they have earned. I should like to join in saluting all of the Mounties and their director, Mr. Semicek:

Congratulations are still being received by the Mounties on their excellent showing in Atlanta where they put on a half-time show at the NFL football game between the Atlanta Falcons and Chicago Bears.

Typical of the greetings was one received by Paul Semicek, high school band director, from Howard Reifsnyder, producer of CBS television sports. The letter said:

"Dear Paul:

"Half time show featuring the Mounties of Mount Carmel Area High School for the Chicago vs. Atlanta telecast on November 16, 1969, was by far the best show I have seen this year and one of the best I have ever seen. The music was great as was the visual presentation.

"Thanks for all your cooperation and it was good seeing you again.

"Regards,

"Howard Reifsnyder."

The Mounties received a standing ovation from the 53,000 fans in attendance at the game. It was the first time such an honor had ever been accorded to a visiting outfit in the Atlanta stadium.

Semicek noted that Robert Beierschmitt, leader of the Mounties, was shown on NFL television network program on Saturday and Sunday. Beierschmitt, one of the most colorful scholastic band leaders in the East, was caught in action as he led the Mounties in Atlanta.

An appreciative community is planning to make it a big day for the Mounties tomorrow.

A TRULY GREAT HUMANITARIAN CAMPAIGN: THE COMMITTEE TO HELP BIAFRAN CHILDREN

HON. EDWARD J. PATTEN

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. PATTEN. Mr. Speaker, the starvation of Biafran children is one of the most shocking and appalling tragedies in the modern history of mankind.

When an Associated Press story reported in late October 1969, that "over 300 Biafran children die every day of starvation." Jack Ellery, who does a popular morning show on radio station WCTC, of New Brunswick, N.J., decided to do something about it. He started a truly great humanitarian campaign.

Jack Ellery asked his radio listeners to write the words, "End the Starvation" on a post card and send it to WCTC. The response has been fantastic. With the help of Jack Sutton, a bank executive, and Peter Sears, of the Bound Brook Chronicle, Jack Ellery organized "The Committee To Help Biafran Children," Post Office Box FOOD, Somerset, N.J.

More than 400 letters a day are being received and the number is increasing every day.

Mr. Speaker, the Biafran war is now 30 months old and the human toll is unbelievable. Thousands of children have died from starvation and thousands more will die unless something is done to help them. Jack Ellery, a young man of deep compassion for people and great love for children, believes that if the post card campaign produces 1 million cards or letters and they are delivered to the U.S. Senate, the pressure of public opinion will become so great, that there is a good chance action will be taken to finally stop the starvation of children in Biafra.

This is not a campaign that is seeking money. Only post cards or letters are needed with the words "End the Starvation" and the sender's name and address included.

Mr. Speaker, when many of us think of childhood, we often think of Samuel Woodworth's poem:

How dear to this heart are the scenes of my childhood,
When fond recollection recalls them to view.
The orchard, the meadow, the deep-tangled wildwood,
And every loved spot which my infancy knew.

There will be no "fond recollection" for the children of Biafra, because they probably will not live long—unless enough people care about their terrible plight—starvation, despair, and almost inevitable death.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, I have faith in the natural goodness of the American people. I believe they will respond and help the children of Biafra. I hope that every person who reads the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will send a post card or letter with the words "End the Starvation" to: Post Office Box FOOD, Somerset, N.J.

I also want to insert a story from New Brunswick, N.J., the Home News: "Simple Plea Snowballs To Aid Biafran Kids." It touches my heart and I hope it will touch the heart of every reader:

The article follows:

SIMPLE PLEA SNOWBALLS TO AID BIAFRAN KIDS

If the fact that one Biafran child dies every five minutes doesn't provoke some action from the nation's leaders, maybe a million imploring letters on the Senate floor will.

Jack Ellery, who does the morning show for WCTC radio station in New Brunswick, had that idea in mind last Thursday when he launched a write-in campaign that he hopes will snowball into a nationwide expression of sympathy and concern for the war-torn people of Biafra.

Ellery reacted to an Associated Press report last Thursday that claimed that "over 300 Biafran children die every day of starvation." On his show the following morning he asked his listeners to write the words "end the starvation" on a post card and send it in to WCTC.

"We got a fantastic response," Ellery said later.

Jack Sutton, a Franklin State Bank executive, and Pete Sears of the Bound Brook Chronicle volunteered to help form a committee with Ellery to organize the campaign.

The Biafran Children Committee has now established a post office box, dubbed "FOOD," in Franklin. Over 400 letters a day stream into the box, and the number increases daily, according to Ellery.

"Letters are starting to come in from New York and from Massachusetts, where we have our sister stations," Ellery added. "Our slogan is, 'Will you invest six cents of your money and five minutes of your time to save a life?' "

"We're not political, we take no sides," Ellery explained. "We have no money and we seek no money. Some of our secretaries at WCTC and some listeners have volunteered to handle and sort the mail."

Ellery said he thought of advertising to help publicize his campaign, but that it was impossible since "New York radio stations are asking $180 per minute and the New York Times wants $7,800 for a full page ad."

He has contacted a special representative from Biafra to the U.S., who labelled Americans as "apathetic to the most tragic situation since Nazi Germany."

According to Ellery, only the French Red Cross has been successful recently in sneaking food past Nigeria's Russian Migs, but that even the nightly haul of 180 tons of food falls short of requirements. "The minimum starvation rate in Biafra is 2,100 tons of food a night," Ellery said.

Ellery's volunteer staff sorts the mail geographically, and will eventually mail each letter to the proper senator.

"If I walk into the U.S. Senate with a million letters, someone's going to do something about it," Ellery promised.

ENVIRONMENTAL POLLUTION

HON. ROBERT PRICE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. PRICE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I wholeheartedly support the international biological program—IBP—and I am pleased that the Congress also express its support. I trust all Federal agencies and interested organizations will assist the IBP in its activities.

As a member of the House Science and Astronautics Committee, the committee which provided the primary legislative review of IBP, I am familiar with its organization, its operation, and its goals.

The international biological program is a worldwide effort by more than 50 nations to provide a truly international basis for managing the environment and preventing its further deterioration.

At present, U.S. involvement with IBP is limited. Through joining in certain of its activities, we are attempting to achieve a better understanding of the impact of: The population explosion, the effect of population increases on nature, and the effects that any changes in the balance of nature would have on mankind.

Mr. Speaker, while our present involvement with IBP is an important one, I believe we should expand it to include the entire spectrum of environmental control. Pollution is a lethal menace to all mankind, and its eradication can best be accomplished if the world works together. Pollution cannot be stopped on a nation-by-nation trial and error basis. The nations of the world must work together; the stakes are too high for any other approach.

The responsibility of the United States for environmental control is great. As a nation and as people, we have carelessly and thoughtlessly set in motion forces that threaten to ruin the air we breathe and the water we drink. In our Nation's cities, the menace is particularly deadly. In New York, for example, badly polluted air frequently causes 10 to 20 deaths a day. In Buffalo, the number of children hospitalized with asthma and skin inflammation increases significantly when the air is particularly dirty.

Environmental contamination is growing worse all the time. Our cities are becoming more smog-filled. Our streams are becoming more ridden with pollutants. Our air carries ever increasing amounts of chemical and industrial waste.

Unfortunately, as a people, we seem to have adopted a wait-and-see policy. However, I fail to see what we are waiting for. Are we waiting until the streets are littered with corpses before the general public is mobilized in defense of human health and survival? I certainly hope this is not the case.

Fortunately, certain Members of Congress, with the encouragement of interested private and public organizations have spoken out on the issue, and introduced various legislative proposals to combat environmental pollution. In my view, many of these proposals, although motivated by high purpose, have been hastily conceived and poorly drawn. As a result, the Congress stands in sore need of coherent thinking and careful guidance on this issue.

I have discussed my concern with President Nixon. He has advised me that he is preparing a comprehensive legislative program to combat pollution. In concept, his program will provide the operating continuity which many of the present attacks on pollution so clearly lack. In addition, it provides a funding mechanism which will enable our Nation to conduct a long-term fight against this lethal menace in a reasonable manner.

Mr. Speaker, I am looking forward to the President's environmental quality control program with great anticipation, and I know many of my colleagues share in my enthusiasm. While we are waiting for the President's program, I urge all my colleagues to lend their support to the IBP and to both public and private appropriate domestic efforts that have as their goal, the restoration of a quality environment for all mankind.

THE STRATEGIC ARMS RACE

HON. WALTER FLOWERS

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. FLOWERS. Mr. Speaker, the total amount of all goods and services produced by the entire world in the year 1900 was less than military spending alone in the year 1968. Of the $173.4 billion spent on the world's military in 1968, the United States accounted for $79.6 billion and the Soviet Union $39.8 billion, or a combined total of about 70 percent of it all. Mr. Speaker, I am informed further that the rate of such spending has been accelerating drastically in the last 3 years due to the increasing costs of sophisticated and highly technical modern equipment.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, as the United States and the Soviet Union opened their arms control talks in Helsinki on November 17, there was understandably great hope on the part of people everywhere that real progress would be forthcoming. For the first time since the advent of the cold war and the arms race, there seems to be at least a near meeting of the minds of the great powers to cope finally with this challenging problem. Failing this, the specter of the strategic arms race could overshadow the national life of both nations for years to come. It is indeed encouraging that the first of these preliminary meetings has not set a stage for the usual gesturing and desk pounding by the Soviets. Each side has seemed genuinely eager to get down to the essentials of the long bargaining bound to precede any arms agreement. Although more time will undoubtedly be spent by each side in testing the intentions of the other before thorough appraisals can be made, it is hoped that the substantive talks might begin in early 1970.

Mr. Speaker, there have already been over 3 years of preparation and mostly unnecessary delay in getting these talks started. Under the guise of displeasure over our Nation's policy in Vietnam, the Soviet Union first delayed its endorsement. After their approval was finally given and plans were in the works, then came the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia in August 1968, forcing cancellation by our Government. The new administration then delayed until June of this year while it reviewed U.S. policy and our bargaining position. And on October 25, the Soviet Union finally agreed to the present preliminary talks.

Early this year, the head of the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, Mr. William C. Foster, said:

> The technological stars and planets are now in favorable conjunction, so to speak—and they will not stay that way for long.

I think it can safely be said that the arsenals of the United States and the Soviet Union are in somewhat of a state of balance at this time, although in different areas one country or the other is dominant. This relative balance causes concern by those who feel that we should have a clear-cut arms superiority, but the present status may be the "favorable conjunction" that provides the conducive climate for arms talks.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps the most encouraging factor of the new found interest of the Soviet Union in looking for a solution or alternative to the arms race is the suggestion that the voice of the people of Russia is being heard over the hard line Communists. The situation, in my opinion, has gotten entirely too critical for either nation "to keep on keeping on" as we have been doing. I know that many citizens of the Fifth District of Alabama, that I have the privilege of representing, join in the hope and prayer that these preliminary talks will be the solid beginning of productive negotiations at an early date.

REASONED WORDS OF GOOD COUNSEL

HON. JAMES HARVEY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. HARVEY. Mr. Speaker, at a time when this House is again considering vital legislation to proclaim its collective viewpoints as to the absolute need of unity in behalf and for our country in its involvement in South Vietnam, it is my privilege to bring to the attention of all Members an excellent speech delivered recently by our colleague, the Honorable F. BRADFORD MORSE, of Massachusetts.

My remarks are somewhat slanted inasmuch as I have long admired and respected Congressman MORSE's good judgment and sound thinking. I think, when you read over and study his remarks made on November 13, 1969, at the Lowell Memorial Auditorium, Lowell, Mass., you will agree that he has masterfully clarified the hopes of all Americans—peace in Vietnam.

He has, I believe, narrowed and eliminated false differences among Americans as to our Nation's hopes and desires. We all seek peace; we all want peace. The difference now is by what means do we achieve that goal. Congressman MORSE's remarks follow:

REMARKS OF CONGRESSMAN F. BRADFORD MORSE, LOWELL MEMORIAL AUDITORIUM, NOVEMBER 13, 1969

I come here tonight filled with respect—for you whose convictions about our involvement in Vietnam over the past several years have demonstrably hastened the pace toward peace—for others like those to whose memory this building is dedicated who died in battles not of their own choosing, for ideals which they may not fully have understood—who gave their lives for a cause to which all men of goodwill, of all times, have aspired.

And I bring a growing measure of respect for a country—our country—whose national processes have been capable of changing the direction of our involvement in a tragic and ill-advised war in but a few months—a country strong enough, confident enough, indeed good enough to insure that the voices of those who disagree with national policy may be raised and indeed may be heard.

I speak to you, not with any sense of chauvinism—for that concept had relevance only in an earlier, less complicated day.

I do not urge unity for its own sake, for that unity would deprive our nation of the vitality that has given it strength in other difficult moments.

I seek with you only rationality rather than irrationality; I plead only for thoughtfulness rather than passion; I search for reasoned counsel which will lead to peace, rather than exercises which may delay—even thwart—its achievement.

And I address my entreaty not only to those who are gathered tonight in this place and to the thousands of other like-minded Americans, with whom I have proudly identified, who have sought for years to explain the error of our involvement in the war and have sought to correct it, but also to those other highly motivated people in our land who have supported the national leadership throughout the days of escalation and support it now in these days of de-escalation.

I trust that my comments will not be construed as a defense of the present Administration, which has been organized by my party according to the slim mandate of the American people a year ago, nor as a condemnation of any previous Administration.

For the hour is too late for partisanship. The storm is too near the horizon for anything less than an objective assessment of where we are and where we are going.

The time is upon us when we must realize that the issue at stake is not Vietnam, but the United States. The time is approaching when the issue shall not be—in spite of anyone's rhetoric—the integrity of Vietnam, but rather, the integrity of America.

To deny that polarization has been taking place in our society would be to deny that today is Thursday, November 13, 1969.

To assign responsibility for that polarization in this heated moment would be an exercise in destructive futility. But to fail to recognize that that polarization can paralyze our society and have shattering effects on the hopes of people throughout he world who have found meaning in the basic values shared by all Americans, young and old, black and white, rich and poor, would be irresponsible myopic.

The time is upon us when we must recognize and reject demagogic posturings—be they the postures of the left or the right, of the hawks or the doves.

The time has come when we must recognize that the differences among Amercans about Vietnam are today more illusory than real, in large measure because of the efforts of devoted Americans like you.

You seek an end to the war—so does your government.

You seek a withdrawal of American combat troops from Vietnam—so does your government.

You seek an end to any American military presence in Vietnam—so does your government.

You seek no American bases in Vietnam—nor does your government seek any.

You want the people of South Vietnam to have the opportunity to choose their own leaders and to reject the leadership of the present regime if they so choose—so does your government.

You want the casualties to cease, be they American, North Vietnamese or South Vietnamese—so does your government.

You want our national attention and our national resources devoted, not to war, but to improving the quality of our own society—so does your government.

You seek peace—and so does your government.

So there is little division on goals; only the means to achieve those goals are the subject of debate.

Let us therefore recognize that upon which our people agree. Let us all contribute to the attainment of peace—not by angry name-calling, nor by simplistic sloganeering, not by efforts that may frustrate and weaken the only institutions through which peace can be achieved. Instead, let us apply intellect, creativity and practical idealism to find those steps by which the common objectives may be earliest achieved.

For free men to do otherwise would be a denial of their freedom—for compassionate human beings who cherish human life to do otherwise would be a denial of their compassion.

It is my privilege to represent the five hundred thousand people who reside in the Fifth Massachusetts District in the Congress of the United States. You are among them. I ask of you, and the other Americans who have given me this trust, for reasoned counsel and thoughtful advice. I pledge to all of you that your voices shall be heard and your voices shall be heeded.

SCHOOL INTEGRATION HAS ITS LIMITS

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, one of the difficulties discussing an issue as emotional and complex as school integration is that the gap between theory and facts is rarely bridged by the proponents of artificial integration.

An editorial in the Monday, November 24, Chicago Tribune objectively states views which should be reviewed and properly calls attention to the inherent limitations of school integration.

The editorial follows:

SCHOOL INTEGRATION HAS ITS LIMITS

The futility of court decrees and administrative plans for racially balanced public schools in cities with large concentrations of Negroes has been demonstrated by experience. Accumulating evidence to this effect includes the board of education's 1969 racial headcount of students in the Chicago public schools.

Residential movements in Chicago, as shown by the 1969 and previous headcounts, tend to integrate all-white schools and then resegregate them as all-black schools in a few years.

Chicago's public school enrollment of 580,292 is 53.9 per cent black, 41 per cent white, 4.3 per cent Puerto Rican, and 0.8 per cent others. In 1968, the black enrollment was 52.9 and the white was 42.2 per cent.

Theoretically, this racial division would permit city-wide integration according to the board's definition of an integrated school, one with between 10 and 90 per cent enrollment for each race. Actually, in spite of the board's integration efforts, only 10.3 per cent of the city's black elementary school pupils and 26.9 per cent of its black high school students are enrolled in schools defined as integrated. Thus Chicago's schools are more segregated than those of the south as a whole. The best available estimate is that thruout the south this year between 30 and 40 per cent of the Negro students attend formerly all-white schools.

In the south, of course, the schools were segregated by state laws, which the United States Supreme court declared unconstitutional in 1954, whereas Chicago's "de facto" segregation is the result of housing patterns. The federal government, however, has suits pending in half a dozen northern cities to end de facto segregation, and the government's position has been upheld by federal District Judge Julius J. Hoffman in an order for the integration of schools in district 151, comprising most of Phoenix and South Holland and part of Harvey.

Judge Hoffman held that segregation, regardless of its cause, has the effect of stigmatizing Negro pupils and retarding their education, a conclusion that is disputed by many competent authorities, including Negro educators. Hoffman ordered district 151 to restructure its grade organization and to bus about 55 per cent of its total enrollment to achieve racial balance.

District 151 has appealed from this decision to the 7th United States Circuit Court of Appeals, which ruled in a similar case involving the schools of Gary, Ind., in 1963, that nothing in the Supreme court's decisions or the Constitution itself requires racial mixing. The appellate court held that the Constitution "does not require integration, it merely forbids racial discrimination," and the Supreme court refused to review the case.

On Oct. 29, in a case involving 33 school districts in Mississippi, the Supreme court said "the obligation of every school district is to terminate the dual school systems at once and to operate now and hereafter only unitary schools." The court has not said, however, whether de facto segregation is a dual or a unitary system, or what if anything can be done about it.

In its 1954 decision, the Supreme Court held that segregation by law denies Negro children the "equal protection of the laws" in violation of the 14th amendment. But de facto segregation is a result of the facts of life, not of the laws. Racial discrimination is unconstitutional, under the Supreme court's ruling but it does not follow that racial integration is compulsory or even possible.

If children are assigned and transported involuntarily to schools far from their homes, solely on account of their race, black or white, they too are denied the equal protection of the laws. A Constitution that is color blind protects not only the right of blacks to move into a neighborhood but also the right of whites to move out. Enrollment in the public schools of Washington, D.C., before the Supreme court's 1954 decision was only 40 per cent black; now it is 95 per cent. Drastic measures to integrate the schools of Chicago could produce the same results.

WHO SHOULD PAY FOR CONSERVATION

HON. DURWARD G. HALL

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. HALL. Mr. Speaker, at various times during the past few years, I have presented to the House of Representatives Committee on Agriculture, a proposal designed to elevate the economy of this Nation's farmer, while at the same time, doing much toward giving him more freedom in running his own farm operation.

The proposal called, the cropland and water restoration bill, has as one of its key features the proper care and management of our precious topsoil.

A recent article, "Who Should Pay for Conservation?" which appeared in a magazine called The Furrow, details in a most interesting way, some of the problems caused by poor soil management.

The article follows:

WHO SHOULD PAY FOR CONSERVATION?

Soil erosion is bad for farmers, but with modern fertilizers it's not the horror it used to be. Rich, black dirt is still precious but no longer priceless on much of North America's deep-soil farmland. At the same time, from the standpoint of the population in general, soil erosion is becoming ever more serious and costly.

Sedimentation of rivers is a problem that will worsen even if levels of sediment don't increase. That's because of ever-greater and more-intense use of our available water. The cost of muddy water is already staggering. It includes direct cash outlays of $250 million per year in the U.S. to dredge harbors, lakes, and rivers. Every year silt displaces about a million acre-feet of storage space in reservoirs—space that costs at least $100 per acre-foot to build. Add to this the cost of removing silt from water for municipal and industrial use and you get an idea of the cash price everybody pays for dirty water. But there's more: many soils contain durable pesticides that cling to soil particles. As soil erodes these enter into streams, rivers, and lakes, polluting the waters. Perhaps the biggest cost of dirty water is the immeasurable loss of aesthetic value in terms of natural beauty, fish, fowl, and wildlife.

When soil erodes everybody loses, and when soil stays on the farm everybody gains. This is a key point because it appears that farmers are now expected to pay more than their share of the cost of preventing siltation of waters.

Under modern farming systems (which are necessary if we are to feed ourselves), some erosion is inevitable. This loss can be greatly reduced, however, through such practices as strip cropping, contour plowing, and maintaining year-round cover, along with use of grassed waterways, terraces, water channels, and check dams to store water. All these cost a farmer something in time, effort, convenience, and money, and they don't necessarily increase profit.

Government funds have long been used in a cost-sharing arrangement to stimulate soil conservation. For certain erosion-control practices in the "preferred" category, the stated U.S. government share is 60 percent. But it never quite works out that way and farmers usually end up paying about half the cost. For some projects, farmers are quick to see the benefits to their business and glad to pay a 50-percent share. Other worthy projects go begging because farmers can scarcely be expected to spend hard-earned cash if the main beneficiaries are several hundred thousand guys downstream.

What's needed is a rebirth of the soil conservation fervor of 25 years ago, along with recognition of this new reality: farmers have relatively less to gain now, so they should bear a relatively smaller share of the cost of soil conservation. A cost-sharing formula that doesn't take this into account isn't likely to solve the problem of muddy waters in our rivers and streams.

CITY OF SANTA FE SPRINGS—BEST SISTER CITY AWARD

HON. CHET HOLIFIELD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to call the attention of my colleagues to the splendid achievements of the officials and citizens of one of the cities in the 19th Congressional District of California, which I am proud to represent. I am speaking of the city of Santa Fe Springs which has won the Reader's Digest Foundation Award for the best single sister city project for a city under 25,000 population in the United States, 2 years in a row.

In 1968, as a result of the vigor and cooperation of its officials and citizens, Santa Fe Springs was awarded a prize for the donation of a badly needed fire truck and fire hose to its sister city, Navojoa, Sonora, Mexico.

In 1969, Santa Fe Springs was awarded the prize for the previous year's work in designing and building the international trophy winning float for the 1969 Pasadena Tournament of Roses parade. This float, requiring many long hours of planning and work, was in honor of the city of Santa Fe Springs' sister city, Mersin, Turkey. This float, based upon the theme, "Hands Across the Sea," viewed by millions of people on television, was an admirable action helping to cement the bonds of international friendship.

I would like to have the text of the Santa Fe Springs award submittal printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

1969 READER'S DIGEST AWARD SUBMITTAL

As part of the Santa Fe Springs Sister City Committee objective of planning and conducting projects which will foster mutual understanding and goodwill not only between our citizens and those of our sister cities but between people of all the world, the Santa Fe Springs Sister City Committee undertook, in conjunction with the City of Mersin, Turkey, the Honorable Talat Kulay, Consul General of Turkey, and members of the community to plan and construct a float to be entered in the 1969 Pasadena Tournament of Roses Parade.

The parade, which is viewed by millions of people around the world, would be, we felt, an appropriate vehicle for expressing our regard not only for our Sister City of Mersin, but for the entire Sister City program. It was our hope that this float would help us express to these millions of people the bonds of friendship which can be developed through a Sister City affiliation.

During 1968 many long nights were spent in conjunction with the Consul General of Turkey, the Santa Fe Springs Sister City Committee, and members of the community who compose the Santa Fe Springs Rose Float Association, in planning this award-winning entry. After overcoming many obstacles and pitfalls the committee was able to successfully, steadily, and rapidly progress in planning and designing the float.

Early in the planning stages the theme "Hands Across the Sea" was decided upon. From that point the float seemed to logically grow into an expressive form.

After many months of planning and hard work, the laborious efforts of the citizens of Santa Fe Springs and others, including the Consul General and the Turkish-American Club, which formed part of our liaison with Mersin, culminated on January 1, 1969, when our float was entered in the parade. Work progressed up until the very final moment prior to the starting of the parade due to the many delicate flowers utilized in the construction.

Our float won the coveted International Trophy at the Pasadena Tournament of Roses Association. This trophy has never before been won by a city of our size. Historically, it has gone to cities in the population category of Mexico City which has a population of 7 million.

I commend Mayor Betty Wilson and the officials and citizens of the All American City of Santa Fe Springs on their outstanding accomplishment.

VICE PRESIDENT'S COMMENTS ON THE NEWS MEDIA

HON. J. GLENN BEALL, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. BEALL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, one of my constitutents sent me the editorial, reprinted below, from the Central Maryland News of November 27, 1969. It comments on the two recent speeches made by the Vice President wherein he commented on the news media. I think it is certainly interesting that many members of the news media have looked closely at the Vice President's statements and find value in them. I recommend to my colleagues this perceptive commentary:

AGNEW HAS THE SAW . . .

The hysterical reactions of the press to Vice President Agnew's recent speeches dealing with unfair and one-sided news coverage is the clearest indication of the correctness of his charges.

There are literally millions of Americans who sit by in silence day after day watching the press conduct a national dialogue which is not only totally out of contact with their points of view, but which also bears little relation to the realities of the American social and political situation. At least for those millions there is now an articulate spokesman.

The national networks and many of the nation's largest news chains have not only rejected out of hand the Vice President's call for badly needed self-analysis, they have evidenced a form of paranoia and collective fear which itself indicates how unqualified they have become to carry out their self-appointed tasks. The dealers in criticism cannot stand to be criticized; the analyzers cannot tolerate analysis.

They have accused Mr. Agnew of everything from McCarthyism to Fascism. They have screamed about a coming age of censorship, when there is clearly no evidence of such a threat. And most inexplicably, they were taken totally by surprise by the Vice President's criticism of them. They cannot believe that anyone would have the nerve to strike back at them in their ivory towers.

But why should they be surprised? Their unbridled and irresponsible attacks on Mr. Agnew, laced with dripping innuendos and slurs against his personality, have been continuing daily since Mr. Agnew was first nominated for Vice President. If they thought he would take it all lying down, they knew even less about him than their comments have indicated.

The Vice President has nothing to lose. He knows the attacks of the liberal establishment could scarcely be any worse without becoming hysterical. What Agnew has done is to articulately undermine these attacks and identify them for what they are. Now when the commentators and columnists direct their all-knowing diatribes, from their Buddha-like seats on high, they run the risk of proving the truth of what their favorite whipping boy has said about them.

The press, in fact, is way out on a limb and Agnew has the saw. They have been so irresponsible that they can neither retreat or intensify, without danger. To be sure, they have regurgitated his comments and tried to use them against him, but it is he, not they, who has the public's ear.

In a Democratic society, an informed public is of the utmost importance. For several years the press has ignored its responsibility to that public, by indulging itself in a more and more irrelevant discussion of the national situation. Now there is a spokesman to point this out and the members of the national press who have so bitterly attacked him, having thrown their best blows, have only impotent defense against his counter punches. It's time the press paid its bill and took its medicine.

LAND REFORM IN SOUTH VIETNAM

HON. FLOYD V. HICKS

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, the following is a report on South Vietnam written by Mr. Frank Herbert as a part of a series on the subject in the Seattle Post-Intelligencer.

VIETNAM—PULLOUT WILL HURT

(By Frank Herbert)

Despite the high probability that political pressures at home will force a heavy withdrawal of United States military from Vietnam over the next 18 months, there is virtually no planning to ease there the economic shock certain to follow such a move.

More than 500,000 South Vietnamese depend today on income from the U.S. international development mission (USAID), a fact admitted by top officials in Saigon.

These same officials, however, say they can see no serious economic or job displacement attending U.S. withdrawal.

We have shipped more than $800 million a year in commodity imports to buoy the South Vietnamees economy. USAID spends some 300 times more for assistance programs in Vietnam than we spend for similar programs in all of Africa.

HALVED

Present estimates on withdrawal shock say these figures will be slashed more than half.

These are facts which frighten every Vietnamese official with whom I discussed them, yet U.S. counterparts meet all questions with bland non-answers.

"We have a total economic assistance program of $476 million here this year."

How much of this is being used for postwar planning?

"We don't have the exact figures, but it's in the works."

(The South Vietnamese Labor Ministry says none of our economic assistance in going into postwar planning.)

Donald MacDonald, head of USAID in Saigon, finally tried to divert these questions by admitting, "We've made a bare beginning." He argued that I was trying to get "the complete script from a book with missing chapters."

He estimated a 15 percent annual turnover of South Vietnnamese employed by the U.S., saying most of those who leave are going into private industry. He added:

"We're replacing third-country nationals with Vietnamese wherever possible."

How many people are involved in this decision?

"We don't have the exact figures, but it's in the works."

Is a job placement program being developed?

"That's being worked out with the Ministry of Labor."

STALLED

The Ministry of Labor says such a program has been discussed with U.S. experts, but it's stalled by lack of Vietnamese cadre.

MACDONALD: "You understand that the requirements for farm labor will absorb part of the unemployment."

What percentage of the unemployed will be moved onto the farms?

"We don't have the exact figures, but . . . etc."

What about plans for vocational training and retraining of workers made jobless by a U.S. withdrawal?

"We've helped build some damn fine schools in Vietnam."

Is there a specific job-retraining program sufficient to take care of massive unemployment?

"It's in the pipeline."

How many people could you accommodate?

"We don't have the . . . etc."

The truth is that our planning program to fill the vacuum sure to be created by U.S. withdrawal runs the full gamut from A to B. When USAID asked $240 million from Congress to finance imports for this fiscal year, it did not assume withdrawal.

In the present mood of Congress, no more than $180 million may be provided. Vietnamese officials say none of the funds thus generated are earmarked for planning to soften the effect of U.S. withdrawal.

The U.S. military is spending some $30 billion a year in Vietnam.

Pressed about inconsistencies in his planning story, MacDonald finally brought up the Lilienthal report which he called "our major planning effort to insure there will be no economic shock."

This refers to the Joint Development Group, a planning team hired by the Saigon government to plot post-war development for South Vietnam. It was headed my David E. Lilienthal, former chief of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

LEVEES

The team came up with a plan whose chief aspect is a massive levee system for the Mekong Delta, a project taking ten years and costing $2.5 billion.

One of the major arguments in the Lilienthal report is that South Vietnam needs extensive mechanization of its farm economy. To accommodate this, the report does not want fragmentation of farm lands which would be difficult to undo later.

In effect, this means the Lilienthal Report is against land reform, a program which would parcel South Vietnam's rich farm lands into the hands of the tillers.

Despite the fact that land reform has proved to be a major political stabilizer wherever it has been applied, Lilenthal hews to his report's finding.

Let's take a good look at this report then through the eyes of senior US project engineers in South Vietnam, men who would have to carry it out.

Every one of these men with whom I discussed the report attacked it bitterly, calling it such things as "shoddy" and "ill conceived." Not even MacDonald would defend it when Istarted asking about specific applications to ease prospective economic shocks.

ATTACKS

The engineers, however, were not hesitant in their attacks. They made these points:

There were no basic engineering feasibility studies to implement the plan.

The report envisions a coordinated levee system for the entire Mekong Delta with levees of a specific type requiring several kinds of fill, including rock.

There were no studies on where this fill could be obtained or how it could be transported to the Delta sites.

No test bores were made to determine the nature of the land on which levees would be built.

Despite the fact that every village in the plan area is built on the bank of a canal or river, no factors were introduced on cost or means of relocating these villages.

This could be an extremely costly and time-consuming effect because it would encounter serious objections from a people always unwilling to leave the bones of their ancestors.

Even if the cemeteries associated with these villages were moved, such moves would involve complex religious preparations and much more upset than would similar moves in a Western society.

Finally, extensive mechanization of South Vietnam's rice farming would bring about a massive shift of population from the rural to the urban areas.

With the cities already overcrowded by people displaced by the war, with the apparent lack of planning for unemployment, this certainly would create a brand new stew for the communists to exploit.

CUSHION

You will recall, also, that MacDonald envisions farm employment as one of the cushions for postwar job displacement. How does this square with the massive unemployment which always accompanies agricultural mechanization?

It doesn't, of course.

MacDonald is being inconsistent. His aides farther down the bureaucratic ladder are more candid. They say:

"We have never sat back and examined the requirements for a postwar environment in South Vietnam."

What conclusions can we draw from this lack of planning?

One certainly is that U.S. officials do not believe we are going to undertake a large withdrawal of troops and supporting forces.

It is a fact that U.S. Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker and Gen. Creighton Abrams, our military commander in Vietnam, have advised the White House to play a waiting game. They argue that time is on the U.S. side.

There is physical evidence in Vietnam—stockpiling of arms, continued long-range commitment planning—indicating our officials there are digging in for a much longer war than the people in the U.S. expect.

Certainly, the communists are reacting as though they expect a much longer war, conserving their own forces, shifting to small-unit guerrilla actions, continued intransigence in Paris.

And here's a final fact for you to take home to bed with you tonight: Ambassador Samuel Berger, our No. 2 man in the Saigon Embassy, has been at pains to tell many Vietnamese officials that President Nixon said he "hoped" to beat Clark Clifford's troop withdrawal rate (200,000 over the next 18 months), not that he would beat it.

PUBLIC PARKING FACILITIES

HON. EDWARD G. BIESTER, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. BIESTER. Mr. Speaker, following is an article from the October 21, 1969 issue of the Daily Intelligencer, Doylestown, Pa., which tells how the Doylestown merchants took the initiative in helping the local government provide much needed parking facilities. It is noteworthy in this time of increasing dependence on the government to see private citizens take the necessary action to solve a local problem.

I would like to compliment the merchants of Doylestown and bring this article to the attention of my colleagues:

TO ACQUIRE PARKING FACILITY—BOND BIDS RECEIVED

(By Judy McCann)

The Doylestown National Bank and Trust Company was the low bidder at 3.85 per cent interest for the $250,000 bond issue for Doylestown borough to acquire additional parking facilities.

"Here again, a local institution has had enough faith in the borough to do this," said Borough Council President John F. Mason after the bids were opened at the meeting Monday night.

"The bank has saved the borough $35,000," said Mason. He based his statement on the amount of the difference between the bid of Kidder, Peabody and Company and the Doylestown National Bank.

NEXT BIDDER

The Industrial Valley Bank was the second lowest bidder with 5.40 per cent or a net interest cost of $72,500. The net interest of the Doylestown National Bank was listed as $52,937.50.

The borough council was presented with a check for $50,275 from the Doylestown Merchants Association, which has been pledged by the merchants and businessmen of downtown Doylestown to get the additional parking facilities underway a couple of months ago.

"You have made me the happiest man in Doylestown," Mason told Mrs. John Foster and Carter Gardy, members of the association who presented the check to Mason.

PEOPLE HELP

Mason told the 50 residents present, "I don't accept this on behalf of borough council, but on behalf of the taxpayers of Doylestown. The people have come to help the government.

"This is the second time this has happened in Doylestown. Maybe it's just a pebble in the ocean, but maybe the ripples will spread to other towns and cities throughout the country," said Mason

Mason went on to say that the first time the people came to the aid of the borough government was for Operation '64 when Urban Renewal was turned down.

"They've done it again, and I hope that history has been made in local government," said Mason.

Councilman Walter G. Klumpp said that the parking committee has spent the past nine months working on additional parking and part of the final stages of the plan was the presentation of the check from the Merchants Association.

There were no comments from the residents attending the meeting regarding the bond issue, but there was a round of applause after the presentation of the check.

The seven companies who submitted bids for the bonds were Girard Trust Company at 5.997 per cent; Yarnall, Biddle and Company, 6.179 per cent; Philadelphia National Bank, 6.117 per cent; and Cunningham and Schmertz 5.918 per cent.

The council adopted a resolution approving the statement of indebtedness and summary of the borrowing capacity of the borough; a resolution awarding the bonds; enacted an ordinance increasing the debt of the borough by $250,000 for the bond issue and enacted an ordinance authorizing the sale of $2,500 in $100 denomination term bonds. The council also adopted a resolution accepting the bid for the printing of the bonds.

Negotiations are still under way for the purchase of parking lot sites. They are the Kolbe property on West State and Hamilton Streets, and the William F. Fretz and Son office and warehouse on Hamilton Street and West Oakland Avenue.

HIGHWAY TRAGEDIES

HON. WILLIAM G. BRAY

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. BRAY. Mr. Speaker, probably one of the most tragic and senseless and shocking domestic problems faced is that of highway fatalities. The following article from the National Road Traveler, printed in Cambridge City, Ind., for October 8, 1969, by Bob Gray, Sr., stresses the need for positive and immediate action:

ANOTHER SIDE OF THE NEWS

(By Bob Gray, Sr.)

Big black headlines—Twenty-nine Hoosiers die in traffic over a single week end. Six of them were young people from neighboring New Castle.

Everyday grieving families bury their traffic victim dead in our lonesome graveyards. Others huddle nervously in hospital lobbies as loved ones linger between life and death upstairs somewhere.

The dread specter of death, like the fourth seal horse described over in Revelation chapter six, roves our highways around the clock, finding many victims. Sometimes they are from our own Cambridge City community. The grim harvest is sorrow, widows, orphans and untold material damage.

All this is now so normal that most of us are only mildly shocked until tragedy strikes our family.

We are a nation on wheels—on the move—as no other nation in the world live and die in automobiles as we do. Going from here to there is our biggest business and we own 100 million cars.

Almost everybody has heard the frightening screech of tires and shattering glass as cars smash together. All too often a mangled body lies under a bloody blanket awaiting ambulance or police. Here in Indiana we are so expert in killing each other that the year's death total is already 1,200, with plenty of time to reach 1,600 or more with the more hazardous winter months of driving ahead of us.

Does all this madness symbolize the hysteria of our times? Is it because we are such a nervous people as typified by the tons of tranquilizers we swallow each year? Are we so afraid of tomorrow that we must live so dangerously today? Are we a different person entirely when our foot is on the accelerator?

Any assumption that little or nothing can be done about such appalling death, injury, and heartache is wrong—dead wrong. Since human error is responsible for most accidents, we must continue to stress sane driving behavior, police patrons, warnings, slogans, etc. But the gruesome record shows that these are not enough.

More one way roads, maybe even different color pavement might help. Above all, engineers must design cars which by radar and Laser beam principles will repel each other before crash.

This column can fully share the grief of traffic victim families. Earlier this year our telephone rang sharply in the middle of the night to say that our 17-year-old Bob-Tom had been killed at a poorly marked intersection. To compound the tragedy the girl in the other car died too.

There are no words to express such despair or any remedy for such no-warning, heartache. Memories come back in long, floor walking nights when sleep won't come. If God sees a sparrow fall, why is He a million miles away hiding from us? Merciful time on way to eternity finally eases some pain, but the hurting never stops. One only learns to endure it.

To keep from falling apart, we adjust to existing reality and thank God for loaning us this fine boy to love for a little while. We solace ourselves that he compensated for the brevity of life by the zeal in which he lived it.

Multiplying this burden of sorrow by 1,200 Hoosiers should motivate everybody reading these lines to join a crusade against such senseless human slaughter.

Silent concern is not enough. Thousands of Hoosiers should write Governor Whitcomb urging that State Government, science, industry, labor and safety officials mobilize every resource to halt the awesome momentum.

Even our pre-schoolers have more to fear from traffic than from disease. One of every two Hoosiers alive today have already, or will be, involved in a crippling or fatal accident.

Serious enough for both thought and action? It surely is.

AGNEW MAKES A POINT

HON. WILLIAM LLOYD SCOTT

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, there was an editorial November 20 in the Fairfax County Journal-Standard, a weekly newspaper serving my district, supporting Vice President AGNEW's recent address condemning the practice of "instant analysis" of major public issues by "a small band of TV network commentators and self-appointed analysts." This is a matter in which I believe my colleagues will be interested, and I insert it in the RECORD in full below:

AGNEW MAKES A POINT

Vice President Agnew has opened public discussion of a major issue that has been simmering a long time with his attack on "a small band of TV network commentators and self-appointed analysts."

For years, newsmen both inside and outside of broadcasting have expressed exactly the same concerns the Vice President has brought forward. Now the issues are getting close attention at the grassroots level.

In his specific charges, Mr. Agnew is perfectly correct. President Nixon delivered a carefully prepared half hour speech, the product of many hours of work and the result of classified information available only to the President.

Fifteen seconds after he finished, TV network analysts, completely without access to the background information, began an off-the-cuff job of comment. From what we saw, they either damned him with faint praise or praised him with faint damns or just plain damned him. Nationwide, of course.

There are three things which need saying about this situation.

First, no newsman is capable of really intelligent reaction in 15 seconds. There is no time for even the best commentator to collect his thoughts. This calls into serious question the validity of what the man says, the practice of "instant analysis" itself. If a man has time only to reveal his own prejudice, then why is he put in that position?

Second, the impact of truly national media needs a good deal of attention from the best minds that both government and communications can muster. America always has prided itself on the diversity of its viewpoints and the multiplicity of the voices which are free to speak to the issues. This diversity is a precious treasure, and it is slipping away.

Network television has produced a three-voice system. Too often, the three voices speak in the same vein. While the government forbids anyone to own and operate more than five VHF–TC stations, probably 80 per cent of the major stations devote their prime hours to these three network voices. Station owners have no opportunity to localize or edit or adjust the network news output to fit their own ideas or their own local needs. It comes through with the straight New York or Washington slant.

In pre-TV days, the great national and international news services, United Press and Associated Press, distributed news over vast areas and they still do, but each local newspaper or broadcasting station selected its own news, edited it, and even had the opportunity to ask questions about it. No such opportunity exists in the network TV system.

A few years ago, the major networks tried bringing in top local station news directors as executives in their network news operations, but the good boys from the hinterland were soon overpowered by the weight of the network operation and the "star system" of television news.

The third part of the problem needs all the devotion that dedicated newsmen can give it, and it is perhaps the most serious. It should be understood that individual TV stations are licensed by the Federal Communications Commission in the public "interest, convenience and necessity," but networks are not. There is no standard of performance they are required to meet, no sort of federal accountability.

Of course, no individual station could afford to produce a major entertainment series, or even a top-flight special. And it is here the networks perform highly useful functions for stations and for viewers. News often has been a losing proposition in the entertainment—oriented world of broadcasting, and news professionals have waged a long fight for air time, staff and facilities.

Too often, to the network brass, news is still "a show." What is sought is the best rating, not the best information or most responsible presentation. The late Edward R. Murrow infuriated his network bosses with his blunt assessments of broadcast news. Since his day, the situation is both better and worse. It is better because there are more good newsmen in television. It is worse because the damage a bad news job can do is greater.

Mr. Agnew has raised a point of major importance. And he framed it correctly when he said, "no nation depends more on the intelligent judgment of its citizens." The Vice-President is right.

THINGS ARE GETTING WORSE FOR SOVIET MAN-IN-THE-STREET

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, it is not often that a practical report on a situation in the Soviet Union or any other part of the Soviet empire is effectively covered in the free world press due to the restrictions imposed by the Soviets.

An extremely astute commentary by the distinguished Dumitru Danielpol of the Copley News Service writing in the November 4 Aurora, Ill., Beacon-News provides us with a timely insight into the conditions facing the average Soviet citizen.

The commentary follows:

[From the Aurora (Ill.) Beacon-News, Nov. 4, 1969]

DUMITRU DANIELPOL COMMENTS: THINGS ARE GETTING WORSE FOR SOVIET MAN-IN-THE-STREET

WASHINGTON.—The woes of the Soviet man-in-the-street, the fellow at the bottom of the ladder are getting worse.

Not only doesn't he get what he wants when he wants it, but the consumer has to pay exorbitant prices for shoddy goods.

The queues before stores that are customary spectacles in all Communist cities are evidently beginning to bother the Kremlin "planners."

"The population wastes an enormous amount of time shopping—almost 30 billion hours a year," writes Ya Orlov, an expert on retail trading. "This is equivalent to the annual labor of 15 million workers."

With goods in short supply, pilfering, cheating and profiteering are widespread. Sales personnel have become expert at setting aside goods for themselves, their friends or influential customers. The ordinary man is short changed and cheated with merchandise falsely marked, watered down or thinned out.

Producers are systematically swindled by consumer cooperatives or distribution centers. They are paid for lower quality merchandise and often underweighed. The goods are subsequently sold at higher value leaving a "profit" in the books of the enterprise.

Inspections carried out by the Ministry of Agriculture have found that this type of swindling is widespread.

One example cited in the Kirov area involves 273 tons of potatoes that were paid for at the rate of "poor quality" and resold to the consumer as "standard quality."

The same applied to meat, leather products, wool, pelts, eggs etc.

By such manipulations, millions of rubles remain in the registers of consumer operatives, booked as "profit" and rewarded as "over-fulfillment of the plan."

Kremlin attempts to stamp out the practice have failed because of the solidarity among the personnel who benefit from the "profits" shown by the enterprise.

Of those brought before the courts, only a small percentage have been punished. The problem has grown to such proportions that even Moscow no longer tries to hide it.

"The study of consumer demand, the collation, transmission and processing of economic information is only of a formal nature," complained Izvestia recently. "Up to now there is not a single scientifically based system for studying the interplay of economic forces or a method for determining the demand for goods . . .

"Consequently, unmarketable goods pile up at depots and warehouses, while on the other hand, some other extremely important product is in short supply, although everything necessary for its production is available in the country."

The culprit is of course central planning by a top-heavy bureaucracy, bogged down by red tape, which is incapable of change. Even the limited attempts of "liberalization"—the Lieberman system—adopted during the Khrushchev era—encountered stiff opposition and have finally fizzled.

Can the system be saved? Not as long as the bureaucrats stay in power, and they don't seem anxious to commit political suicide.

APPRAISAL OF THE COURTS FROM A JUROR'S VIEW

HON. LAWRENCE J. HOGAN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. HOGAN. Mr. Speaker, the continuing debate over the cause of crime and its prevention also includes the question of our judicial system. I recently received a letter from a citizen, who served on jury duty.

From that vantage point, he offers a different view of our courts. These observations are worthy of note.

His letter is submitted for the RECORD and I call the attention of my colleagues to its contents. Here is the letter:

OCTOBER 15, 1969.

Hon. LAWRENCE J. HOGAN,
Congress of the United States,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR LARRY: I want to thank you very much for your thoughtfulness in sending me the Congressional Record of October 3, 1969, containing your timely and excellent statement before the House regarding the District of Columbia Courts. Recently I served a jury duty tour of one month in the Court of General Sessions which provided me with some insight on the operations of our courts.

While all the actions summarized in your statement of October third are applauded, the following suggestions are submitted as additional actions which could be taken to speed up the court calendars, to reduce the costs and to reduce the intolerable crime rate in the District of Columbia:

a. Establish a system which would insure efficient prosecution of the accused. Too often the jurors, after completing a case, would comment, "We had to render a not guilty verdict even though all of us felt the accused was guilty". This would be followed by the statement, "It's too bad the prosecuting attorneys don't seem to know enough about how to prosecute the case or they don't seem to care or maybe they don't have enough time to prepare the cases".

b. Reduce to a minimum the amount of wasted time. Too often, after all the endless and necessary evolutions have been completed to bring the accused before the bench, the case is endlessly delayed or rescheduled due to one reason or another. The defense attorneys too often gave the impression that their first encounter with the accused is when he is brought into court for his trial. Very frequently the judges, and this is no criticism of the judges, had to take time, either openly or at the bench, to instruct or correct the attorneys as to how to handle their cases.

c. During the period of my serving on the jury, August 5–September 2, there were approximately 170 jurors. Each non-government juror received $20.00 per day and most of his time was spent in the jurors lounge commenting that this was a bore and a waste of time and money. From my observations it would seem that a lot of people's time could be spared and considerable amount of taxpayers' money could be saved (and it shouldn't take a million dollar research contract) if a more efficient administration of the jury panel was introduced.

Personally, this was my first service as juror and, while it was a good experience, I shall go to all limits to avoid serving again under the same conditions.

With my best wishes,

Sincerely,

R. A. KOTRLA.

WHAT LIFE HAS TAUGHT ME

HON. OLIN E. TEAGUE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, while looking through a magazine section of one of our many papers in this country, I ran across an article entitled "What Life Has Taught Me" written by Dr. Werner Von Braun which I would like to share with the other Members of this body. I found it very interesting reading and I am sure that others will also:

[From Grit, Nov. 9, 1969]

WHAT LIFE HAS TAUGHT ME

(By Dr. Werner Von Braun)

Discussions about religion and philosophy put me always a little ill at ease. I am trained to think as a scientist; I'm far more at home talking about rocket thrust than prayer. I wouldn't even say that I'd always had an interest in religion. The only thing I've always cared about is space exploration.

When I was growing up in Germany, it was the tradition of parents to give their children a rather spendid gift when they were confirmed. Every boy in town, it seemed, asked for a pair of long pants and a watch. Except me. The other boys went to church in long trousers, and every one of them needed to know what time it was every few steps. But I didn't care. I got my telescope.

I guess I have always daydreamed about space flight. When I was in my early teens, I used to slip off to an old First World War munitions dump and pick up odd parts to use in my homemade rockets. I'd try out the rockets in a field near our house.

I would kneel down at a safe distance and dream that I was sending another Braun Super Space Ship out to a far-away galaxy, and then I'd push the ignition button. Usually, the rockets wobbled a little way into the air and fell back again. They were really just a lot of smoke and noise. My dreams were not very practical.

I would always pray when I knelt down to push the ignition button. A kind of last-minute, hope-against-hope prayer. "Please let this one go," I'd say.

Shortly after I turned 18, I learned that an old hero of mine, a famous German scientist, had written a paper claiming that we could get to the moon with rockets. I couldn't wait to get that paper. But when it came, my heart sank. The paper had almost no text to it. It was one long, complicated, mathematical equation.

The trouble was, I didn't like math. I'd failed the subject in school. But this was what it took to get a rocket into space—not romantic stories, not daydreams, but math. When I found that I'd have to learn math if I wanted to put a rocket into space, I learned math. And with it, I eventually got rockets that could probe space too. But first came months, years of hard, unromantic work.

I think prayer is often the hardest kind of work, if in work you include the ideas of discipline, regularity, effort, sacrifice.

I had been reared in nazi Germany. There were many beautiful and old churches in Germany, of course, and a few of them remained strong even under the nazis; but mostly they were empty shells.

Then I came to America. I was sent by the government to Fort Bliss, Tex., to carry on experiments with rockets.

One day a neighbor called and asked if I'd like to go to church with him. I accepted, because I was anxious to see if an American church was just a religious country club, as I'd been led to expect.

When we drove up, the small, white, frame building stood out in the hot Texas sun on a browned-grass lot. Outside, several little groups of people were waiting. Before long, I heard a screeching of brakes as up to this church drove an old, battered bus. The door opened, and perhaps 50 people climbed out until only the driver was left. Then he too climbed down, and my host walked up to him.

"Dr. Von Braun," he said, "I'd like you to meet our minister."

It was the minister who drove that bus. Each Sunday, this man drove for more than 40 miles picking up his parishioners who didn't have cars. Together these people made up a live, vibrant community. They worked together, prayed together, gave each other support. The congregation was trying to raise funds for a new Sunday school, and many of these people gave far more than their budgets should have allowed.

This was the first time I really understood that religion was not a cathedral inherited from the past, or a quick prayer at the last minute. To be effective, religion has to be backed up by discipline and effort.

Gradually, I came to feel that in order to be realistic, my prayers, too, needed to move into a new dimension. I began to pray daily, hourly, instead of, on occasion, "Pushing the button and hoping." I took long rides out into the desert where I could be alone at prayer. I prayed with my wife in the evening. As I tried to understand my problems, I tried to find God's will in acting on them.

In this age of space flight and nuclear fission, to use power wisely calls for a moral and ethical climate that—quite frankly—I do not think we now possess. We can achieve it only through many hours of the deep concentration we call prayer.

Are we willing to do this, I wonder? It will take effort. Prayer can be the hardest kind of work—but it is certainly the most important work we now can do.

CENSORSHIP OF THE BROADCAST MEDIA

HON. WILLIAM D. HATHAWAY

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. HATHAWAY. Mr. Speaker, Commissioner Nicholas Johnson of the Federal Communications Commission has never been known as a spokesman for the broadcasting industry. But I have always known him to be fair. So I was not surprised to find him as the FCC Commissioner recently expressing the most outspoken criticism to the possibility of Government censorship of the broadcast media. On November 17, in Iowa City, he said:

It is a part of my responsibility as an FCC Commissioner to work for a free and open television system that will operate in the public interest. In the past I have written of the dangers of censorship by the large corporations that own the nation's broadcast facilities. I believe my responsibility today requires a few words about government censorship.

Vice President Agnew's Des Moines speech has rocketed into public consciousness many questions about the significance of television in our society. Such dialogue and awareness could be quite healthy.

Unfortunately, he has also frightened network executives and newsmen in ways that may cause serious and permanent harm to independent journalism and free speech in America.

This was a most significant and timely statement, and was followed, on November 20, by a unanimous FCC ruling regarding the networks' commentary following President Nixon's November 3 speech. The FCC held:

The issue which was here involved—Vietnam—is one to which the networks have devoted, and continue to devote, substantial amounts of time for contrasting viewpoints. Indeed, that was the case as to the broadcast in question. The fairness doctrine requires no more.

One would expect the industry to appreciate Commissioner Johnson's leadership on this occasion.

I was quite surprised, therefore, to find that the industry has chosen this, of all times, to continue its assault on this fine, young public servant.

It has recently come to my attention that the "Television Information Office"—a network-funded, industry public relations effort affiliated with the National Association of Broadcasters—has recently circulated 35,000 copies of a blistering attack on Commissioner Johnson.

This attack is in the form of a reprint of an article by CBS news president, Richard S. Salant, entitled "He Has Exercised His Right—To Be Wrong," TV Guide, September 20, 1969, page 10.

Those receiving the reprint must be somewhat confused by its contents, because it is obviously a reply to an article they were not sent: Commissioner Johnson's article entitled, "The Silent Screen," TV Guide, July 5, 1969, page 6.

I believe it would be useful for the Members to know not only of the tactics of this industry attack upon Commissioner Johnson, but also of the merits of his observations about the industry's performance.

His thesis, in short, is that our country is endangered as much, or more, by what television fails to tell us as by the threat of its domination by Government censorship. During these days when the performance of the mass media is undergoing close scrutiny, I believe that he has raised concerns well worth wider distribution and discussion. Accordingly, I am inserting in the RECORD the full context of his debate with Mr. Salant. First, Johnson, "The Silent Screen," TV Guide, July 5, 1969, page 6. Second, Salant, "He Has Exercised His Right—To Be Wrong," TV Guide, September 20, 1969, page 10. Third, Johnson, "Letter," TV Guide, September 27, 1969, page A–2. Fourth, and, finally, Commissioner Johnson's reply in the form of a speech to the international conference of the Radio-Television News Directors Association, September 26, 1969.

The materials follow:

[Reprinted from the July 5, 1969 issue of TV Guide magazine]

THE SILENT SCREEN

Julian Goodman, president of NBC, believes that television "is now under threat of restriction and control." Frank Stanton, president of CBS, says that "attempts are being made to block us." Elmer Lower, president of ABC News, thinks he may "face the prospect of some form of censorship."

I agree. Censorship is a serious problem in our country. My only dispute with these network officials involves just who is doing the censoring. They apparently believe it's the Government. I disagree.

NBC recently cut Robert Montgomery's statements off the air when, during the Johnny Carson show, he mentioned a CBS station being investigated by the Federal Communications Commission. Folk singer Joan Baez was silenced by CBS when she wished to express her views about the Selective Service System on the Smothers Brothers show. Now, of course, the entire show has been canceled—notwithstanding the high ratings and its writers' recent Emmy. Sure there's censorship. But let's not be fooled into mistaking its source.

For at the same time that network officials are keeping off your television screens anything they find inconsistent with their corporate profits or personal philosophies, the FCC has been repeatedly defending their First Amendment rights against Government censorship. Just recently, for example, the FCC ruled—over strong protests—that the networks' coverage of the Chicago Democratic convention was protected by the Constitution's "freedom of the press" clause. In other decisions, the Commission refused to penalize radio station WBAI in New York for broadcasting an allegedly anti-Semitic poem, or a CBS-owned station for televising a "pot party."

Many broadcasters are fighting, not for free speech, but for profitable speech. In the WBAI case, for example, one of the industry's leading spokesmen, Broadcasting magazine, actually urged that WBAI be punished by the FCC—and on the same editorial page professed outrage that stations might not have an unlimited right to broadcast profitable commercials for cigarettes which may result in illness or death.

This country is a great experiment. For close to 200 years we have been testing whether it is possible for an educated and informed people to govern themselves. All considered, the experiment has worked pretty well. We've had our frustrations and disappointments as a Nation, but no one has been able to come up with a better system, and most of the newer nations still look to us as a model.

Central to our system, however, is the concept of an educated and an informed people. As Thomas Jefferson said, "The way to prevent error is to give the people full information of their affairs." Our founding fathers were familiar with censorship by the King of England. They were going to replace a king with a representative Congress. But they were concerned lest any American institution become powerful enough to impede the flow of information to the people. So they provided in the First Amendment that "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech. . . ." Why "Congress"? I believe they assumed Congress would be the only body powerful enough to abridge free speech. They were wrong.

A lot has happened to the creation and control of information in this country since 1789. That was an age of town meetings and handbills. Today most information comes from the three broadcasting networks, ABC, CBS and NBC, and the two wire services, Associated Press and United Press International. As Professor John Kenneth Galbraith has reminded us in "The New Industrial State," 70 years ago the large corporation confined itself to mass production in heavy industry. "Now," he writes, "it also sells groceries, mills grain, publishes newspapers and provides public entertainment, all activities that were once the province of the individual proprietor or the insignificant firm."

It is easy for us to forget how large, profitable and politically powerful some corporations have become. In 1948 about half of all manufacturing assets in the United States were controlled by 200 corporations; today a mere 100 corporations hold that power. A single corporation such as American Telephone & Telegraph (one of the FCC's many regulated companies) controls the wages and working conditions of 870,000 employees, purchases each year some $3.5 billion in goods and services, has assets of $37 billion, and has annual gross revenues in excess of $14 billion. This gross revenue is several times larger than the combined budgets of all the Federal regulatory commissions, the Federal court system, and the U.S. Congress; larger than the budget of each of the 50 states; a larger operation, indeed, than all but very few foreign governments.

I am not suggesting that large corporations are inherently evil. Not at all. They have created much of our wealth. I am merely urging that we be aware of the fact that large corporations have both the incentive and the power to control the information reaching the citizenry of our free society.

Sometimes corporate pressures to control what you see on television are just plain silly. For example, in his book "TV—The Big Picture," Stan Opotowsky reports that "Ford deleted a shot of the New York skyline because it showed the Chrysler building. . . . A breakfast-food sponsor deleted the line 'She eats too much" from a play because, as far as the breakfast-food company was concerned, nobody could ever eat too much." Often, however, corporate tampering with the product of honest and capable journalists and creative writers and performers can be quite serious. Sometimes there is a deliberate alteration of content; sometimes needed information is squeezed out by more profitable "entertainment" programming.

On Feb. 10, 1966, the Senate was conducting hearings on the Vietnam war. Fred Friendly, who was president of CBS News at the time, wanted you to be able to watch those hearings. His network management did not permit you to watch. If you were watching CBS that day you saw, instead of George Kennan's views opposing the Vietnam war, the fifth CBS rerun of I Love Lucy. Fred Friendly quit CBS because of this decision, and subsequently wrote "Due to Circumstances Beyond Our Control" to tell the story. He began his book with the quotation, "What the American people don't know can kill them." Indeed it can. In Vietnam, about 35,000 so far. We have been shown miles of film from Vietnam, it's true. But how much has television told you about the multibillion-dollar corporate profits from that war?

There are many other situations in which censorship exists side-by-side with large profits—and disease or death. The tobacco industry spends about $250 million a year on radio and television commercials designed to associate cigarette smoking, especially by the young, with fishing, football, the fresh air of the great outdoors, sexual prowess, and all other desirable attributes of a fun-packed adult world. In exchange for this investment, the industry sells on the order of $9 billion worth of cigarettes a year. Would it really surprise you to learn that the broadcasting industry has been less than eager to tell you about the health hazards of cigarette smoking? It shouldn't. Just recently, for example, a United States congressman alleged that the president of the National Association of Broadcasters had suppressed from Congress and the American public revealing information about the "substantial appeal to youth" of radio and television cigarette commercials. The relation of this forgetfulness to profits is clear: cigarette advertising provides the largest single source of television's revenue, about 8 percent.

The FCC has ruled that broadcasters can't present one point of view on a controversial issue and censor all others just to serve their own beliefs and profits. The "Fairness Doctrine" requires that all viewpoints be presented. The FCC applied this doctrine to cigarette commercials. And what was the response of the brodcasting industry? It fought the decision with all the economic and political strength at its command. It has finally gone all the way to the Supreme Court to argue that a doctrine which limits its power to keep all information about the health hazards of cigarette smoking from the American people is a violation of broadcasters' First Amendment rights!

Or how about the 50,000 people who die each year on our highways? Their deaths are due to many causes, of course, including their own intoxication and carelessness. But how many television stations told you—either before or after Ralph Nader came along—that most auto-safety engineers agree virtually all those lives could be saved if our cars were designed properly? Nader, in "Unsafe at Any Speed," speculates about "the impact which the massive sums spent ($361,006,000 in 1964 on auto advertising alone) have on the communication media's attention to vehicle safety design."

Television certainly didn't take the lead in telling us about unfit meat, fish and poultry. (Chet Huntley was found to have been editorializing against the Wholesome Meat Act at a time when he and his business partners were heavy investors in the cattle and meat business!) Bryce Rucker, in "The First Freedom," notes that:

"Networks generally have underplayed or ignored events and statements unfavorable to food processors and soap manufacturers. Recent examples are the short shrift given Senate subcommittee hearings on, and comments favorable to, the 1966 'truth in packaging' bill and the high cost of food processing. Could it be that such behavior reflects concern for the best interests of, say, the top-50 grocery-products advertisers, who spent $1,314,893,000 in TV in 1965, 52.3 percent of TV's total advertising income?"

What could be more essential than information about potentially harmful food and drugs?

All Americans are concerned about "the crime problem." Have you ever stopped to wonder why the only crimes most of us hear about are, in the words of the Presidential Commission on Law and Enforcement and Administration of Justice, "the crimes that are the easiest for the poor and the disadvantaged to commit . . ."? What we haven't been told is that much of the crime in the United States is "white-collar" crime; that the rich steal as much or more than the poor. As the Crime Commission report defined it:

"The 'white-collar' criminal is the broker who distributes fraudulent securities, the builder who deliberately uses defective material, the corporation executive who conspires to fix prices, the legislator who peddles his influence and vote for private gain, or the banker who misappropriates funds . . ."

Did you ever find out from television, for example, that a single recent price-fixing case involved a "robbery" from the American people of more money than was taken in all the country's robberies, burglaries and larcenies during the years of that criminal price fixing? The crime commission declared that "it is essential that the public becomes aware of the seriousness of business crime." Why is it the news media do not tell you about these threats to "law and order"?

One could go on and on. The inherent dangers in cyclamates (the artificial sweeteners in soft drinks) have been so widely discussed in Sweden that the government is considering prohibiting their use. The danger is scarcely known to the average American. Most of the Nation's 160,000 coal miners have "black lung" disease (the disintegration of the lung from coal dust) in one form or another. Mine operators may refuse to pay for fresh-air masks—or support workmen's compensation legislation. Some television stations in coal-mining areas have, until recently, refused to televise programs offered them by doctors about this serious health hazard. Reports differ, and no one knows for sure, but one current sampling showed that 20 percent of the color-TV sets studied were emitting excess X-ray radiation. Natural-gas pipelines are exploding as predicted. And did you know that the life expectancy of the average American adult male has been declining in recent years? The list goes on almost without end.

Note what each of these items has in common: (1) human death, disease, dismemberment or degradation, (2) great profit for manufacturers, advertisers and broadcasters, and (3) the deliberate withholding of needed information from the public.

Many pressures produce such censorship. Some are deliberate, some come about through default. But all have come, not from Government, but from private corporations with something to sell. Charles Tower, chairman of the National Association of Broadcasters Television Board, recently wrote a letter to The New York Times, criticizing its attack on CBS for "censoring" the social commentary on the Smothers Brothers show. He said:

"There is a world of difference between the deletion of program material by Government command and the deletion by a private party [such as a broadcaster]. . . . Deletion by Government command is censorship. . . . Deletion of material by private parties . . . is not censorship."

Another Times reader wrote in answer to Mr. Tower:

"Mr. Tower's distinction . . . is spurious. The essence of censorship is the suppression of a particular point of view . . . over the channels of the mass media, and the question of who does the censoring is one of form only. . . ."

He's right. The results are the same. You and I are equally kept in ignorance, ill-prepared to "prevent error," and to engage in the process of self-governing which Thomas Jefferson envisioned—regardless of who does the censoring.

A number of talented people within the broadcasting industry recognize its failings. One of the Nation's leading black announcers told me of his first job as a disc jockey. He was handed a stock of records, but forbidden to read any news over the air. Said his boss: "You're not going to educate the Negroes of this community at my expense." A high ABC network executive was recently quoted in the pages of TV GUIDE as saying, "There are many vital issues that we won't go near. We censor ourselves." Eric Sevareid has said of the pressures involved in putting together a network news show: "The ultimate sensation is that of being bitten to death by ducks." And the executive editor of the San Francisco Chroncile has warned: "The press is in danger. Not the exciting kind of Hollywood danger, but of dissolving into a gray mass of nonideas." For it is also a form of censorship to so completely clog the public's airwaves with tasteless gruel that there is no time left for quality entertainment and social commentary, no time "to give the people full information of their affairs." Mason Williams, the multitalented one-time writer for the Smothers Brothers, has left television in disgust and written a poem about his experiences with "The Censor," who, he says in conclusion: Snips out, the rough talk, the unpopular opinion, or anything with teeth, and renders, a pattern of ideas, full of holes, a doily, and for your mind.

Your mind. My mind. The mind of America.

The Rolling Stones said it long ago:

"When I'm drivin' in my car,
When the man comes on the radio,
He's tellin' me more and more
About some useless information . . .
Supposed to fire my imagination? . . .
I can't get no satisfaction!"

Many Americans are trying to say something to each other. But the media haven't been listening. And you haven't been told. So some have turned to violence as a means of being heard. All you've been shown are the dramatic pictures; you know there's "something happening." But, like the Everyman of Bob Dylan's song, "You don't know what it is, do you, Mr. Jones?" The "Silent Screen" of television has left you in ignorance as to what it's all about.

The time may soon come when the media will have to listen. From many directions come suggestions for change. Law professor Jerome Barron says the courts should recognize a "public right of access to the mass media." Free speech in this age of television, he believes, requires that citizens with something to say be permitted to say it over radio and television. Suppose you approach a television station with a "commercial" you have prepared either supporting or protesting the President's conduct of the Vietnamese war. It may no longer be sufficient for the station to say to you, "Sorry, we don't like your views, so we won't broadcast your announcement"—as a San Francisco station did last year to those trying to express their point of view regarding a ballot proposition! As the U.S. Supreme Court said a few days ago in the Red Lion case, upholding the constitutionality of the FCC's Fairness Doctrine:

"There is no sanctuary in the First Amendment for unlimited private censorship operating in a medium not open to all. Freedom of the press from governmental interference under the First Amendment does not sanction repression of that freedom by private interests."

It is too early to know the full, ultimate impact of this decision.

In Holland, any group that can get 15,000 persons to support its list of proposed programs is awarded free time on the Dutch Television Network for a monthly program. There is even an organization for tiny and often eccentric splinter groups without 15,000 supporters. If a similar experiment were conducted in this country, groups interested in electronic music, drag racing, handicrafts, camping, as well as the League of Women Voters, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, local school boards, theater and drama associations, the Young Republicans (and, who knows, even the Smothers Brothers), could obtain television time to broadcast programs prepared under their supervision.

Or each network might devote a full one-third of its prime time (6 P.M. to 11 P.M.) programming to something other than entertainment or sports. It could be nonsponsored cultural, educational and public-affairs programming. If the networks were required to stagger such fare, then at any given time during the 6 P.M. to 11 P.M. period of greatest audiences the American viewer would have an alternative, a choice. There would still be at all times two networks with the commercial-laden, lowest-common-denominator mass entertainment of situation comedies, Westerns, quiz shows and old movies. The third, however, would have something else.

It would be wholly inappropriate for me as an FCC Commissioner to insist that broadcasters present only the information, ideas and entertainment that I personally find compatible. The FCC does not have, and would not want, the responsibility for selecting your television programs. But it would be equally irresponsible for me to sit idly by and watch the corporate censors keep from your TV screen the full range of needs, tastes and interests of the American people.

The television-station owner, not the network, has ultimate responsibility for his programming. But somebody has to select his programs, you say, nobody's perfect. You're right. And all I'm urging is that, when in doubt, all of us—audience, networks and Government—ought to listen a little more carefully to the talented voices of those who are crying out to be heard. In short, I would far rather leave the heady responsibility for the inventory in America's "marketplace of ideas" to talented and uncensored individuals—creative writers, performers and journalists from all sections of this great country—than to the committees of frightened financiers in New York City. Wouldn't you? I think so.

I am delighted the networks have raised the issue of censorship in America. I hope they will permit us to discuss it fully.

[From the TV Guide, Sept. 20, 1969]

HE HAS EXERCISED HIS RIGHT—TO BE WRONG

(By Richard S. Salant)

Federal Communications Commissioner Nicholas Johnson's article in TV GUIDE ("The Silent Screen," July 5, 1969) is shocking, if true. It is just as shocking if it is not true. And as it relates to CBS News, it mostly certainly is not true.

Commissioner Johnson claims that, for economic reasons, broadcasters withhold information and suppress discussion of issues vital to Americans. Therefore, he concludes, broadcasters are hypocritically concerned about Government censorship, since the real evil is self-censorship arising out of broadcaster timidity and economic self-protection.

Much of Commissioner Johnson's article relates to broadcast journalism. To the extent that Commissioner Johnson deals with entertainment, I will leave to those responsible for that programming the task of examining Commissioner Johnson's accuracy, although the inaccuracy of his charges against television journalism raises serious questions about the rest of his charges.

But I can speak only in respect of broadcast journalism—and only for CBS News. And for CBS News, I state flatly that Commissioner Johnson is totally completely, 100 percent wrong—on all counts.

Let me start with the most general aspect of Commissioner Johnson's frightening world of fantasy.

In the 11 years I was a CBS corporate officer and in the six years, that I have been president of CBS News, to my knowledge there is no issue, no topic, no story which CBS News has ever been forbidden, or instructed directly or indirectly, to cover or not to cover, by corporate management. Corporate management at CBS has scrupulously observed that vital doctrine of separation of powers without which honest journalism cannot thrive—the separation between the corporation and an autonomous news organization.

Second, the separation between CBS News and the sales departments of the CBS radio and television networks and their advertisers has been complete. CBS News has no sales department. Its function is to choose the topics and stories and to prepare the broadcasts; the sales departments and the advertisers play no part in that process. No topic has ever been selected or omitted and no treatment has ever been affected, by the imagined or expressed wishes of an advertiser. Long since, the policy has been established that CBS News makes the broadcasts, and the advertiser makes and sells his products, and never the twain shall meet.

Third, there has been no self-censorship: I—and, to the best of my knowledge, my associates at CBS News—have never avoided a topic or altered treatment to protect, or to avoid displeasing, corporate management or any advertiser. As I have stated, anybody in the organization who avoided a topic or distorted his normal judgments in the treatment of a topic in order to avoid offending the economic interests of any advertisers, or to please CBS management, would thereby betray his professional heritage and would disqualify himself from working with CBS News.

"HIS BATTING AVERAGE TURNS OUT TO BE .000"

So much for the general principles. As far as I have gone to this point, the issue between Commissioner Johnson and me is, to the outsider, bound to be inconclusive: it is his word against mine, and I would not blame any third party who knows neither of us for giving the nod to the Commissioner, since I have a personal stake in my own reputation and the reputation of my CBS News associates and he at least appears to be a responsible, neutral Government official with the public interest at heart. So let us turn to each of the specific charges of suppression and avoidance which Commissioner Johnson advances to prove his general thesis. Taking them one at a time, the record shows he is wrong all along the line. His batting average turns out to be .000. At most, he proves himself to be a pitcher with more speed than control, rather than a hitter.

ITEM. Commissioner Johnson writes that "We have been shown miles of film from Vietnam, it is true. But how much has television told you about the multibillion-dollar corporate profits from that war?"

Plenty. We have included in our broadcasts the stories of Vietnamese corruption, of the operations of American business firms in Vietnam, and of war contractor costs. Example: Congressman Pike's disclosure of the sale to the Defense Department of $210 worth of generator knobs for $33,000. Example: a two-part report in June 1969 on Pentagon waste and overruns.

ITEM. Commissioner Johnson, stating that cigarette advertising "provides the largest single source of television's revenue," asks, "Would it really surprise you to learn that the broadcasting industry has been less than eager to tell you about the health hazards of cigarette smoking?"

"LONG BEFORE THE SURGEON GENERAL"

Well, if it did surprise you, it would only be because you have not been watching CBS News. We have dealt continuously and in depth with the health hazards of cigarette smoking, long before the Surgeon General got around to his report and long before Commissioner Johnson publicly decided to become concerned about the problem. We started 14 years ago, in 1955, in a two-part See It Now report. We broadcast a CBS Reports: "The Teen-Age Smoker" in 1962 and a special on Jan. 11, 1964, "On Smoking and Health," the day the Surgeon General's report was issued. On April 15, 1964, we broadcast CBS Reports: "A Collision of Interests," a detailed review of the issues raised by cigarette smoking. In our national health tests broadcast early in 1966, we again dealt with the hazards of smoking. We did another special hour-long broadcast in the beginning of 1968, "National Smoking Test" (about which Newsday's television critic commented: "It took courage on CBS's part to show the way. Especially since, as the program mentioned, the cigarette manufacturers are TV's largest advertisers. Viewers are in the network's debt"). We came back to the subject in The 21st Century series, in a broadcast entitled "The Wild Cell" (Feb. 2, 1969). We included stories in many of our other regularly scheduled broadcasts—for example, in Calendar on lung cancer and smoking in April 1962—and repeatedly we have covered in our regular news broadcasts all the developments—up to and including an interview on Thursday, July 3, with the current Surgeon General on cigarette advertising and the hazards of smoking. Since June 1963, our regularly scheduled news broadcasts have included 84 special film stories on cigarettes (including the showing of the American Cancer Society's antismoking film—in January 1967; and the attack by E. William Henry, then Chairman of the FCC, on television cigarette advertising—in March 1966).

ITEM. Commissioner Johnson refers to the "50,000 people who die each year on our highways" and then asks ". . . how many television stations told you—either before or after Ralph Nader came along—that most auto-safety engineers agree virtually all those lives could be saved if our cars were designed properly?"

I do not have a nose count of the number of stations. But, again, before the issue became very fashionable to discuss, CBS News did a one-hour preemptive, prime-time special May 13, 1966, "Crash Project—The Search for a Safer Car"—featuring Ralph Nader. If Commissioner Johnson's extremely selective perception has excluded that broadcast from his mind, I call to his attention this excerpt from a review in Variety, May 18, 1966:

"Of more significance, however, than the arguments pro and con on car design was CBS's lack of inhibition in confronting one of the giants of advertising and letting the chips fall where they may. Thus a direct comparison of two competitive makes was shown with a tester from Consumers Union detailing the faults in one car and extolling the virtues of another while identifying both by name. This is indeed strong stuff and certainly more than most of the newspapers of the country would do under similar circumstances."

And on auto safety, CBS News did not hit and run: we have gone back to the subject not only in our "National Drivers' Test" broadcasts but in 44 different reports in the Morning News and the Evening News since April 1965—dealing with the charges against the automobile industry and with the callbacks, including a demonstration of exactly what some of the defects leading to the callbacks were.

ITEM. Commission Johnson quotes Bryce Rucker as stating that "Networks generally have underplayed or ignored events and statements unfavorable to food processors and soap manufacturers. Recent examples are the short shift given Senate subcommittee hearings on, and comments favorable to, the 1966 'truth in packaging' bill and the high cost of food processing."

Wrong again—in our news broadcasts, we covered those hearings and included statements of consumer representatives and witnesses in support of the bill. We have reported stories relating to alleged abuses in food processing. Just a few examples: On March 24, 1969, in the Evening News with Walter Cronkite, we reported the FTC allegation that the Campbell Soup Company had been putting clear glass marbles in bowls to make its soup look thicker in television commercials. And we reported the story of the dangers involved in pesticides contaminating cranberry sauce; the story about the dangers of botulism in canned tuna fish and the mass recall of canned tuna; the unfit meat story as it developed; Ralph Nader's testimony attacking the standards of intrastate meat packers; and the Government action against the Colgate-Palmolive sandpaper commercial.

ITEM. Commissioner Johnson asks, "What could be more essential than information about potentially harmful . . . drugs?"

He just asks, he doesn't say that we didn't cover it. He was lucky because if he had said it, he would have been wrong. Time and time again, we have reported such stories as the thalidomide story, the FTC allegations relating to aspirin and Bufferin, the Government action against drug price fixing, the hearings on the excessive cost of drugs, including Italian cut-rating and American profiteering in Latin America, the charges relating to dangerous side effects of the birth-control pill, the FTC action against Geritol and Tums—both heavy advertisers with CBS. On July 9, 1969 (after Commissioner Johnson's article), we reported briefly on the recent reports of the National Academy of Sciences on the ineffectiveness of drugs and pharmaceuticals; we dealt with the subject in more detail two days later, on July 11.

ITEM. Commissioner Johnson states that television fails to report on corporate crimes, and he makes specific reference, although not by name, to an important case of price fixing.

If I can guess what price-fixing case Commissioner Johnson is talking about, we most certainly reported it.

ITEM. Commissioner Johnson writes about "the inherent dangers in cyclamates (the artificial sweeteners in soft drinks)" and implies that television's failure to cover that story results in the danger being "scarcely known to the average American."

Wrong again. On the Morning News of April 11, 1969, we did a piece, running 7½ minutes, concerning cyclamates, and we also reported the story in the Evening News.

"WE DID NOT IGNORE THE STORY"

ITEM. Commissioner Johnson seems to say (sometimes his pen is quicker than the eye) that we ignored the "black lung" disease story—the dangers to miners' lungs resulting from coal dust. The pattern is familiar: he is wrong; we did not ignore the story. We covered it in reporting the hearings in Washington and in West Virginia on the issue, and in a special broadcast on Feb. 11, 1969, entitled "Danger! Mines."

ITEM. Commissioner Johnson refers to the face that "one current sampling showed that 20 percent of the color-TV sets studied were emitting excess X-ray radiation." Again, he doesn't say so, but the implication is that we didn't cover it.

Wrong again: we did—as long ago as August 1967, when we reported that the Surgeon General called for action on such radiation.

ITEM. Commissioner Johnson states broadly that we avoid stories of "human death, disease, dismemberment or degradation."

Let him drop into my office some time and see the viewers' mail that comes across my desk complaining that that is all we ever talk about, and criticizing us bitterly for not emphasizing more good news. Was Commissioner Johnson otherwise occupied during our almost nightly Vietnam coverage, or when we broadcast such documentaries as "Harvest of Shame," "The Silent Spring of Rachel Carson," "The Tenement," "Christmas in El Barrio," "The Poisoned Air," "Men in Cages," "Hunger in America"? And our continuing series on one street in a Washington, D.C. ghetto, Columbia Road, on the CBS Morning News?

"HE IS WRONG ON EVERY ONE OF HIS SPECIFICS"

Commissioner Johnson finds it easy to make out a case by simply ignoring what we have done. His implication is that, in deference to advertisers, we stay away from any news unfavorable to consumer products. As we have just seen, he is wrong on every one of his specifics; we have covered each of the cases he mentions. And we have done other consumer stories as well which involved industry and network advertisers: for example, the housewives' boycott of supermarkets, protesting high prices; the gas-station game-and-prize practices; the dangers of flammable toys and clothing; toy guns and other warlike toys; the trading-stamp story; lumber-industry activities in the forests; the dangers of pesticides, automobile-insurance practices involving racial discrimination and arbitrary cancellation of policies; retail-credit abuses; automobile-warranty abuses; the dangers of cholesterol as a cause of heart and other diseases, caused by meat fats, butter fat, margarines and other shortenings and vegetable spreads.

And, of course, implicit in Commissioner Johnson's thesis is the charge that about the last thing we would ever do is report stories unfavorable to CBS or CBS News itself. But again, the facts are to the contrary: for example, we have reported the charges against television for its alleged violence and effect on juvenile delinquency. We reported the charges that CBS "staged" a pot party. We reported former Secretary of Agriculture Freeman's attack on the accuracy of the CBS News documentary "Hunger in America." And as to Commissioner Johnson's favorite subject, the Smothers Brothers, it was CBS News which, last fall, even before the storm broke, did a segment of 60 Minutes with the Smothers Brothers expressing their viewpoints about their role in television and their relationship to CBS; and it was CBS News which, on the day after their contract was canceled, included the only network interview with Tommy Smothers reacting to the CBS action.

As Commissioner Johnson says in his article, "One could go on and on." And the facts—about which one could go on and on—destroy the fantasy about which he goes on and on.

Others—perhaps more scholarly and careful than Commissioner Johnson—have examined the question of television news' integrity and independence, and have come to quite different conclusions. Thus, Herbert J. Gans, a sociologist who is making a long-range study of the mass media, stated (New Yorker, Aug. 3, 1968, page 55):

"Despite the old stereotype that media employees report the news as their owners and advertisers see fit, this is not true of national television and magazines, however true it may be of the local press. People who work in the media I have studied so far are surprisingly free from outside interference on the part of nonprofessionals and business executives, and can decide on their own what to cover and how to cover it."

It may well be that the Commissioner is too busy attending to his official duties, and making speeches, and writing articles, to permit him to know what really goes over the air. But Commissioner Johnson shows signs of not only that he has no time to look, but he also has no time or inclination to read. For one of his lowest and—most mistaken blows—comes in his invocation of Eric Sevareid as a witness to support his thesis. In a paragraph explicitly devoted to management and advertising interference and pressures, Commission Johnson states that Eric Sevareid "has said of the pressures involved in putting together a network news show: 'The ultimate sensation is that of being bitten to death by ducks.'"

Never underestimate the carelessness or the disingenuity of Commissioner Johnson. Eric Sevareid indeed said exactly that several years ago. But Commissioner Johnson could have seen from the Sevareid statement itself, or from checking with Eric directly, that Eric (see his letter to TV GUIDE, July 19) simply was not talking about management or advertising interference or pressures. Eric was talking about what plagues us all in television journalism and for which not even Commissioner Johnson can supply a solution: the cumbersome apparatus of television journalism, with all its cameras and lights and technicians and layers of personnel which are inherent in the complex nature of our method of transmission. Eric was contrasing this with the simplicity of a reporter or a writer for print who can sit in a corner by himself, type out his story and send it in. All Commissioner Johnson had to do was to read Eric's statement.

"THE ULTIMATE ISSUES—ARE IMPORTANT INDEED"

The ultimate issues which Commissioner Johnson raises are important indeed. They involve the independence and integrity of broadcast journalism, free of management interference and advertising pressures—and free too from Government dictation or coercive suggestion. I happen to think that Commissioner Johnson has some esoteric and erroneous notions about the First Amendment. (Incidentally, the credit he bestows upon himself and his associates as the champions of the First Amendment in the Commission's handling of the complaints concerning our political-convention coverage is not quite justified. The Commission's actions in that case were rather less noble and rather less sensitive to the First Amendment than its belated words. After all, the Commission transmitted every complaint that it received and required us to address ourselves to them—including hundreds that, only months later, it announced were not within its permissible authority.)

I also happen to think that the spirit, if not the letter, of the First Amendment would, at the very least, compel a man in his position—a Government agent who, through his licensing power, has the power of life and death over broadcasters—to be exceedingly careful and accurate when he undertakes public statements about what broadcast news does and does not do and what it ought and ought not do.

But, as I have stated elsewhere, the First Amendment includes the right to be wrong. Commissioner Johnson has certainly exercised that right.

[From the TV Guide, Sept. 27, 1969]

COMMISSIONER JOHNSON REPLIES

Let anyone who has watched prime time network television decide for himself. As Mr. Salant ["He Has Exercised His Right—To Be Wrong," Sept. 20] knows little of it is "news." As for TV news, it's not that it's done nothing; it's just too little too late. Walter Cronkite says, "We have barely dipped our toe into investigative reporting." Ed Murrow said, "(Corporate management) makes the final and crucial decisions having to do with news and public affairs." Many former TV newsmen agree. [See, e.g., book by Salant's predecessor in office: Fred Friendly, "Due to Circumstances Beyond Our Control."] Let's hope for equivalent candor from a future, noncorporate Dick Salant.

NICHOLAS JOHNSON,
Federal Communications Commissioner.

IS THERE A SALANT IN TV NEWS?

(By Nicholas Johnson)

I would like to address you as my friends—in this part of the business at least.

The fact is, I've tried to be helpful to television in every way I can. Tommy Smothers came to Washington and wanted to talk to some public officials and I agreed to see him. By the time he got back to Hollywood, the "Smothers Brothers Comedy Hour" had been cancelled. Dick Cavett asked me to come on his show, and I did, and now it's been cancelled. Then George Herman asked me to come on "Face the Nation," and after I did that the Louisiana Association of Broadcasters asked for equal time and five other state associations asked President Nixon to impeach me. So with such a demonstrated record as an adviser and performer in this business some are beginning to question my qualifications as a critic as well.

A few people think I've been critical of CBS news, but I haven't. If you look very carefully, I never said that they have a "salant" to their news. Their TV Guide articles maybe, but not their news.

Actually I thought it was kind of amusing that Big Television decided to send the president of CBS News to answer my article in TV Guide. Johnson, "The Silent Screen," TV Guide, July 5, 1969, p. 6; Salant, "He Has Exercised His Right—To Be Wrong," TV Guide, September 20, 1969, p. 10; Johnson, "Letter to the Editor," TV Guide, September 27, 1969, p. A–2. I've always thought that the news department is to television what the Senate Chaplain is to the Congress. And having CBS News recite from its newscasts as an answer to my charge that Big Television hasn't been doing its job seemed to me rather like sending out the Senate Chaplain to read from his opening prayers in answer to a charge that the Congress hasn't been providing adequate moral leadership.

I said that I consider myself a friend of broadcast journalism. I would like to read to you from a statement that I made to the Violence Commission in December, 1968—because it wasn't very widely covered in Broadcasting Magazine and you may very well not have heard about it. This was long before Dick Salant and I started slinging articles at each other and shortly after the Chicago Democratic Convention.

"News and public affairs is, by common agreement, American television's finest contribution. The men who run it are generally professional, able, honorable and hard-working. To the extent the American people know what is going on in the world, much of the credit must go to the networks' news teams. It's a tough and often thankless job. Eric Severeid has said of trying to do network news that the ultimate sensation is that of being eaten to death by ducks. These men have fought a good many battles for all of us with network management, advertisers, government officials, and news sources generally. We are thankful. And by and large I think we ought to stay out of their business—with the exception, perhaps, of providing them protection from physical assault. I would not for a moment suggest that either your Commission, or mine, ought to be providing standards for what is reported as 'news.' "

I stand behind that today. Let me just say that 90 percent of what I am complaining about is that television is not news—at least it's not when people watch, which is between 7:30 and 11:00 p.m., prime time. That's the problem. That's the censorship. And that's most of what I'm talking about. The rest of this is really shop talk about the problems in news, and the interference from management that there has been. Remember that the principal thing I'm talking about is that there is virtually nothing on in the evening that gives people the kind of information they need to understand what's going on in their world and in their lives.

Having put forth 90 percent of my case, let's spend the rest of the time in shop talk about electronic journalism.

There are many difficulties that you confront in trying to do your jobs, but one of the things I have been writing about is editorial and censorship control by management. This takes a variety of forms. The most important is the curtailment of the time that you're permitted to have. You simply cannot discuss major issues adequately in terms of minute-and-a-half clips on the evening news. And the question is: How much time are you getting for documentaries during the evening? How much time are you given to really probe the issues? Do you have enough men to really do the kind of job you'd like to do? And how much interference is there in the reporter's product on the part of editors who may be thousands of miles away with no first-hand knowledge of the story?

My thesis is a very modest and simple one. Management has the power. If it wishes to exercise it, to abuse the use of this medium by serving its own economic interests and the economic interests of its friends; it has the incentive to want to do this; and it has on occasion, done it.

Because there has been some disagreement about this seemingly obvious proposition, however, it seemed to me worthwhile to lay my cards on the table once again on this occasion.

Let me first say a word about sources. I didn't come into the FCC knowing anything about this business. I was the first to acknowledge that. What I know about abuses in the news business I know because you have told me, usually in confidence, sometimes in letters, more often in conversation. Some who have left the business have written books which I have read and quoted. There are some Congressional and FCC hearings and decisions. What other sources could I have than the people within the industry? So I'm not telling you what I think. To emphasize that point I am going to do quite a bit of quoting.

Let's start off with some general observations about the importance of what you do, because I have a commitment to the role of journalism in a free society. I have great confidence in the people of this country to govern themselves—once they are educated and informed. And I have seen the power that you have to inform the people.

One instance of this power that occurs to me just now is the black lung problem. If you go into the coal mines and breathe coal dust every day your lungs disintegrate, and you're not capable of doing much work by the time you reach your middle years. Coal miners, by and large, didn't know what was the matter with them, and they weren't getting any workman's compensation benefits. Programs had been offered to television stations in coal mining districts about black lung which they refused to show. One station did show one. It was cut off the cable television system carrying that station while the program was being shown. I commented on these omissions during my testimony before the Violence Commission. For whatever reason within a month or two thereafter, there was some coverage of the black lung problem on network television and local television. About two weeks after that coverage some 30,000 coal miners came out of the ground and organized, for about the first time in their lives, because the Union had not been doing as enthusiastic a job as it might have in representing their interests in this regard. About a month after that the West Virginia Legislature passed one of the first workmen's compensation benefit programs for miners who suffer from this disease. One of the networks bragged a little bit publicly—and rightfully so, I think—about its impact upon this piece of legislation. The point is, that's the power you have. I've seen policies in Washington change overnight because of a 90-second item on the evening news. You can take pride in what happens after you put such items on the air. But then you must also assume responsibility for what fails to happen when you omit such coverage for months or years.

Here's Lippmann writing in 1922: "It is because they [a self-governing people] are compelled to act without a reliable picture of the world, that governments, schools . . . and churches make such small headway against the more obvious failings of democracy, against violent prejudice, apathy, preference for the curious trivial as against the dull important, and the hunger for sideshows and three-legged calves. This is the primary defect of popular government, a defect inherent in its tradition, and all of its other defects can, I believe, be traced to this one."

This is Edward R. Murrow in his speech to you in 1958: "We are currently wealthy, fat, comfortable and complacent. We have currently a built-in allergy to unpleasant or disturbing information. Our mass media reflects this. But unless we get up off our fat surpluses and recognize that television in the main is being used to distract, delude, amuse and insulate us, then television and those who finance it, those who look at it and those who work at it, may see a totally different picture too late."

This is Jim Kunen in The Strawberry Statement: "I am of the opinion that the United States is involved in a controversial war in southeast Asia and that the country has other problems, too. I think people ought to at least think about these things. But I have noticed that the radio medium is a tremendous airy goofball, which anesthetizes everyone who listens. I'm curious about the motivation of people whose 50,000 watt pump pours such crap into the already polluted air." That's what one of the spokesmen for today's young people is saying about the industry. What's the answer? What is the motivation?

Let's look for the answer in this story told me by one of the leading black disc jockeys in this country. In one of his early jobs, going into a black-oriented station, the manager handed him the top 40 records and said, "Here, boy spin these." And he said, "Well, I'd like to put out a little news on the hour if you don't mind." And the manager turned around and said: "You're not gonna educate the nigras of this community at my expense." Maybe that's still management's motivation in some instances. I would never say it was in all. But the point is that the effect is precisely the same as if it were.

Edward R. Murrow thought the American people were capable of taking a great deal more than television provided them. I think so too. There are now some seven million young Americans in colleges and universities, nearly as many as all of the people in this country with college degrees. There are ten to twenty million Americans taking adult education courses. The federal government's own program has increased tenfold over the past five years. Book sales have doubled in the last ten years, to $2.5 billion last year, equivalent to the revenue of the very profitable television industry.

I have received hundreds of letters in the last few years, commenting about television. This is a handwritten letter from a lady in Kentucky: "I guess I'm what the TV companies might call the 'average housewive.' I'm not an intellectual, I'm not rich, I have children. I do my own washing and cooking. I suppose they feel that the kind of rubbish which is put out over the air is satisfying. It's repugnant for the most part."

Here is a letter from a couple out in California: "My husband and I . . . keep . . . hoping that programming will become more meaningful and worthwhile. We are not political activists, fanatics, crusaders, or even avid letter writers. We are just responsible Americans trying to live a meaningful life and do our best to raise the next generation to do the same. We realize the potential of the airways to bring us important information about our country's political, social, and international status, and also to bring our children learning opportunities, but are woefully disappointed with the efforts being made in these directions." And that's a theme that runs through thousands of letters that I have in my office.

Now we've been told recently that management has never involved itself in matters of news and public affairs. Let's see what some of you have had to say about this: Again Edward R. Murrow: "The top management of the networks, with a few notable exceptions, has been trained in advertising, research, sales or show business. But by the nature of the corporate structure they also make the final and crucial decisions having to do with news and public affairs. Frequently they have neither the time nor competence to do this." I don't know, but that's what Ed Murrow said. Howard K. Smith: "[I]f as many people listen to me on ABC as used to edit my copy on CBS, we'll have a large audience to build on." H. V. Kaltenborn: "Each time I criticized a Federal Judge . . . a labor leader (who supervised the company's labor contracts), or a Washington official (whose influence counted in the issue of a broadcasting license), one of the vice-presidents became frightened and protested."

Here's the Crosley case involving WLW Newsman Norman Corwin who was fired ultimately over this instance. This is an internal management memorandum to him: "No reference to strikes is to be made on any news bulletin broadcast over our stations." A couple of days later another one: "Our news broadcasts . . . will not include mention of any strikes. This also includes student strikes and school walkouts." He raised the question of whether this wasn't going to look a little funny to the people who read the newspapers, knew what was happening, and knew that radio wasn't mentioning it. They informed him at that point they could do without his services, although they had expressed great pleasure with him prior to that.

Or, how about the Richards case in Los Angeles? The fellow who owned KMPC there, WJR in Detroit, and WGAR in Cleveland set out on an abortive effort to elect General Douglas MacArthur as President. He fired Clete Roberts, his news director, because he referred to the age of the General, which the owner felt might detract from his political appeal. The FCC was besieged thereafter with a package of affidavits from numerous radio newsmen about Richard's instructions to slant, to distort, and to falsify the news. At this time Chet Huntley was heading the newsmen's organization out on the West Coast.

We learned quite a lesson from the ABC–ITT hearing about the attitude of large corporate management toward the integrity of the news. One of the questions in that hearing was: Would ITT ever try to interfere with ABC's news judgment? ITT professed great purity in this regard. And yet, while a hearing was being conducted on this issue, the Wall Street Journal broke the story of the pressure that ITT was putting on the reporters covering that very hearing. An AP and UPI reporter testified to several phone calls to their homes by ITT public relations men asking them to change their stories and to make inquiries for ITT with regard to stories by other reporters, and to use their influence as members of the press to obtain confidential information for ITT from the Department of Justice regarding its intentions. A New York Times reporter was asked by a senior vice president of ITT whether she'd been following the stock prices of ABC–ITT, and whether she did not feel a responsibility to the shareholders who might lose money as a result of what she wrote. He also implied that she had an obligation to pass information on to her management because, since The New York Times owns radio station WQXR they would, of course, want to serve their own economic interests in the reports that she put in the paper. This was, for me, a very unsettling experience.

All we had written in the first ABC–ITT dissenting opinion was that there was still a possibility that something like this might happen. We never dreamed that it could happen in that very case. It seemed to me ITT had demonstrated an abrasive self-righteousness in dealing with the press, an insensitivity to its independence and integrity, a willingness to spread false stories in furtherance of self-interest, contempt for government officials as well as the press, and an assumption that even as prestigious a news medium as The New York Times would, as a matter of course, want to present the news so as to serve its own economic interests as well as the economic interests of other business corporations. The Columbia Journalism Review subsequently reported: "ITT harassed reporters covering Washington hearings on the merger; ABC News often sounded as if its stories about the merger were dictated by management. Journalism can be relieved that two such managements did not get together." (Let me say I do not personally share this interpretation of the ABC News' stories, but we must all be impressed that it was the conclusion of this very professional and prestigious journal.)

There are a number of examples of instances in which radio and television have not given fair treatment to issues involving management's own interests in matters such as cable television and pay television. There was a fairness complaint in 1965 involving a station's coverage of a local CATV issue, and the "Fairness Primer" makes reference to unfair treatment of the pay television issue on one of the networks.

One of the things you have to recognize is the economic value of being able to control the news. How do you put a price tag on it? One of the things you can look at is how much people are willing to pay to kill stories. In 1871 Boss Tweed went to The New York Times in an effort to suppress an expose of the Tweed gang, and offered them $5 million to kill the story. Since then there's been a little inflation. If it was worth $5 million to kill a single story in 1871 it might very well be worth $20 million to buy a single station now—particularly if it can return a 100 percent return on depreciated capital every year.

A network official on the news side has stated publicly, "We've gone after the common denominator. There are many vital issues that we won't go near. We censor ourselves." That was from an article. This is from a confidential letter. I get a number of these examples from you newsmen, complaining about what's happening to you in the business. I think that this letter is worth reading. After going through many, many examples of Vietnam coverage, coverage of Nixon and other officials, this newsman concludes his three-page single-spaced letter: "These are but a few of the examples that I know of personally. There are many more. Some "Censorship" may, of course, result from honest differences of opinion between correspondent and producer on what is news and the proper way to present it. But it would be stretching credulity to the breaking point to suggest that much of what we see (at least at [his network]) is not simply pusillanimous self-censorship aimed at keeping 'news' programs sufficiently bland so that no one is offended . . . and certainly not disturbed."

This is the Chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee writing in 1956: "Broadcasting stations should not be simply house organs grinding out the tune of big business interests which own them—and there is some evidence that this is a real danger today." This is Edward P. Morgan: "It is one thing to mourn Yates' death in gallant pursuit of duty in the highest tradition of the fourth estate. It is quite another to admit how unkempt those traditions have become through neglect, and the pursuit of profit more than the pursuit of truth. Ted Yates did not duck and he lost his life. The freest and most profitable press in the world, every major facet of it, not only ducks, but pulls its punches to save a supermarket of commercialism or shield an ugly prejudice and is putting the life of the republic in jeopardy thereby."

Another report from the Columbia Journalism Review: "in radio and television there is even less candor on consumer topics than in magazines." And I will say in credit to CBS, they go on to say: "CBS is far ahead of the field in tackling sensitive consumer topics. But even the CBS list is not very long."

This is from Senator Phil Hart in a statement to the Cooperative League of the USA, later published in the January 1965 issue of Consumer Reports. Senator Hart told of the cancellation of his scheduled appearances on television to discuss truth-in-packaging legislation. As he stated: "I was told advertisers had objected."

Professor Harry Skornia has alleged: "In case after case it appears that the broadcast industry itself has firmly blocked release to the public of certain facts. Although this blockage sometimes has been on behalf of the political party in power, or the military, with which large corporations are closely allied, most of it seems related to the financial and profit interests of corporations controlling broadcasting, either as station or network operators, sponsors, or a part of the business community generally, as opposed to the over-all national interest."

Here's another comment from Mr. Skornia: "The press might render . . . a great service . . . if it let the public know how things stand between say, the copper companies and Central America. Or the oil companies and the Middle East. In the broadcast area, questions might be raised regarding the pressures exerted on the United States government by fruit, oil, sugar, tobacco, and other companies with investments in Cuba since Castro's rise to power. Why are these enormous problems so little discussed in view of the overwhelming importance they have in making United States foreign policy?"

Here's another confidential letter to me from a correspondent who is presently employed by a network: "My story on what was then the largest operation of the war . . . came back to me minus references to evident ineffectiveness of bombing raids [which were] later admitted by military officials."

This is from the Cornell Law Review: "Broadcasters, both individually and in court, have traditionally avoided controversial programming because sponsors are hesitant to become even subliminally associated with opinions disagreeable to potential purchasers." And the Review refers to "mercenary self-censorship by the broadcasting industry."

Here's an article by a man who's still in the business: "I heard on the grapevine that producers at all three networks were working up plans for a major series on "The Cities." Had the news department suddenly gotten religion? Of course not. The Institute of Life Insurance, the public relations arm of the insurance companies in America were—under pressure from President Johnson—investing one billion dollars in the nation's slums. An excellent way to bring this fact to the public, of course, was through sponsorship of a television documentary on the problem. All three networks were asked for 'treatments.' "

A current issue of Variety magazine told how one major sponsor was given the opportunity of selecting which documentaries he would like to be associated with. A list of 120 was made up and from that a list of 30 was presented to him. A process of self-censorship is at work even in the selection of the titles presented to the company involved. Such items as, "Revolution in Sex Education," and "Whatever Happened to Privacy?" had the potential of developing into forthright controversial shows if given the chance by the sponsors. Predictably, however, those two were not to its taste. While the sponsor accepted the idea of a show on railroads, the title "Death of the Iron Horse" was changed because the sponsor did not want to take "a negative point of view." The new working title was "Golden Age of Railroads," expressing the more positive approach desired by the sponsor. And the sponsor not only altered the title but the program concept as well by this change.

Here's another quote from one of your members: "The television documentary producer must fight . . . the pressures from advertisers and sales departments. More often than not, he has been fighting a losing battle." This is Jack Gould: "Television, to be blunt about it, is basically a medium with a mind closed to the swiftly moving currents of tomorrow. The networks and stations have erected an electronic wall around the status quo." Alexander Kendrick: ". . . [T]he television industry is more than a fortunate sector of the free enterprise system. Because it deals in ideas and images as well as in cosmetics and cigarettes, it is wittingly or unwittingly an instrument of the Establishment, that complex of governmental, political, economic and psychological forces that, even when some enlightenment intrudes, is dedicated to the preservation of the status quo. . . ."

More examples? This again from Skornia. "In late 1963 the American Civil Liberties Union noted that CBS excluded a song satirizing the John Birch Society from the Ed Sullivan program because it would have been, 'too controversial,' [a problem that was recently echoed with the controversy over the Smothers show]. In 1964, NBC vetoed a program on venereal disease that had been carefully prepared for the Mr. Novak series to help the nation recognize this tragic and dangerous threat to the youth of the world." Edward R. Murrow: "I invite your attention to the television schedules of all networks between the hours of 8:00 and 11:00 p.m. Eastern time. Here you will find only fleeting and spasmodic reference to the fact that this nation is in mortal danger." And some comments by Alexander Kendrick: "Gaugin in Tahiti, the re-creation of the voyages of Ulysses, or essays on women, doors and bridges—even driving, boating and science tests—merely underline the fact that commercial television has failed to treat adequately such questions as the Vietnam war, America's policy in Asia, pacifism, the worldwide traffic in arms, Church versus State, the right of dissent, the police use of force, Congressional ethics, the New Economics, stock market speculation, or a dozen other important matters which would have been standard operating procedure for Murrow and Friendly with See It Now and CBS Reports. In the 1968 election year, the electoral system itself, obviously in crisis, was discussed in no serious way on any network."

Alexander Kendrick further writes, "During a two month period in 1967 . . . the three commercial networks had three 'prime time' documentaries, An Essay on Women, The Royal Palaces of Britain, and Thoroughbred, A Stud Farm Chronicle. In this same period, newspapers and magazines dealt in depth with the fall of Congressman Adam Clayton Powell, the row about the Manchester book about the assassination of President Kennedy, the conviction of Bobby Baker . . . and the dispute about new Federal safety rules for manufacturers. Even prior publication in the New York Times provided no warranty for such stories on television. They were kissed off with brief daily reports in the evening newscasts."

This is from one of the judges of the Emmy Awards who watched all of the news documentaries that were presented by the networks. These were, presumably, the cream of the cream, the best that the networks were capable of presenting. He watched them for two full days, and he wrote: "Yet for all the Vietnam films, the riots, the politics, how little we had seen of the world in twenty-two hours. There was nothing about American or foreign education, nothing about de Gaulle or France, nothing about Franco's Spain, about gold and money, Cuba and South America, the Communist Bloc, Sino-Russian relations, nothing about drugs and sex. Everything was made with a high degree of technical competence; nothing was boring; but how little we had learned, how infrequently I had been moved."

And let's consider that early show on the hazards of cigarette smoking, which Mr. Salant mentioned with such pride in his TV Guide article. Fred Friendly says that CBS and the sponsor, Alcoa, became upset because the tobacco industry buys air time and aluminum foil, and that these controversies as well as others were the cause of the death of "See It Now."

Take some of these issues that are very close to the television industry right now and ask yourself how many documentaries you have seen or are likely to see on these subjects: The Pastore bill which would in effect give lifetime licenses to broadcasters; the questions surrounding news staging; the standards of broadcast programming that are applied; the quality of the new fall shows; the impact of television on children or adults; documentaries about the quality of advertising, and about deceptive advertising; documentaries on broadcast station license challenges by public groups around the country; the importance of accurate reporting to a democratic society; the process of election of public officials and the role of media and the funds that are needed to make that possible and therefore the political power of this industry; the process by which you put together a news program; or the TV set radiation hazards.

Ed Morgan again: "Let's face it, we in the trade use this power more frequently to fix a traffic ticket or to get a ticket to a ball game than to keep the doors of an open society open and swinging, by encouraging honest controversy, or, if you'll pardon the term, crusading for truth and justice. There is enough wrong in this republic to merit a full-scale expose daily, if not every hour on the hour. But newspapers run prize contests to lure readers or keep the ones they have. Broadcasting is driving thoughtful citizens away in droves by fertilizing the wastelands of the airwaves with the manure of utter mediocrity. The situation is so bad that the commercials, even in their saturation, are often better than the programs they support."

Here is an advertisement from a network. I won't identify it. It's very proud of what it's putting out next fall. Well in the back, as one would suspect, is the section on news specials. What are we promised as we look into the fall of 1969 and early 1970? What leadership, what information, are we going to get from this network? And remember, this was not written by Jack Gould. It was written by the advertising agency servicing the network. The West of Charles Russell's artistic genius, presented in all its rousing color, fury, grandeur, and simple humanity." You'll have to wait until January 7th at 10:00 p.m. for that one. "Eskimos: A Report on the Eskimos Ancient Traditions." No date has yet been fixed for that one. Finally, the one they lead with—that they are most proud of. Here in a way is television's attempt to report on the "vast wasteland." It is called, simply, "Sahara." "Shifting and changing yet constant and enduring—this is the vast, searing Sahara Desert. Journey along with us as a modern-day caravan travels across these ancient sands to discover the Sahara's many moods and intriguing secrets. 7:30 p.m., December 19th."

I put it to you. Do you really feel in your hearts that those are the three most important issues that the American people need to know about this next year? If so, I really have made a big mistake and I'll go home. No, I think you kind of feel with me that management could have given you a little more time to deal with a few other subjects than these.

Here's another comment from Ed Morgan, who seems to feel the same way, "The honestly concerned citizens, right, left and center are the nuclei, not of black power or white power but positive power which can make representative government work. But their power has not been sufficiently turned on because the press has been too busy neuterizing the news to clear comfortable, non-controversial space for the full-page ads and the singing commercials."

Now we come to the question of what the industry does, what management does, what the Washington representatives do, to help out the news people when they have problems. Do they really fight the free speech battle? I say the answer to that is no.

Alexander Kendrick: "There is nothing novel in the fact that networks should be subject to pressures. What is distressing, as Murrow found out in his time, is that they should so often yield to them. . . . [T]he networks have called wolf many times before, and have too often stigmatized as 'thought control' the attempts to get them to redeem their public service obligations. They have equated freedom of speech with freedom from criticism." Ed Murrow said: "One of the minor tragedies of television news and information is that the networks will not even defend their vital interests."

For some examples, let's talk about the Pacifica cases. I think they're as good an illustration as any. When the license renewal for the California stations came up, in FCC Chairman Henry's time, a real First Amendment issue was posed because there were people who objected to the content of what Pacifica was putting out. There was a real question as to whether their licenses were going to be renewed or revoked because of that controversy. There was not a single voice raised on Pacifica's behalf. Not a single resolution from the state associations, not a single speech, not a single amicus brief filed by counsel. Where were they?

Last December it came up again, and that great spokesman for First Amendment freedom, Broadcasting Magazine, ran a little item pointing out that Pacifica's Los Angeles station, KPFK, in the early morning had broadcast a song that had an allegedly profane line in it, and suggesting that the license really ought to be held up. And it was, while that charge was investigated. Or how about the protests in New York over the reading of an alleged anti-Semitic poem over WBAI? Broadcasting Magazine this time editorialized against WBAI. It had gone beyond its First Amendment protective freedom; it should be punished by the FCC. On the same page it editorialized about the First Amendment rights of the broadcasters to run cigarette commercials unrelieved of any information to the American people about the health hazards of cigarette smoking. That's how management stands behind the First Amendment. It seems considerably more interested in profitable speech than free speech.

In the "Pot Party" case which CBS was involved in, I thought there was some language in the FCC's opinion that befuddled rather than helped in understanding and dealing with the problem of staged news events. I felt that you were entitled to a straighter and better statement of what was going on. I said in my opinion that we're going to test right now how much the industry cares, because if it cares, it can easily appeal this case. We'll watch and see if it will. It didn't. Variety has written: "It has been made clear here, in a number of ways that the ordinary broadcaster—the publisher of the airways—is willing to surrender still more of his First Amendment freedom for the promise of perpetual license to do business. At gunpoint, and given the choice of "your money or your life" the ordinary citizen promptly yields up his money. Not so the broadcaster."

Dick Salant answered my charges of "corporate censorship" with a personal assault and a catalog of news items and documentaries over the past decade or so. I was given about 100 words in which to answer his six page article. For once I really knew how television newsmen feel when they're told to describe the problems of the world in anything up to forty-five seconds. Here's what I wrote:

"Let anyone who has watched prime time network television decide for himself. As Mr. Salant ["He Has Exercised His Right—To Be Wrong," Sept. 20] knows, little of it is "news." As for TV news, it's not that it's done nothing; it's just too little too late. Walter Cronkite says, "We have barely dipped our toe into investigative reporting." Ed Murrow said, "(Corporate management) makes the final and crucial decisions having to do with news and public affairs." Many former TV newsmen agree. [See, e.g., book by Salant's predecessor in office: Fred Friendly, "Due to Circumstances Beyond Our Control."] Let's hope for equivalent candor from a future, noncorporate Dick Salant."

This statement is an effort to elaborate a bit on that letter. It is deliberately long, filled with examples, and dependent upon the statements of those in broadcast journalism who seemingly disagree with Mr. Salant. I think their observations, opinions and experiences are entitled to greater weight than my own.

These comments are not intended as a criticism of television journalism. I repeat, as I said at the beginning, that I believe it to be televisions finest hour—or perhaps I should say half hour. The principal problem with "television" in America is that so little of it is devoted to news—or anything else that matters—not that the little that deals with reality is done poorly. The faults that I do find with television journalism I believe to be more the responsibility of management than of working newsmen. But these faults do exist. And we can never promote the improvements that we all seek in this profession—you as much or more than I—so long as Big Television management is unwilling to be candid enough to acknowledge what those of you who work in this business have repeatedly said are the facts.

PREVENTIVE DETENTION I: OR STANDING ROOM ONLY

HON. ABNER J. MIKVA

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Speaker, the Honorable Tim Murphy, Judge of the D.C. court of general sessions, testified before the Judiciary Subcommittee considering preventive detention. He contended that if full-scale pretrial hearings were held in all cases involving "dangerous defendants," as provided for in the administration's preventive detention bill, even the D.C. court reform bill might not provide enough judges to handle the additional workload. I believe that preventive detention will be no boon to justice—only a boon to the population of already overcrowded jails and overloaded court dockets.

Judge Murphy's observation deserves the attention of my colleagues. Preventive detention is not something to blithely accept as a solution to pretrial crime control. The possibility that such schemes would both violate the cardinal principle of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence—innocent until proven guilty—and overburden an already overburdened criminal court system should end the applause for preventive detention and stimulate hard thinking.

One who has thought hard about criminal justice is Mr. Geoffrey C. Hazard, Jr., the executive director of the American Bar Association and a professor of law at the University of Chicago Law School. In an aticle entitled "Epilogue to the Criminal Justice Survey," Professor Hazard outlines the failures of our criminal justice system, as determined by the American Bar Foundation's survey of the administration of criminal justice. The foundation, located on the campus of the University of Chicago, has just completed an impressive review of criminal law administration in three major cities.

One problem he cites is the lack of professional involvement in the average case, where total time spent by police officer, prosecutor, magistrate, and probation officer is probably less than 5 hours—and, the hearing in court less than 5 minutes.

Professor Hazard also makes sense out of the problem of "law and order," which he properly says "is not so much an anarchistic conspiracy as an accumulation of public neglect. As soon as we can abandon the search for a scapegoat—whether the police, the Supreme Court, youth unrest or the black man—we may get down to the serious business or organizing a system for the prevention of violence that will work over the long pull."

Mr. Speaker, the serious business of safeguarding the community against the allegedly dangerous accused is providing speedy trials—not slowing down trials with preventive detention. The prevention of violent crimes by the accused will be achieved by swiftly trying the accused and surely punishing the guilty—not by incarcerating the accused and teaching him the tools of the criminal trade.

Because Professor Hazard cuts through much of the loose talk about criminal justice, I commend his article to my colleagues.

The article, "Epilogue to the Criminal Justice Survey," which appeared in the November 1969 issues of the American Bar Association Journal, follows:

EPILOGUE TO THE CRIMINAL JUSTICE SURVEY

(By Geoffrey C. Hazard, Jr.)

The American Bar Foundation's Survey of the Administration of Criminal Justice will be completed next month with the publication of Professor Frank Miller's Prosecution: The Decision To Charge a Suspect with a Crime, to be published by Little, Brown & Company. This volume and its four companions[1] report and analyze information gathered in a field study of criminal law administration in three major cities. Although the primary data are ten years old, continued monitoring and more recent studies show that the basic problems remain mostly unchanged.

No study of such a complex subject can be "definitive" in the sense of exhausting the subject. The main findings of the survey, nevertheless, are quite clear. These include:

The wide discretion officials have in enforcing the criminal law, raising questions about the premises and objectives involved in their exercise of discretion.

The ambitious goals of our criminal law (including public security and private civil liberty, uniformity and individualization, bodily safety and purity of morals), raising questions about community purpose.

The autonomy of law enforcement agencies, raising questions about the identity and responsibility of law enforcement "authority" itself.

The fact that achieving a high conviction rate is not necessarily the central aim of criminal law administration, raising questions as to its other purposes.

These findings generally correspond to those made thirty-five years ago by the Wickersham Commission and two years ago by the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, which says how difficult it is to bring about fundamental improvement in so important a legal institution. The Foundation survey, however, made a special contribution in describing the administration of criminal justice as an interrelated system. However disjointed, the various institutions that were the subject of the survey have systemlike attributes. Common to all of them is the offender—the man and his file that move through the maze. Common also is a recognition by the official participants that their activities are interrelated. Every operative in the system—policeman, prosecutor, judge, correction officer—one way or another takes into account the probable response of others in the system to whatever action or decision he undertakes.

A SYSTEM COMPOSED OF BALKANIZED AGENCIES

Recognizing that the agencies of criminal law are a system is one thing; putting the lesson into practice is another. The agencies of criminal justice are still balkanized, sealed off from each other by boundaries of legal jurisdiction, political allegiance and budgetary responsibility. There is an almost complete lack of over-all management or coordination.[2] At the same time, performance specifications are pursued or imposed in one part of the system without reference to their impact on other parts. The due process explosion emanating from the Supreme Court is a much-debated illustration—the police are required to increase the procedural quality of their performance without being provided the resources to do so. But the police insistence that the "clearance rate" is the relevant measure of their performance reflects a similarly incomplete analysis. The public is not served by a high solution rate simply on crimes that the police know about.

In broader perspective, the efforts to deal with the problem of crime are hampered by the tendency of each agency to pursue its own ends oblivious of the interests of other agencies and of the aggregate effect on criminal law administration. Now that Congress at last has interested itself seriously in the problem of criminal law administration, we see it making the same kind of mistake. The Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 contemplates massive augmentation of police resources without corresponding increases in the capacity of prosecution offices, criminal courts and corrections agencies to handle the new "business" increased police forces presumably will generate. These kinks sooner or later may be ironed out, but there will be a good deal of distress and confusion before that goal is realized.

The survey also permits us to see that the administration of criminal justice is a "system" from the point of view of its "customers"—the criminal offender, the potential criminal offender and the public-at-large. The aim of the criminal law is to protect society from serious domestic evils. This goal is achieved in part by the moral condemnation implicit in criminal prohibitions and in part by punishing those who violate the prohibitions. But beyond these measures there is an educational and demonstrative function of the criminal law system. Law enforcement officials are models—and in this sense teachers—of what proper behavior ought to be. This is the simple, but profoundly important basis for responsible concern about "police brutality". Each unnecessary use of the billy-club, each racial slur, each instance of officiousness is a lesson of some kind to someone. The lesson to be learned from this official miscreancy is surely not one that we want taught.

All were published by Little, Brown & Company, 34 Beacon Street, Boston, Massachusetts 02106.

[2] In a few localities, specifically Los Angeles, some real advances have been made toward remedying this situation, but such efforts are exceptional.

At the time the survey data were collected, there seemed to be little overt official brutality in the communities studied, testimony to the efforts of the agencies to do a professional job. That probably was true in most parts of the country at the time and, again with some important qualifications, appears to be substantially true today. However, the incidence of what might be called "psychic" brutality is widespread. A good deal of this is attributable to the personal and educational characteristics of people who are drawn into law enforcement work, and some of the callousness is no doubt the consequence of the abrasions they suffer while performing tough and exasperating jobs. But the survey indicated something else for which society has to take responsibility. At dozens of points, with a repetitiveness that settled into monotony, the system was ignorant, indifferent or abrupt with the people with whom it was dealing simply because there were too many cases, involving too many people, being handled by too few officials with too little time to do a decent job.

It is not merely that the police, the prosecutors and the magistrates have to make rapid decisions on the basis of inadequate information and insufficient reflection. Even when the objective circumstances would have permitted some kind of pause, the resources were not available to make use of it. It is now notorious that the policeman's arrest decision is a complicated choice made on the spur of the moment. But the same problem exists in the prosecutor's office, where the files whiz by the hasty perusal of a junior deputy and go past a senior deputy at an even faster rate. It repeats itself again in court, where the cases are served up to an overworked magistrate for drumhead treatment. What kind of a system of justice is it in which the aggregate professional involvement in the average case, including police, prosecutor, magistrate and probation officer, is probably less than five hours and the final judgment that society makes—the hearing in court—takes less than five minutes? And what shall we say of antiriot procedures that pit police against crowds too large for them to handle with low-key techniques?

In light of these facts, the "breakdown of law and order" is not so much an anarchistic conspiracy as an accumulation of public neglect. As soon as we can abandon the search for a scapegoat—whether the police, the Supreme Court, youth unrest or the black man—we may get down to the serious business of organizing a system for the prevention of violence that will work over the long pull.

The Foundation survey has helped the legal profession become more aware of the weaknesses in criminal justice—the law's central institution. The criminal law is the pillar of the administration of justice, representing the most serious of society's legal concerns and the most sensitive of its legal processes. The legal profession has always claimed a special responsibility for it. What the survey has told the legal profession is what Justice Jackson, who inspired the study, had suspected it would: that the real significance of the criminal law is not so much its doctrinal refinement but its "delivered value"—its practical reality, day-on-day, year-on-year, at the level of enforcement.[3]

In this perspective, the processes of statutory reform and judicial law making appear as guidelines for social action rather than action itself. Having propounded a criminal law to which we say we are committed, are we prepared to take the public action that will make it a reality? It pleases us to moralize through the medium of the criminal law. It may be more appropriate, however, for us to ask what kind of social protection is worth having. Let us hope the legal profession can help our society confront that question.

A HEALTHY STEEL INDUSTRY

HON. THOMAS M. REES

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, there has been a great deal of interest these past two sessions in the legislating of a steel import quota. Most of the speeches have discussed the terrible plight of the steel industry—its sinking sales and profits, and high unemployment.

I would like to have included in the RECORD the following statement concerning United States Steel which reports the best 3d quarter improvement, a record 41.6-percent profit gain on an 8.8-percent advance in sales.

My hope is that those who wish to legislate quotas will read the following report carefully:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Oct. 29, 1969]

UNITED STATES STEEL NET SPURTED 41.6 PERCENT IN THIRD PERIOD—IMPROVEMENT IS BEST SO FAR REPORTED BY MAJOR MILLS—SALES HAD 8.8 PERCENT ADVANCE—POOR 1968 QUARTER NOTED

PITTSBURGH.—U.S. Steel Corp. turned in the best third quarter earnings improvement so far reported by a major steelmaker, racking up a 41.6% profit gain on an 8.8% advance in sales.

The nation's largest steel producer earned $46.8 million, or 87 cents a share, in the September quarter, up from a restated $33 million, or 61 cents a share, a year earlier. Sales rose to $1.17 billion from $1.07 billion. The 1968 net income figure is restated to reflect the change to straight-line depreciation accounting from accelerated accounting. The change raised the figures from the earlier-reported $11 million, or 21 cents a share.

The steelmaker's third quarter results benefited from comparison with a 1968 quarter in which steel operations and sales plummeted following the 1968 labor contract agreement of last August. Customers who had built up steel stockpiles in anticipation of a strike, cut buying sharply in August and September last year.

The earnings also benefited to some extent from the major price increases that U.S. Steel initiated and competitors followed early in August this year. However, the company said the September quarter "for the most part" didn't reflect those price increases. The company explained that the price boosts weren't effective for the whole quarter and some, in fact, aren't effective yet.

The third quarter results also reflected what steel men say was one of the strongest summer sales seasons in years, lacking the normal sharp slump. U.S. Steel said its steel mill shipments in the period totaled 5.5 million tons, up from 4.9 million tons in the 1968 quarter.

U.S. Steel's third quarter profit increase topped those posted by major competitors. Fourth-largest National Steel Corp. scored a 25% gain in September quarter earnings; No. 3-ranked Republic Steel Corp. had a 24% increase; Armco Steel Corp. registered a 17% advance and Inland Steel suffered a 32% decline. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., a unit of Ling-Temco-Vought, Inc., had a freakish six-fold profit increase from the extremely depressed 1968 quarter. However, it still termed its earnings poorer than earlier expected.

The industry's second-largest producer, Bethlehem Steel Corp., is expected to report third quarter earnings today.

The improved third quarter helped U.S. Steel cut its year-to-year lag in profit for the nine-months. Nine-months net income was $150.9 million, or $2.79 a share, off 26.6% from the year-earlier restated $205.6 million, or $3.80 a share. Nine-month sales fell 2.5% to $3.52 billion from $3.61 billion. U.S. Steel's first-half profit fell almost 40% from the 1968 half.

Robert C. Tyson, chairman of the finance committee, said the lower nine-month earnings were due to reduced shipments; a "substantial increase" in hourly-employment costs under the industry's labor contract; higher prices on purchased goods and services; higher interest charges and increased state and local taxes.

"Shortages of skilled labor in certain areas, compounded by the need for summer-vacation coverage, and the impact of our vast facility modernization program moving through expected costly initial stages of production also were contributing factors," Mr. Tyson added.

The big steelmaker said its nine-month production totaled 16.6 million tons, down from 17.8 million tons in the year-earlier period.

Giving evidence of a slowdown in capital spending, U.S. Steel said outlays for plant and equipment in the September quarter were $153 million, down from $222 million a year earlier. Outlays in the nine months dropped to $460 million from $504 million. As of Sept. 30, authorized projects yet to be completed totaled another $965 million.

BIG TRUCK BILL

HON. FRED SCHWENGEL

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 1, 1969

Mr. SCHWENGEL. Mr. Speaker, my editorial for today is from the Providence Journal in the State of Rhode Island. The editorial follows:

POTPOURRI

The American Automobile Association and other passenger-car oriented groups are voicing concern about efforts by the trucking industry to get wider, longer, and heavier trucks on the nation's highways. A relaxation of federal controls, it is felt, will lead to relaxation of state controls—with unhappy results for passenger car drivers.

It's not our point to get into the merits of the case for bigger trucks. But perhaps the AAA could kill two birds with one stone by urging Washington to pave the right-of-ways of major railroads and give trucks of all sizes exclusive use of the new roads—with the understanding that trucks would not use existing major highways. Anyone listening?

SENATE—Tuesday, December 2, 1969

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a.m. and was called to order by the President pro tempore.

The Chaplain, the Reverend Edward L. R. Elson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal Father, keep us this day inwardly in our souls and outwardly in our actions, in tune with infinite and eternal values. Make us to be of good courage, to hold fast that which is good, to render no man evil for evil, to strengthen the faint hearted, support the weak, help the afflicted, honor all men, and ever to love and serve Thee. Lead us by Thy wisdom and when the evening comes and our work is done, grant us the rest of the just. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, December 1, 1969, be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order entered on yesterday, the Chair now recognizes the Senator from Colorado (Mr. DOMINICK).

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield for some very brief unanimous-consent requests, with the understanding that he will not lose his right to the floor?

Mr. DOMINICK. I yield.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator.

LIMITATION ON STATEMENTS DURING TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that statements in relation to the transaction of routine morning business be limited to 3 minutes, and that the morning business not exceed 1 hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE MEETINGS DURING SENATE SESSION

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that all committees be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Colorado is recognized for 20 minutes.

THE SONGMY INCIDENT—TRIAL BY PRESS

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. President, I am taking the floor today—and I appreciate the courtesy of the leadership in giving me this time—to raise once again the issue of fair trial versus trial by press.

The first amendment to the Constitution does not allow trial by press. The denial of the basic right of any person, whether in or out of uniform, to a fair trial is a right guaranteed under our Constitution.

I spoke last week of the possibility of prejudice or bias which could result from publication of interviews of prospective witnesses in the so-called Songmy massacre. I am speaking now of evidence presented in the form of statements of alleged witnesses or participants and photographs and judgments by the press. I am speaking of trial by press in a most explosive, emotional, alleged atrocity in Vietnam.

Mr. President, only a handful of events in our Nation's history, because of their national significance or sensational aspects, have received such extensive coverage. Only a few of these cases have subjected our legal system to the strain present in the Mylai case. The shock of the alleged atrocities struck at me and at the very conscience, I am sure, of every American, and another tragedy may be at hand.

Life magazine published yesterday a story, complete with alleged eyewitnesses, headlines, full-page color photographs, and a judgment. Newsweek and Time followed suit, and ended a weekend in which this country was deluged, through the major newspapers and TV broadcasts, by recaps, repeats, and republication of every statement made to date by almost everyone.

The Life magazine article—through pictures and selective statements from almost every witness—presents a case and decides. It renders a judgment of what happened and who was involved. It should be clearly pointed out at this point that none of these statements was made under oath, no cross-examination took place, and there has been no legal identification of the photographs, either as to location or as to the actual people who were supposed to have committed the crimes which were evident in the photographs. The pictures, in fact, not only may be inflammatory, but also, they otherwise may be inadmissible at the trial. So there is no due process in this article, but there certainly is judgment.

Other pictures were published and other interviews reported. The Cleveland Plain Dealer was credited along with others in the Life article, for one; but the Life article was the most sensational and renders a specific judgment on what happened. Life conducted a trial by press within its own covers. The net effect of other publications approaches this ultimate prejudice, but none was quite so blatant.

Mr. President, coming so late, this article serves no purpose, so far as I can see, of furthering justice or fixing legal responsibility for the alleged atrocities. It serves no public need to know nor any watchdog philosophy of the press. Its only apparent value is to retrieve a return of Life's investment of some $40,000 paid or to be paid to a former Army photographer who put the pictures up to the highest bidder.

I might add, Mr. President, that this photographer, so far as I can understand, was an official photographer, was on duty, turned over black and white photographs, but did not turn over the colored photographs. These were not processed in Vietnam, so far as anybody can determine, and there has been no legal identification of those pictures with any of the persons who have been charged—at least, up to date.

What has been the result of this? I have received a great deal of mail, and I am happy to say that a good deal of it has been very favorable. But I also have received a great deal of mail arising out of the speeches I made last week, in which people have already prejudged the events. People say, "Punish them. Don't do anything about a fair trial. Punish them. Put them to death."

What kind of an explosive atmosphere have we created, under our legal system, with this type of trial by press? What they have said about me is of minor importance. The general feeling, however, seems to be, in most of these "anti" letters—I say they are not a majority, but there are a substantial number—that I was trying to cover up something, simply because I was asking the press to let our judicial system work and not to prejudice the case by further activities than they have published already.

I have referred to the $40,000 paid by Life for these pictures, and I must say that I am appalled by the profiteering going on by at least some of the individuals intent only on cashing in on a hot story before it cools. According to Mr. Haeberle, himself, he received an offer to sell these pictures on an exclusive basis overseas for $100,000, and then he decided he wanted more than that, when they were actually the property of the Army and should have been there for trial purposes when identified. It is my understanding that he got approximately $40,000 or $45,000.

Other money has been paid—$20,000, we were told, by CBS to Dispatch News for the so-called exclusive interview. Just yesterday, a member of my staff was called by Dispatch News with reference to asking me to write an article, under my name, for a Sunday package to be peddled on a 60–40 commission basis. I do not know whether I was to get the 60 or he was to get the 60. But all I can say is that this is the kind of "garbage" I referred to in my statements last week.

The December 5 issue of Time states as follows:

> Inevitably, there were those who, while not denying the deed, felt it would be better left untold. After a G.I. witness described on television what he had seen at My Lai, Colorado Senator Peter Dominick asked: "What kind of country do we have when that kind of garbage gets put on the air?"

My statement was, of course, taken out of context, and the garbage I was referring to was the sensationalism that was building up in the news media without regard to the need and right for fair trial. Thus sensationalism bloomed in full flower this weekend and yesterday.

Time magazine, by quoting me out of context, implied I wanted the incident left untold. To the contrary, it is because of the gravity of this incident and my concern that the full story be told that I spoke out. I attacked the airing of interviews with prospective witnesses with no apparent concern for their rights. I objected to reporting that goes beyond news reporting and exploits sensationalism to outsell its competition. I object strongly to trial by press. I had hoped by speaking out last week that the media would cease publication of extrajudicial statements by potential witnesses. I had hoped that trial by press would not occur, that a fair trial could be held as required under our legal system, and that the news media, including the broadcast segment, would undertake to follow this course on their own responsibility and exercise their own balancing of values in this case.

But it seems every story must be more sensational than the last. Only a few news services, newspapers, magazines, and individuals will realize a profit. The people of this country may be the real losers.

The trial court last week tried to halt this trend of the press so that a fair trial could be held. One can look at the statement of the court as a plea or a threat but the comments take on added significance today. It would appear that the confidence of the court that the news media would police themselves to insure the fairness of the proceedings seems poorly misplaced after just 6 days. The court stated:

As I understand the previous military press release, this case was under investigation. Thus, I can understand how responsible news media did not deem it improper to assist the military in furthering its investigation.

We are now past that stage of the proceedings. I agree completely with counsel that further news contact with witnesses and premature out of court disclosure of testimony would be in violation of law.

On the other hand, I am reluctant to issue any show cause order immediately to prohibit publicizing the testimony of potential witnesses. I believe the responsible news media are capable of policing their own activity and will self-impose the necessary sanctions to insure that the fairness of these proceedings are not jeopardized. Therefore, I am declining the request of counsel today to issue a show cause order. A reasonable time will be granted the news media to act in a responsible legal manner. And, I am confident you will find that witnesses will not be contacted further by any responsible news agency. The issue will be held in abeyance at this time. with leave to counsel to re-petition this court for relief at any later time.

Mr. President, that was in reply to a petition from the defense counsel and the prosecuting attorney. It is one of the few times in my life, in a murder case I have ever heard of both sides petitioning the judge to ask the media to be more objective and to tone down their own disclosures.

What has happened after 6 days? Yesterday, for the second time, the trial counsel and defense counsel jointly petitioned the U.S. Military Court of Appeals for an injunction against the media from further publication of statements of witnesses and prejudicial materials. A unique case has been presented to this appellate court. It is certainly one of first impression. A decision is to be rendered today. There are certainly problems of jurisdiction. Beyond the mere problem of enforcing such an order across the country, basic constitutional issues are involved. To my knowledge, no such order of such scope has ever been entered. But then only a handful of cases in our history have received this type and extent of exposure. And I repeat freedom of the press does not permit trial by press. The line is drawn there.

Mr. President, the New York Times published an article yesterday reporting on the appeal that I referred to before the U.S. Military Court of Appeals. They asked for an injunction against CBS, NBC, ABC, the New York Times, the Washington Post, the Atlanta Constitution, the Atlanta Journal, the Columbus (Ga.) Ledger, the Columbus Enquirer, Time-Life Corp., Newsweek magazine, United Press International, the Associated Press, and Dispatch News Service.

This indicates the scope of the re-publication and sensationalism which they felt was prejudicing the right of a fair trial. It is particularly pertinent to note that it is the State of Georgia itself that they asked the media to be enjoined because that is where the panel of jurors is located which will be determining the fate of the individuals charged. That panel is as much subject to influence and prejudice as anyone else in this country, be they man, woman, or child, be they in the military, or be they ordinary civilians.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the article referred to printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. President, it would be my guess, and all I am doing is guessing, that the military court will reject this request and the issue will be taken to the Supreme Court.

The concern of the trial court last week was simple. This was an attempt to regain a rational atmosphere so that a fair trial could be held. This was my only concern last week. I am not critical of the press for reporting news, but they go too far when interviews of potential witnesses are carried on nationwide TV, when these interviews are re-published in newspapers all across the country over and over, and when a nationwide magazine publishes photographs of a highly inflammatory, and, I might add, revolting nature, most likely inadmissable at trial.

We are heaping one tragedy on top of another. It seems that when the story is this big only the press is big enough to try it. We seem to say our legal system cannot be trusted to develop the facts. I want to make myself very clear. I do not want to be misunderstood, even out of context. I want even Time magazine to be able to get it right. This story could have been reported without eyewitness statements, unverified photographs and sensationalism. A fair trial could have been held and this matter investigated thereafter by any congressional committee, special commission, or any other group, in case the people thought all the facts had not been brought out.

It is not necessary to emasculate the rights of individuals charged with serious crime or those who might be charged in this incident.

It seems to me this country is one of the few, if not the only country in the world which would in effect put itself on trial. We actually filed charges against our own servicemen before the news media entered the case.

As a matter of fact, the Army published a release, which was picked up by the AP on September 6, pointing out that Lieutenant Calley had been charged with murder. This was over 2 months before the press started going and they said the military was trying to hide it under a rug. This seemed self-evidently false to me.

That trial would be in a courtroom based on evidence and facts. The trial would be public. The basic constitutional rights of the defendants would be protected. We may now be unable to have that trial because of the very fairness and impartiality we require under our Constitution. In that event, we not only will have failed to protect the rights of individuals charged with crimes, we will have allowed our legal system to fail in its duty to protect the freedoms of all the people. That is the second tragedy.

In the name of "free press" we may doom this incident to unproven rumors and infamy, leaving our political bones, for those who chose, to pick over.

It will not appease our national conscience if we fail to make our system work now. It could then be said that our system of government cannot function under severe stress. We may find we have established that in a case of extreme national significance, the courts and our judicial system have no role to play. The right of fair trial and due process must give way to the overriding freedom of the press, even when that freedom is exercised to usurp the functions of our courts. I do not believe that. Our system is strong. It can function properly. But it has no defense against sensationalism by the media in a case like this. We have faced moral crises in the past. We must do so this time. We must each shoulder our responsibilities—including the press.

This event marks a tragic and unfortunate chapter in the history of this Nation. We can only hope that its ending is not so dismal as its beginning and the last few days. It has called into question the character of our people, our Government, the press and, finally, our belief in freedom and justice for all people.

Mr. President, I ask, once again, that the press begin to exercise some restraint so that we can get at the true facts, so that we can develop them in a trial, and so that those charged will have their constitutional rights defended and we can determine and fix responsibility for what seems to be a horrendous and horrible tragedy for the Nation as a whole.

EXHIBIT 1

BOTH SIDES IN CALLEY TRIAL ASK SONGMY PUBLICITY BAN

(By E. W. Kenworthy)

WASHINGTON, December 1.—The prosecution and the defense in the pending court-martial of First Lieut. William L. Calley Jr. asked the United States Court of Military Appeals today to ban all further pre-trial publication and broadcast of statements and photographs concerning the alleged massacre at Songmy, South Vietnam, on March 16, 1968.

The court took the petition under advisement.

In the opinion of lawyers interviewed here tonight, such a total nationwide ban on the publication of any statement concerning an alleged eyewitnesses or any other person, would be without precedent.

Some lawyers expressed doubt that the court, if it is guided by recent rulings of the Supreme Court in relevant cases, would grant such a blanket injunction.

In their petition to the three-judge civilian court, Maj. Kenneth A. Raby, who is Lieutenant Calley's military defense counsel, and Capt. Aubrey M. Daniel 3d, who is the trial counsel, or prosecutor, asked that the requested injunction remain effective until the first witness testifies at the court-martial.

The decision to court-martial the lieutenant was announced a week ago by Maj. Gen. Orwin C. Talbott, commanding general at Fort Benning, Ga., where Lieutenant Calley is stationed. The lieutenant will be tried on six specifications charging him with murder of 109 men, women and children "without justification or excuse." The date of the court-martial has not been set.

Maj. Raby and Captain Daniel asked that the injunction sought against pretrial discussion of the case be extended "to all radio and television networks and stations, newswire services, newspapers and magazines operating or otherwise doing business in the United States."

But the two attorneys specifically asked the enjoining of the Columbia Broadcasting System, the National Broadcasting Company, The New York Times, The Washington Post, The Atlanta Constitution, The Atlanta Journal, The Columbus (Ga.) Ledger, The Columbus Enquirer, the Time-Life Corporation, Newsweek magazine, United Press International, The Associated Press, and Dispatch News Service.

The last-named, a small service handling free-lance journalists, distributed one of the first stories of the alleged massacre.

CLIPPINGS AND TRANSCRIPTS

In support of their argument that such an injunction was necessary "to protect the constitutional rights" of Lieutenant Cally, the prosecution and defense attorneys submitted to the court two thick loose-leaf books in which has been pasted clippings from newspapers and magazines.

The lawyers read only one clipping to the court—from a Chicago paper. But they showed the judges copies of this week's Life magazine, which contains nine photographs—eight color and one black-and-white—allegedly taken at Songmy on March 16 by Ronald L. Haeberle, who had been a staff photographer attached to Company C, 1st Battalion, 20th Infantry, 11th Light Infantry Brigade.

Several of these photographs had been shown to the Senate and House Armed Services Committees last Wednesday by Secretary of the Army Stanley R. Resor.

Included in the two books of clippings were nine articles and columns from The New York Times plus two articles by Times reporters and one by a Times columnist that appeared in other papers subscribing to The New York Times News Service.

The first article from The New York Times was a four-paragraph Associated Press dispatch from Fort Benning last September, quoting the announcement of post authorities that Lieutenant Calley had been charged with murder in the deaths of an unspecified number of persons. That report was based on a news release issued by the post information officer.

THREE ORDERS SOUGHT EARLIER

Last Tuesday, November 25, Major Raby and Captain Daniel asked Lieut. Col. Reid W. Kennedy, the military judge at Fort Benning, for three orders.

The first would have prohibited prospective witnesses from pretrial disclosures of their prospective testimony. The second would have directed the named military jurors not intentionally to read or listen to news accounts of the alleged murders. The third would have prohibited the news media from further publication of statements by any individual purportedly connected with the alleged massacre, or the reproduction of pictures of the alleged massacre.

The judge complied with the first two requests but held in abeyance the request for an order to the news media, saying that this raised constitutional questions of freedom of the press. The media, the colonel said, should be given a "reasonable" time to show that they could "act responsibly."

Last Friday, Nov. 28, the judge held a closed meeting with opposing counsel, at which time, according to their petition today, they again requested an order to the news media. The lawyers buttressed their argument with "additional evidence," they said.

At that time, according to the two lawyers, Colonel Kennedy "concluded that the spirit of his order to potential witnesses were being wilfully violated by local and national news media," and entered certain findings.

The first of these, the lawyers said in their petition today, was that "the possibility of prejudice to the defendant's constitutional right of a fair trial is real and apparent."

WITHDRAWAL FROM VIETNAM

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, an interesting commentary was published in the Boston Globe on November 28, 1969, written by Robert Healy, entitled "A Case for Withdrawal." It refers to the Song My situation.

There is a great deal of food for thought in Mr. Healy's comments. I invite the attention of the Senate to his last sentence:

Those soldiers who squeezed the triggers do not bear all the blame.

Mr. President, truer words were never written.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the commentary by Mr. Healy printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A CASE FOR WITHDRAWAL

(By Robert Healy)

There never was a better argument for getting out of Vietnam than Song My village. It tells it all.

It tells about the problems of the United States getting mixed up in Vietnamese civil war.

It tells about the difficulties of the United States soldier operating under this set of circumstances.

It tells of the fear of the American G.I. who must operate where men hoeing the rice fields of the Mekong Delta in the daylight hours are the Viet Cong terrorists and the enemy when the sun goes down.

It tells about the innocents—the women, the children, the old. In the areas which are exchanged weekly and monthly between the Viet Cong and the South Vietnam government units, they must survive. And the massacre of Song My shows that, for them, even survival is difficult.

One must understand, to begin with, that there are really two kinds of war being fought in Vietnam. In the northern part of South Vietnam near the Demilitarized Zone and along the Cambodian border, it is a war to stop infiltration of men and supplies from the north. This war is fought largely in jungle terrain. It is a war where the U.S. military is pitted against the guerrilla units.

But the war in the Mekong Delta is another thing. The Mekong is the breadbasket of all Vietnam. It produces from its fields large quantities of rice. The people here are mostly farmers. They live in the small villages or on their land.

Here in the Mekong, South Vietnam rebels—the Viet Cong—have operated against the government of Saigon for years. They have held certain villages all of that time. Saigon's appointed province chiefs have learned to do business with the Viet Cong leaders. Even now, for instance, reporters have been told in Vietnam that to travel to the village of Song My would be dangerous because it is considered enemy territory.

The farmers in the Delta area are in no position to protect themselves. And neither the regular South Vietnam ARVN troops nor the U.S. troops can secure this area from the Viet Cong.

The reason goes back to the man behind the hoe in the rice fields by day, who goes out at night to collect taxes and bounty in the villages for the Viet Cong. Is the American soldier to gun him down during the day, or is he to wait until night where the guerrilla soldier has the advantage and where it takes three or four and possibly more regular soldiers to operate against him effectively? Song My, as terrible as it may sound, is the military solution to Vietnam. Then there is nothing for the victor or the vanquished. And a military solution to Vietnam cannot be tolerated. The American conscience will tolerate no more Song Mys.

There is public debate both at home and at the congressional level about soldiers involved in this massacre. One senator even condemns those who have brought Song My to the Attention of the American public.

But Song My should be discussed and clearly understood by everyone in the United States because it is the microcosm of the whole Vietnam war.

The government and the military should be concerned with what happened at Song My. But they should be more concerned even with the cause of Song My.

It is not enough for our leaders to say that we are in Vietnam and we must accept it. We should not accept it. If there was error in the first commitment then that must be corrected.

And it should be corrected quickly before there is any more involvement of United States soldiers in another Song My.

Those soldiers who squeezed the triggers do not bear all the blame.

COMMITTEE MEETINGS DURING SENATE SESSION

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that all committees be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NATIONAL MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY ACT AUTHORIZATION, 1970–72

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 554, H.R. 10105.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be stated by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. H.R. 10105, to amend the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966 to authorize appropriations for fiscal years 1970, 1971, and 1972, and for other purposes.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments, on page 1, line 8, after "1970,", strike out "$35,000,000" and insert "and $40,000,000"; in line 9, after the word "year", strike out "1971, and $35,000,000 for the fiscal year 1972.'" and insert "1971. Of the sums appropriated for fiscal year 1970 pursuant to the preceding sentence, $2,800,000 shall be available only for the employment of additional personnel for service in the National Highway Safety Bureau to carry out the provisions of the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966."; on page 2, after line 5, strike out:

SEC. 2. Section 102(4) of the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966 (15 U.S.C. 1391(4)) is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and the following: "and any protective helmet or headgear manufactured, offered for sale, or sold for use by drivers of, and passengers on or in, motor vehicles."

And, in lieu thereof, insert:

SEC. 2. Section 102(4) of the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966 (15 U.S.C. 1391(4)) is amended to read as follows:

"(4) 'Motor vehicle equipment' means any system, part, or component of a motor vehicle as originally manufactured or any similar part or component manufactured or sold for replacement or improvement of such system, part, or component or as any accessory, or addition to the motor vehicle, and any device, article, or apparel not a system, part, or component of a motor vehicle (other than medicines, or eyeglasses prescribed by a physician or other duly licensed practitioner), which is manufactured, sold, delivered, offered, or intended for use wholly or in part to safeguard motor vehicles, drivers, passengers, and other highway users from risk of accident, injury, or death."

On page 3, line 9, after the word "Act", insert "in the following manner—"; in line 12, after the word "resale" insert "at each location where any such manufacturer's vehicles or items of motor vehicle equipment are offered for sale by a person with whom such manufacturer has a contractual, proprietary, or other legal relationship in an appropriate manner which may include, but is not limited to, printed matter (A) available for retention by such prospective purchaser and (B) sent by mail to such prospective purchaser upon his request;"; in line 23, after the word "purchase," insert "in printed matter placed in the motor vehicle or attached to or accompanying the item of motor vehicle equipment."; on page 4, after line 4, insert:

(b) Section 113(c) of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(c) The notification required by subsection (c) or (e) shall contain a clear description of such failure to comply with applicable motor vehicle safety standards or defect, an evaluation of the risk to traffic safety reasonably related to such defect, a statement of the measures to be taken to repair such failure or defect, and the commitment of such manufacturer to cause such failure or defect to be remedied without charge."

At the beginning of line 15, strike out "(b)" and insert "(c)"; at the beginning of line 19, strike out "(c)" and insert "(b)"; on page 5, line 1, after the word "records," insert "including procedures to be followed by distributors and dealers to assist manufacturers to secure the information required by this subsection which will not affect the obligation of manufacturers under this subsection."; after line 15, insert:

"(g) If—

"(1) any motor vehicle (including any item of original motor vehicle equipment) or tire is determined by the manufacturer under subsection (a) to contain a defect which relates to motor vehicle safety; or

"(2) any motor vehicle or item of motor vehicle equipment is determined by the Secretary under subsection (e) to contain a failure to comply with applicable motor vehicle safety standards prescribed under this title or a defect which relates to motor vehicle safety; and the notification specified in subsection (c) is required to be furnished on account of such failure or defect, then—

"(A) the manufacturer of each such motor vehicle presented for remedy pursuant to such notice shall cause such failure or defect in such motor vehicle (including any item of original motor vehicle equipment) to be remedied without charge; or

"(B) the manufacturer of each such other item of motor vehicle equipment presented for remedy pursuant to such notice shall cause such failure or defect in such item of motor vehicle equipment to be remedied without charge. If a manufacturer can establish to the satisfaction of the Secretary that a failure to comply with an applicable motor vehicle safety standard is of such an inconsequential nature that the purposes of this title and the public interest would not be served by requiring the applicable manufacturer to remedy such noncompliance, the Secretary may, upon publication of his reasons for such finding, exempt such manufacturer from the requirements of this subsection with respect to such failure.

On page 6, at the beginning of line 20, strike out "(g)" and insert "(h)"; at the beginning of line 23, strike out "(d)" and insert "(e)"; in the same line, after the word "subsection," strike out "(b)" and insert "(c)"; in line 25, after the word "subsections," strike out "(a) and (c)" and insert "(a), (b), and (d)"; on page 7, line 23, after the word "be," strike out "retarded" and insert "retreaded"; at the top of page 8, strike out:

SEC. 7. Title III of the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966 is amended to read as follows:

"TITLE III RESEARCH AND TEST FACILITIES

"SEC. 301. (a) The Secretary of Transportation is authorized to plan, design, and construct (including the alteration of existing facilities) facilities suitable to conduct research, development, and compliance and other testing in traffic safety (including highway safety and motor vehicle safety), except that no appropriation shall be made for any such planning, designing, or construction involving an expenditure in excess of $100,000 if such planning, designing, or construction has not been approved by resolutions adopted in substantially the same form by the Committees on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and on Public Works of the House of Representatives, and by the Committees on Commerce and on Public Works of the Senate. For the purpose of securing consideration of such approval the Secretary shall transmit to Congress a prospectus of the proposed facility including (but not limited to)—

"(1) a brief description of the facility to be planned, designed, or constructed;

"(2) the location of the facility, and an estimate of the maximum cost of the facility;

"(3) a statement of those agencies, private and public, which will use such facility, together with the contribution to be made by each such agency toward the cost of such facility; and

"(4) a statement of justification of the need for such facility.

"(b) The estimated maximum cost of any facility approved under this section as set forth in the prospectus may be increased by the amount equal to the percentage increase, if any, as determined by the Secretary, in construction costs, from the date of the transmittal of such prospectus to Congress, but in no event shall the increase authorized by this subsection exceed 10 per centum of such estimated maximum cost."

And, in lieu thereof, insert:

SEC. 7. (a) Title III of the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"SEC. 304. The Secretary of Transportation is authorized to plan, design, construct, and operate facilities suitable for conducting testing of motor vehicles and items of motor vehicle equipment necessary to determine (1) whether such motor vehicles and items of motor vehicle equipment are in compliance with applicable motor vehicle safety standards established under this Act, and (2) whether such motor vehicles and items of motor vehicle equipment contain any defect which relates to motor vehicle safety.

"SEC. 305. (a) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated $10,000,000, to remain available until expended, for planning and design of traffic safety (including but not limited to motor vehicle and highway safety) research and test facilities, including engineering studies and site surveys.

"(b) There is authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $8,200,000, to remain available until expended, to plan, design, and construct facilities authorized by section 304 of the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Act of 1966. There is authorized to be appropriated for the operation of the facilities authorized by section 304 of such Act not to exceed $3,500,000, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1971 and $3,500,000, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1972, of which not to exceed $1,500,000 shall be available in each fiscal year for the purchase of motor vehicles and items of motor vehicle equipment to be used in the operation of such facilities."

(b) The heading of such title is amended to read as follows:

"TITLE III—RESEARCH AND COMPLIANCE TESTING FACILITIES".

On page 10, line 20, after the word "Transportation", insert "(hereinafter referred to as the "Secretary")"; in line 22, after the word "than", strike out "April 1, 1970," and insert "January 1, 1971,"; on page 11, after line 21, strike out:

(c) In order to facilitate the prompt completion of this report, officials of other Federal departments or agencies shall make available to the Secretary, upon his request, any data or information in their possession relating to agricultural tractor accidents and shall otherwise provide assistance.

And, in lieu thereof, insert:

(c) In order to facilitate the prompt completion of such report, the Secretary of Agriculture, with the assistance of officials of other Federal departments or agencies possessing data or information concerning agricultural tractor operations and accidents, shall submit to the Secretary by June 30, 1970, his findings and recommendations with respect to the report required by this section. Such findings and recommendations shall be considered by the Secretary and incorporated where appropriate in his report to the Congress.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 91–559), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PURPOSE

H.R. 10105, as amended, would authorize the appropriation of $23 million for fiscal 1970, of which $2,800,000 is to be available only for the employment of additional personnel, and $40 million for fiscal 1971, for the implementation of the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966. It would also amend the act in several respects. A summary of these changes follows:

(1) The bill would broaden the definition of "motor vehicle equipment" presently contained in the act in order to enable the Secretary of Transportation to set minimum safety standards for the manufacture of wearing apparel and other devices which are not a part of a motor vehicle, but which are intended for use to safeguard motor vehicles, drivers, passengers, and other highway users from the risk of accident, injury, or death.

(2) It would make clear that the Secretary of Transportation has the authority to require a motor vehicle manufacturer to provide performance and technical data to prospective purchasers of motor vehicles or items of motor vehicle equipment at each location where such manufacturer's vehicles or items of motor vehicle equipment are offered for sale.

(3) It would amend the defect notification provisions of the act in order to place manufacturers of tires under an obligation to provide notification to purchasers of tires which are found to contain a safety-related defect or which fail to comply with applicable motor vehicle safety standards. Tire manufacturers, therefore, will assume a legal responsibility which is comparable to that which presently exists for manufacturers of motor vehicles.

(4) The bill would provide that whenever notification is required to be furnished because of a failure to comply with applicable motor vehicle safety standards or because of a defect which relates to motor vehicle safety, the manufacturer of each motor vehicle (including any item of original motor vehicle equipment) or each other item of motor vehicle equipment presented for remedy pursuant to such notice shall cause such failure or defect to be remedied without charge. It would further provide, however, that if a manufacturer can establish that a failure to comply with an applicable motor vehicle safety standard is of such an inconsequential nature that the public interest would not be served by requiring the applicable manufacturer to remedy such noncompliance, the Secretary of Transportation may exempt such manufacturer from the compulsory remedy requirement with respect to such failure.

(5) It would add to the annual report provisions of the present act an additional requirement that the Secretary of Transportation include in his annual report a statement of enforcement actions including judicial decisions, settlements, or pending litigation which arose under the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act during the period covered by the report.

(6) The bill would require the Secretary of Transportation to establish safety standards setting maximum limits on the age of tire carcasses which can be retreaded.

(7) It would authorize the Secretary of Transportation to plan, design, construct and operate a compliance test facility, and it would authorize the appropriation of $8,200,000 for this purpose. The bill would also authorize the appropriation of $3,500,000 for fiscal 1971 and 1972 for the operation of the compliance facility and the purchase of motor vehicles and items of motor vehicle equipment for testing purposes.

(8) The bill would authorize the appropriation of $10 million for the planning and design of traffic safety (including but not limited to motor vehicle and the highway safety) research and test facilities, including engineering studies and site surveys.

In addition, the bill would authorize the Secretary of Transportation to conduct a study and to submit a report to the Congress by January 1, 1971, on the causes and means of prevention of agricultural tractor accidents on both public roads and farms.

NEED

Motor vehicle accidents are one of the major causes of death in the United States today. In 1938, over 55,000 Americans died on our Nation's highways—more than have lost their lives in the entire Vietnam war. In addition, an estimated 2 million persons are seriously injured each year in motor vehicle collisions. The total direct cost due to injury and property damage resulting from motor vehicle accidents has been estimated by the National Safety Council to exceed $11 billion annually.

These additional grim statistics forcefully demonstrate that in motor vehicle deaths this country faces a destructive problem equal in size and complexity to other social ills such as crime, disease, and poverty;

Highway injuries exceed by 10 times all violent criminal acts combined, including homicides, armed robbery, rape, riot, and assault.

Motor vehicle crashes rob society of nearly as many productive working years as heart disease and of more than are lost to cancer and strokes. Only about 1 out of 5 man-years of life lost to heart disease is in the age interval between 20 and 65; in contrast, 7 out of 10 man-years of life lost in motor vehicle accidents are in the productive years between 20 and 65.

It was in response to statistics such as these that Congress in 1966 enacted the comprehensive traffic safety program which is incorporated in the Highway Safety Act of 1966 (Public Law 89–563) and the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966 (Public Law 89–564). And, notwithstanding the overwhelming loss of life still being sustained on our highways, the effectiveness of these programs for improving motor vehicle crash survivability and highway safety is already demonstrable. In the 5 years preceding the passage of the two safety laws, highway deaths were increasing at an average rate of 6.9 percent each year. This has been reduced to 2.3 percent in the past 2 years, a significant accomplishment in the face of increasing total mileage, increased average speeds, and increases in the number of vehicles and young drivers (leaders in high fatality rate) on the road. Had the previous average rate of increase in highway fatalities continued, the 1968 death figure would have been 5,000 individuals higher.

More detailed evidence is being gathered through in-depth accident investigation and the analysis of mass accident data which indicates that the injury reducing devices required by existing motor vehicle safety standards, such as energy absorbing steering columns, high penetration resistant windshields, and safety belts, may already be paying a significant return in the reduction of fatalities and the severity of injuries. For example, several independent studies have measured the effectiveness of safety belts (even with their low rate of usage) in preventing fatalities. When applied to the national statistics, these studies indicate an estimated saving of 2,500 to 3,000 lives in 1968. Similarly, the energy absorbing steering column, which is designed to reduce driver injury in crashes that cause the driver's chest and head to hit the steering assembly, has apparently reduced fatalities in certain types of crashes by as much as 70 percent.

Although these examples indicate that the potential reduction in highway deaths and injuries which will result from improved motor vehicle safety feature is great, the impact of the new effort to reduce nationwide casualty statistics may be slower than originally hoped. In 1968 relatively few automobiles were equipped with the new safety features. Even in 1975, almost 60 percent of the pre-1968 automobile population—automobiles that have not been subject to any new car safety standards—will still be in use. Moreover, unless the Federal Government begins giving greater priority to the funding and personnel requirements of the motor vehicle safety program, even the newer model vehicles will fail to provide the full measure of safety which can reasonably be demanded of them.

At the present time the National Highway Safety Bureau has a 3- to 4-year backlog in rulemaking actions. Major safety improvements such as the air bag restraint system, increased side impact protection, roof strengtheners, energy absorbing front ends, functional bumpers, and improved rear lighting systems are all still in the discussion stage. Statutory dates for the establishment of a uniform quality grading system for tires and the issuance of used car safety standards have already passed with no action. But still the legitimate staffing needs of this vital safety program continue to be neglected.

In the amended version of H.R. 10105, the committee, by increasing the House authorization for the motor vehicle safety program for fiscal 1971 by $5 million, and by earmarking $2,800,000 of the sums appropriated in fiscal 1970 for the employment of additional personnel in the National Highway Safety Bureau, has stressed the importance of giving greater budgetary emphasis to our traffic safety program. In addition, through the other amendments to the original act incorporated in this bill, the committee has attempted to strengthen the Department of Transportation's enforcement capability, to take the first steps toward providing the Department with an independent and substantial motor vehicle research capability, and to eliminate disparities and close gaps which exist in the act's present provisions.

PROVISIONS

There follows a section-by-section summary of the provisions of H.R. 10105 and a discussion of the committee's interpretation of these various provisions and the need for them where appropriate.

Section 1.—Section 1 of the bill would authorize the appropriation to the Department of Transportation of $23 million for fiscal year 1970, and $40 million for fiscal year 1971, for the implementation of the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966. In addition this section would provide that of the sums appropriated for fiscal year 1970, $2,800,000 shall be available only for the employment of additional personnel for service in the Highway Safety Bureau. It is the committee's understanding that this amount of money should be sufficient to hire 150 new employees.

The amendments incorporated in this section—rising the authorization for fiscal 1971 by $5 million, and earmarking $2,800,000 of the sums appropriated during fiscal 1970 for the employment of additional personnel—reflect the committee's deep concern that the critical motor vehicle safety program has been receiving inadequate priority in both past and present budget proposals. The committee cites the following examples for consideration by the Appropriations Committee as indications of the urgent need for additional funding and personnel for the National Highway Safety Bureau:

1. Since the initial new vehicle safety standards were issued in 1967 there has been only one major new car safety standard issued each year during 1968 and 1969.

2. The uniform tire quality grading system required under title II of the act to be established by September 9, 1968, is still at least 1 year away from completion.

3. The experimental safety car program authorized under section 106 of the act is limping along with only two professional employees. The first vehicle is still at least 2 years away from competion.

4. Only one professional employee is presently assigned to develop used motor vehicle safety standards. No used car standards have been issued to date, even though the act specifies that the initial standards were to be issued prior to last June.

5. Only nine engineers are monitoring the entire defect notification program in which 14 million vehicle owners have been notified of safety related defects over the past 3 years. There are over 50 pending investigations of vehicles which may contain safety related defects or failures to comply with the safety standards.

6. Only one professional employee is assigned full-time to school bus safety programs.

7. Only one professional employee is assigned to the field testing of the highly promising air-bag restraint system.

These examples are not exhaustive. They are merely indicative of the disturbing lack of emphasis that has been given to a program that could undoubtedly return a spectacular payoff in the saving of lives, the reduction of injuries, and the lessening of property damage. The committee amendments in section 1, while modest, indicate its conviction that stronger steps must be taken to reverse the highway death trend. Now programs must be started and present programs accelerated. This can occur only if additional funds are appropriated and additional personnel are hired as quickly as possible.

Unlike the House, the committee has limited the authorization contained in section 1 to a 2-year period. Since the administration had requested a 2-year authorization and had no budget projections for fiscal 1972, and since the committee believed that it would be valuable to review again the operation and effectiveness of the safety program within the next 2 years, it deleted the provision in the House passed bill which would authorize the appropriation of $35 million for fiscal 1972.

Section 2.—Section 2 of the bill would amend the definition of "motor vehicle equipment" which is presently contained in section 102(4) of the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966 in order to enable the Secretary of Transportation to set minimum safety standards for the manufacture of any device, article, or apparel not a system, part, or component of a motor vehicle (other than medicines, or eyeglasses prescribed by a physician or other duly licensed practitioner) which is manufactured, sold, delivered, offered, or intended for use wholly or in part to safeguard motor vehicles, drivers, passengers, and other highway users from risk of accident, injury, or death.

Both the present and prior administrations had requested a broad definition of the term "motor vehicle equipment" which is comparable to that which is contained in this bill. The House narrowed the proposed expansion of the definition, however, so that it would be extended to additionally cover only motorcycle helmets, in part because the Department of Transportation had not indicated any intention to set standards for other types of motor vehicle equipment. Since then, however, the Department has indicated that it would prefer the broader language so that it can subsequently set standards for other types of equipment such as motorcycle goggles, tire repair equipment vehicle safety testing equipment, and tire inflation equipment if the establishment of such standards should prove necessary. The committee agreed that it would be desirable to delegate the broader authority to the Secretary so that he can move quickly to set standards as the need is demonstrated without further resort to legislative action for each item, but in so doing, it specifically excluded medicines and eyeglasses prescribed by a physician or other duly licensed practitioner from the definition in order to make sure that this expanded language would not be construed too broadly.

Although section 103 of the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act requires the Secretary to establish appropriate Federal motor vehicle safety standards, the committee would emphasize that the decision to set a minimum safety standard for the manufacture of any particular item of motor vehicle equipment is discretionary. It would not expect the Secretary to set minimum safety standards for any of the items of motor vehicle equipment mentioned in this report, for example, unless he is satisfied that a need for such minimum standards actually exists.

Section 3.—Subsection 112(d) of the present law authorizes the Secretary of Transportation to require a manufacturer of motor vehicles or motor vehicle equipment to give to the first purchaser who buys a new motor vehicle or item of motor vehicle equipment for his own use such performance and technical data as the Secretary determines is necessary to carry out the purposes of the act. The House, recognizing the importance of giving similar technical and performance data to prospective purchasers of motor vehicles or items of motor vehicle equipment so that such persons may make rational and informed purchasing decisions, amended this section to make clear that the Secretary of Transportation has the authority to require that this data also be given to prospective purchasers.

Because certain manufacturers feared, however, that the broad House language might be read to require a detailed statement of this information in their print and broadcast advertising, the committee amended this section to provide for notification to prospective purchasers at each location where a manufacturer's vehicles or items of motor vehicle equipment are offered for sale by a person with whom such manufacturer has a contractual, proprietary, or other legal relationship. The committee further indicated that this notification could include printed matter which would be available for retention by the prospective purchaser or sent by mail to him upon his request. As in the House version, the committee retained the notification requirement for the first purchaser, but it limited the manner of notification to printed matter placed in the motor vehicle or attached to or accompanying the item of motor vehicle equipment. The committee envisions, of course, that under the general rulemaking authority contained in section 119 of the act, the Secretary will issue regulations to clarify further the nature of the manufacturer's responsibility under this subsection.

In making these amendments, the committee intends that the manufacturer need have available at the location where its motor vehicles or items of motor vehicle equipment are being sold, only the performance and technical data which relate to the particular products which are being sold, advertised, or otherwise promoted or offered for sale at that location. It would also point out that although the requirement that printed matter be furnished is optional with the Secretary, if it is required, it should be both available at the dealership for retention by the prospective purchaser or sent by mail to such person upon his request. The committee intends, however, that if an individual actually appears at a dealer's showroom, since the technical and performance data will be available to him there, it need not also be sent to that prospective purchaser, even if he specifically requests that it be mailed.

The mail requirement was included principally to cover the situation, particularly common in certain rural areas, where a person does his initial shopping for a new motor vehicle without actually going to a dealership. If he requests a manufacturer or dealer to furnish technical and performance data on certain motor vehicles or items of motor vehicle equipment which he is considering buying, the manufacturer would be responsible for seeing that it was mailed to him. The committee does not anticipate that this mail requirement will impose any significant burden on either the manufacturer or the dealer, but it would hope that an equitable arrangement for bearing this cost could be worked out between the parties.

Section 4.—Section 4 of the bill would make two basic changes in the defect notification section (section 113) of the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966. First, it would amend that section in order to require manufacturers of tires to provide notification to persons who have purchased tires which the manufacturer determines contain a safety related defect. In addition, by requiring the manufacturer to keep more detailed records of the names and addresses of tire purchasers, it will improve the effectiveness of a recall campaign whenever the manufacturer or the Secretary of Transportation determine that certain tires contain a safety related defect or fail to comply with applicable motor vehicle safety standards. These changes are accomplished by the amendments made by subsections 4(a) and 4(c) and by the addition of the new subsections 113(f) and 113(h) to the act which are contained in subsection 4(d) of the bill.

Second, section 4 would provide that whenever a defect notification is required to be furnished because of a failure to comply with an applicable motor vehicle safety standard or because of a defect which relates to motor vehicle safety, the manufacturer of each motor vehicle (including any item of original motor vehicle equipment) or each other item of motor vehicle equipment presented for remedy pursuant to such notice, shall cause such failure or defect to be remedied without charge. This change is accomplished by the amendment in subsection 4(b) and by the addition of a new subsection 113(g) to the act which is contained in subsection 4(d).

Under subsection 113(a) of the present law, the manufacturer of a motor vehicle is required to notify new vehicle purchasers of any safety related defect it discovers in the vehicle, including any defect in an item of original motor vehicle equipment—a term which includes original equipment tires.

However, the act imposes no parallel obligation on the tire manufacturer to notify tire purchasers of defects it discovers in its own products which it sells directly to the public. Subsection 4(a) would therefore amend subsection 113(a) of the traffic safety act to impose a duty on tire manufacturers to notify purchasers of any tires which they discover contain a defect which relates to motor vehicle safety.

This is an extremely significant amendment to the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act, for by far the largest proportion of tires manufactured in the United States are sold by the tire companies as replacements to the original ones supplied with the vehicle. Last year more than 225 million motor vehicle tires were produced but less than 58 million of these were delivered as original equipment. Obviously this amendment will close a serious gap in the safety protection afforded by the present act.

Under subsection 113(e) of the present act, if the Secretary of Transportation determines that a motor vehicle or an item of motor vehicle equipment fails to comply with applicable motor vehicle safety standards or contains a defect which relates to motor vehicle safety, he can require the manufacturer of such motor vehicle or item of motor vehicle equipment to notify purchasers of the failure or defect. Particularly in the case of tires, however, notification of purchasers has been difficult to effectuate because of the failure of manufacturers to maintain complete records of the names and addresses of their purchasers. As a result this bill would add a new subsection (f) to section 113 which would require the manufacturers of motor vehicles or tires to maintain records of the names and addresses of the first purchaser (other than a dealer or distributor) of motor vehicles or tires produced by that manufacturer. This requirement should facilitate the prompt notification of purchasers after a defect or failure is discovered under either the amended subsection 113(a) or subsection 113(e).

The committee has retained the provision, included in the House bill, which states that when a tire is marketed under a brand name not owned by the manufacturer of the tire, the brand-name owner shall maintain the records required by the new subsection. The committee intends, however, that this language should not be interpreted to preclude a brand-name owner, if he so desires, from contracting or otherwise arranging with the manufacturer to keep the records (without shifting the legal responsibility). Since the manufacturer will be required to establish a recordkeeping system for its own tires, private-brand customers may want to utilize, or at least tie in with, the manufacturer's recordkeeping system. This would be especially true for the smaller brand-name owners who may not have the necessary facilities for adequate recordkeeping. However, whether large or small, there is a possibility of significant economies in per-unit record cost if the manufacturer could utilize his system for keeping private-brand customers' records, as long as both parties so agree. In addition, it is the understanding of the committee that in establishing recordkeeping procedures, the Secretary is not bound to adopt a single set of procedures that would be uniformly applicable to all manufacturers, large or small.

Instead, the committee intends that he may use his discretion to permit different procedures if he is satisfied that such procedures will assure the establishment of effective recall systems. This understanding could avoid unnecessary hardship and expense for companies with small sales volume.

The one change which the committee has made in the proposed subsection 113(f) is to include a provision which would authorize the Secretary to establish procedures to be followed by distributors and dealers to assist the manufacturers in securing the information required by the subsection, as long as these procedures do not affect the basic obligation of the manufacturer to keep the records. Tire manufacturers have stated that with a specific congressional directive to the tire dealers and distributors to assist in the recordkeeping, they are more likely to secure effective cooperation. The committee is eager to secure this cooperation and has agreed to include this directive with the understanding that it should not obscure in any way the fact that the fundamental obligation to maintain the records will remain with the manufacturer.

The committee recognizes that it would be practically impossible for the Secretary of Transportation to police the many thousands of motor vehicle or tire dealers and distributors in the United States in order to secure compliance with a recordkeeping requirement. As a result, it does not wish to dilute the legal obligation which the House bill would place on the manufacturer. If the penalties for failure to keep adequate records are assessed against the manufacturer, he will have an incentive to make sure the dealers provide the necessary information. Should the expression of congressional desire for dealer cooperation prove inadequate, then specific terms in the contract between the manufacturer and dealer may be necessary. But regardless of the method used to secure cooperation, the result should be that records will be well kept. Thus in a recall campaign the manufacturer will be more likely to remove successfully a large percentage of the defective or noncomplying vehicles or tires from the highway.

The second basic change in the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act incorporated in section 4 of the bill—and this is a change in the House-passed measure as well—would provide that whenever a notification is required to be furnished because of a determination under subsection 113(a) or (e) that a motor vehicle (including any item of original motor vehicle equipment) or an item of motor vehicle equipment (a term which includes tires) contained a defect which relates to motor vehicle safety or a failure to comply with applicable motor vehicle safety standards, the manufacturer of each such motor vehicle (including any item of original motor vehicle equipment) or each such other item of motor vehicle equipment presented for remedy pursuant to such notice shall cause such failure or defect to be remedied without charge.

The committee has no doubt that the present defect notification provisions in the law have been of great value. During the first 3 years since the law was enacted in September 1966, the four major domestic manufacturers of motor vehicles have provided notification of safety related defects to the owners of over 12 million vehicles in some 375 safety defect campaigns. In contrast, in the 5½ years from the start of the 1960 model year in September 1959, through May of 1966, the four major American companies conducted some 425 recall campaigns involving approximately 9 million vehicles, and these figures include many recalls which were not directly safety related. Thus, since the enactment of the safety legislation just 3 years ago, the average annual number of "Big Four" vehicles involved in safety defect notification campaigns increased about 250 percent over the average number involved in safety and non-safety campaigns during the 5½ years prior to enactment. In total, since enactment of the act, some 14 million vehicles have been subject to safety defect notification. Unquestionably, this provision of the law has provided substantial benefit to the American consumer in alerting him to safety problems in vehicles on the highway.

In most past instances the defect notification has been accompanied by a recall of the vehicle or item of motor vehicle equipment for correction without expense to the owner. Unfortunately, however, there have been some occasions where this has not been the case. Moreover, in instances where there has been a disagreement between the manufacturer and the Secretary under subsection 113(e) of the act over the existence of a safety related defect, a difficult situation has been created. Under the present section 113, the Secretary can only direct the manufacturer to send letters to the vehicle or vehicle equipment purchasers notifying them of the defect. He cannot require the manufacturer to remedy the defect without charge. But as the National Highway Safety Bureau has learned from experience, unless notification of the safety related defect is accompanied by an offer to correct the defect without expense to the owner, the response to a recall campaign falls off dramatically. As a result the Secretary could be placed in an awkward position. In some instances he might be forced to settle for much less than the full recall campaign which he believes safety considerations should demand in order to secure the manufacturer's agreement to remedy without charge the most seriously defective vehicles or equipment. Otherwise he could not be sure that the most dangerous vehicles or items of equipment would be removed from the road immediately.

It was because of considerations such as these that the committee adopted the amendment which would add a new subsection (g) to section 113 to set forth the manufacturer's obligation to remedy safety related defects or failures to comply with applicable motor vehicle safety standards without charge. The committee, of course, intends that this obligation to remedy a defect or noncompliance extends not only to the complete cost of providing a replacement part, but includes the cost of any labor required to repair the defect or failure or to install the replacement part.

The automotive manufacturers, pointing out that the expenditure of significant sums of money could flow from a secretarial determination requiring a recall campaign, suggested that they should receive additional protection to make sure that the Secretary does not make his determinations under subsection 113(e) casually or arbitrarily. They suggested that that section should be amended so that the Secretary's recall determination would be based upon substantial evidence. The committee considered the suggestion, but found it unnecessary. As pointed out in a letter dated November 11, 1969, from the Chief Counsel of the Federal Highway Administration, a copy of which appears as appendix B of this report, the Secretary's recall determinations are not self-executing. Enforcement can only be compelled by judicial proceedings in which a manufacturer is free to challenge the validity of the Secretary's determination.

Moreover, such proceedings will be tried de novo in the district courts, and subsection 10(e) of the Administrative Procedure Act expressly provides that the court, in such a trial de novo, may set aside administrative determinations where it finds them to be unwarranted by the facts (5 U.S.C. 706). In view of the safeguards against arbitrary or unreasonable determinations by the Secretary which are not factually supported, the committee did not find it necessary to amend the procedures established in subsection 113(e).

The manufacturers also expressed concern over the possible economic cost which might be involved under the new subsection 113(g) if all cases of noncompliance with applicable motor vehicle standards were to be remedied without charge. However, it is not intended that every instance of failure to comply with safety standards will require a recall campaign and remedy by the manufacturer. As

Under Secretary Beggs advised the committee in a letter dated November 3, 1969, a copy of which appears as appendix A of this report, the Department, under the provisions of existing law, "does not require the sending of notification letters for inconsequential violations of safety standards which do not substantially affect motor vehicle safety. To do so would not be reasonable administration of the act."

This policy will continue under the provisions of the new subsection which expressly provides that the Secretary may, upon publication of his reasons for such findings, exempt manufacturers from the compulsory remedy provision when the manufacturers can establish to the Secretary's satisfaction that a failure to comply with a standard is of such an inconsequential nature that the purposes of the act and the public interest would not be served by requiring the manufacturer to remedy the noncompliance. Examples of the kinds of noncompliance which the Secretary might exempt under this provision include such things as the failure of a label to comply with size and type of print requirements or the failure to meet other requirements which do not affect strength or utility (such as a requirement that seat belts be resistant to strain. Slight shortfalls in meeting strength, load, and other performance requirements may be more difficult to deal with, but the committee would expect the Secretary to exercise his judgment in considering whether the failure to comply was not significant enough to require remedy. It would expect the Secretary to take into account the danger to the public which would exist if the noncompliance were not remedied and also the cost to the manufacturer of providing a remedy. The committee would also stress, however, that although this provision may be invoked to save the manufacturer from incurring the expense of an extensive recall campaign for an inconsequential violation of a standard, it is not intended to have any bearing on a manufacturers possible liability in a private damage suit where the failure to comply with a standard is at issue.

The committee would anticipate that to clarify a manufacturer's responsibilities under this section, the Secretary would utilize the general rulemaking authority provided in section 119 of the act. For example, it might be necessary for the Secretary to adopt regulations to spell out that a vehicle or vehicle equipment owner would not have to present his motor vehicle or item or motor vehicle equipment for remedy under the new subsection (g) at a distant or unreasonable location.

In view of the addition of the new subsection (g) to section 113, the committee also made some conforming amendments in subsection 113(c) which deals with the form of the manufacturer's notification. These changes appear in subsection 4(b) of the bill. The amendments include a reference to subsection 113(e) and a mention that notification may refer to a failure to comply with a standard—both of which were inadvertently omitted in the original act—and also include a requirement that the notification refer to the commitment of the manufacturer to remedy the failure or defect without charge.

Subsection 4(e) of the bill provides that the amendment which the bill makes to subsection 113(d) of the act—adding a requirement that the manufacturers of tires must file copies of their defect notification letters with the Secretary of Transportation—will become effective immediately. It further provides that the other amendments to section 113 made by this section of the bill will become effective 180 days after enactment, unless the Secretary of Transportation finds, for good cause shown, that a later effective date, not more than 1 year after the date of enactment of this act, is in the public interest and publishes his reasons for such finding. In the interim, however, the committee expects that manufacturers of motor vehicles and motor vehicle equipment will continue to voluntarily remedy without charge any motor vehicle or item of motor vehicle equipment which is determined to contain a safety related defect or failure to comply with a standard. And the committee of course anticipates that once the remedy without charge provision becomes effective, it will apply in all recall campaigns, regardless of the date of manufacture of the vehicles or vehicle equipment which is involved.

Section 5.—The existing subsection 120(a) of the act requires the Secretary of Transportation to submit an annual report to the Congress concerning his administration of the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act. He also is required to submit an annual report concerning his administration of the Highway Safety Act. The reporting requirements with respect to the Highway Safety Act, however, include notification to Congress in the report of any enforcement actions including judicial decisions, settlements, and pending litigation. The committee believes that a similar requirement should be applicable to the annual report concerning the administration of the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act, so it has included this amendment in section 5 of the bill.

When the committee discussed H.R. 10105, it also considered an amendment which would authorize the Secretary of Transportation to examine, inspect, or temporarily impound motor vehicles which have been involved in motor vehicle accidents. It was argued that this authority would assist him in studying the behavior of various types of motor vehicles and items of motor vehicle equipment involved in motor vehicle accidents, in gathering information for the purpose of identifying design failures or defects in motor vehicles and motor vehicle equipment, and in collecting data to assist in the preparation of new and used car safety standards.

The committee decided that it would be premature to include such a provision in the bill at this time without greater discussion of its need and possible ramifications. The committee was disturbed, however, by reports that present research teams, operating under contract with the National Highway Safety Bureau, are sometimes finding it difficult to obtain data on vehicle accidents because of their inability to get permission to inspect the vehicle or because of the refusal of drivers to answer questions relating to the accident. As a result the committee resolved to urge the States to do their utmost to cooperate with the Department of Transportation in developing statistical data and information about automobile accidents. In addition, the committee requests the Secretary of Transportation to include in his annual report to Congress a description of any difficulties the Department has had in investigating motor vehicle accidents, as well as his recommendations for any legislation in this area which would help the Department to carry out its responsibilities fully.

Section 6.—Section 6 of the bill amends title II of the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966 by adding a new section 206 which would require the Secretary of Transportation, not later than 1 year after the date of enactment of this bill, to establish safety standards setting limits on the age of tire carcasses which can be retreaded. This section further directs the Secretary, in setting such standards, to establish varying age limits for carcasses which can be retreaded, based on the extent to which the carcass was designed and constructed to be retreaded, the rate of deterioration of the materials in the tire, and such other factors as he determines are necessary to carry out the purposes of the act.

Section 7.—Section 7 of the bill would amend title III of the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act by adding two new sections at the end of the present title. The first, section 304, would authorize the Secretary of Transportation to plan, design, construct, and operate facilities suitable for conducting testing of motor vehicles and items of motor vehicle equipment (a term which includes tires) in order to determine whether such motor vehicles and items of motor vehicle equipment are in compliance with applicable motor vehicle safety standards or contain defects which relate to motor vehicle safety. The new subsection 305(b) would authorize the appropriation of $8,200,000, to remain available until expended, for the design and construction of the compliance test facility and the purchase of testing equipment. It would also authorize the appropriation of $3,500,000 for fiscal 1971 and 1972 for the operation of the compliance facility, but it specifies that not more than $1,500,000 of the sums authorized in either year is to be available for the purchase of motor vehicles or items of motor vehicle equipment for testing purposes.

The new subsection 305(a) would authorize the appropriation of $10 million, to remain available until expended, for planning and design of traffic safety (including but not limited to motor vehicle and highway safety) research and test facilities, including engineering studies and site surveys.

One of the keys to a successful motor vehicle safety program is an adequate compliance testing program. Without such testing, there can not be vigorous prosecution of failures to meet the minimum safety standards which are established in the act. And without adequate enforcement, there will not be the same incentive to make certain that a motor vehicle or item of motor vehicle equipment exceeds the minimum safety standards. Failure to provide an adequate compliance program would materially weaken the protection afforded by the act.

Thus far, in the absence of its own compliance testing facilities, the Department of Transportation has been contracting with testing laboratories throughout the country to conduct its compliance tests. In fiscal year 1968 the Congress appropriated $1,200,000 for this aspect of the safety program. With these funds the Department was able to purchase only 73 vehicles and 6,043 pieces of equipment to be tested against only 13 of the 22 standards effective in 1968. This number is an insignificant sample of the 10 million vehicles sold each year in some 500 different make/model combinations. Yet despite the small size of this random sample, the Department found an average failure rate for vehicles of 11.5 percent and for equipment of 10 percent. The failures covered such critical safety areas as hydraulic service and parking brakes—14 percent; tires and rims—12 percent; seat belt assembly anchorages—11 percent; and fuel tanks—29 percent.

Because the Department does not itself conduct the compliance testing, it cannot automatically act on the test results. After the test reports from the testing contractors are received by the Department, the failure cases are thoroughly analyzed to determine, whether a detailed investigation should be made of the problems. In the absence of error by the contractor, an investigation is initiated for each failure. In some cases this involves conducting one or more additional tests to confirm the original failure. But because staffing levels are inadequate to handle the investigative work and the subsequent followthrough with the manufacturers, many of the 1968 investigations are still in progress. By the time they are completed, the vehicles under investigation will have been on the highway for more than 2 years.

The Department's fiscal year 1969 test program is now in progress. Although the appropriation was the same as in 1968, in order to continue the investigations which are required because of the many failures found during the 1968 program, it has been necessary to use some fiscal 1969 money. This has left enough for the purchase and testing of only 20 vehicles and 7,500 pieces of equipment during 1969.

In commenting on the compliance testing program in testimony before the committee, a Department representative stated:

"Based upon the experience to date, the Bureau fully recognizes that it has as yet hardly scratched the surface of what an adequate compliance program should entail in an effective regulatory program. The fact that significant numbers of potential noncompliance indications have already emerged with this extremely modest effort only serves to emphasize that additional resources will be required in future years if a Federal enforcement program of more adequate scope and depth is to be achieved. Especially serious, is the lack of [a] Government facility where tests can be conducted to insure compliance with safety standards. Without a Government facility, the Bureau * * * has no recourse other than to continue to utilize independent testing laboratories. Apart from the fact that even these laboratories in some cases have to use makeshift arrangements to conduct many of the corroborative tests, the more serious situation is that to stay in business they have other clients in addition to the Federal Government.

"The testing conducted by these laboratories for the Government has been largely satisfactory to date, but the possibilities of at least appearance of conflict of interest must be recognized as long as these firms are also conducting standards testing for industrial clients. Therefore, the importance of a Government-owned or at least a fully Government controlled compliance facility cannot be overstated; such a facility must be provided as soon as possible for the Bureau to meet its regulatory responsibilities properly."

The committee agrees that immediate action should be taken by the Department to design and construct its own compliance facility and to conduct a more intensive compliance program. Since the Department has not been able to request an appropriation for this purpose as part of its regular fiscal 1970 budget. However, due to the late date of this authorization, the committee hopes the Department will submit a supplemental request for funds which could be expended this year in order to expedite the completion of the facility.

Section 7 of the bill also contains the authorization of $10 million for planning and design of traffic safety research and test facilities, including engineering studies and site surveys. It should be noted that the authorizing language contains a parenthetical clause indicating that the facility is to be used for traffic safety purposes which include but is not limited to motor vehicle and highway safety. This clause is in the bill to clearly indicate that while the primary purpose of the facility is to conduct research and testing in motor vehicle and highway safety, the committee anticipates that other closely related safety work might also be carried out, particularly work which relates to the programs of other modal elements in the Department of Transportation.

The committee views the research and test facility as being of particular importance if the Department of Transportation is to acquire the technical expertise to enable it to develop increasingly complex engineering, technical, and behavioral data on which to base future vehicle and highway safety performance standards and to develop other programs designed to reduce highway deaths and injuries. The committee recognized the importance of this research capability when it first reported the motor vehicle safety legislation to the Senate over 3 years ago. In its report, the committee stated:

"The Federal Government must develop a major independent technical capacity sufficient to perform comprehensive basic research on accident and injury prevention, adequate to test and contribute to the quality of the industry's safety performance; a technical capacity capable of initiating innovation in safety design and engineering and of serving as a yardstick against which the performance of private industry can be measured; and, finally, a technical capacity capable of developing and implementing meaningful standards for automotive safety."

The committee hopes that now that the Department has conducted a detailed study and submitted an extensive report justifying construction of this facility, initial planning and design can commence. The need is even greater today, than it was 3 years ago.

Under the plans recently submitted to the committee by the Department, a copy of which appears as appendix C to this report, the research facility will consist of seven different units: a driving simulation laboratory to measure operator response to a variety of different highway situations; a vehicle and highway safety proving ground to test the behavior of vehicles in various types of driving and crash situations and to experiment with new types of vehicle and highway designs; a bioengineering laboratory to conduct tests on the physiological damage to vehicular occupants and pedestrians resulting from deceleration, collision, second collision, and overturning; an applied research laboratory to conduct testing associated with the improvement and updating of design standards for highways, traffic control devices, and other features of the highway environment; a human performance laboratory to increase understanding of human capabilities, behavior, and attitudes as they relate to the driving environment; a vehicle performance laboratory to develop procedures for testing and evaluating vehicles; and an injury research/treatment facility to generate improvements in the speed and adequacy of the post-accident response of emergency personnel.

The authorization for the research and test facility contained in section 7 differs from the House-passed bill which authorized the Secretary to plan, design and construct research, development and compliance testing facilities, but provided that no appropriation should be made for any such work in excess of $100,000 unless it had been approved in substantially equivalent resolutions adopted by the House and Senate Commerce and Public Works Committees.

The committee carefully considered the procedure set forth in the House bill, but it felt that agreement by the four different committees on specific construction plans within any 2-year period would be extremely unlikely. The result could be a serious relay in the planning and construction of the research and test facility which the committee views as essential to the future of the traffic safety program. As a result it decided to authorize the full $10 million requested in the budgets for fiscal 1970 submitted by both the present and prior administrations.

Because the amendments to title III made by this bill would include authorization for a compliance test facility, subsection 7(b) would amend the title of title III to read "title III—Research and Compliance Testing Facilities." Moreover, the committee did not delete the present sections 301–303 of title III from the act, as the House-passed bill would do, because it understands that these sections have not yet been fully implemented. Section 301, for example, authorizes the Secretary to study the need for a facility to conduct research, development, and testing relating to the safety of machinery used on highways or in connection with the maintenance of highways (with particular emphasis on tractor safety). To the committee's knowledge, this study has not yet been conducted, and since the report on that study has therefore not been filed either, it is necessary to retain the report requirement presently contained in section 302. Finally, the committee has preserved the authorization contained in section 303, for it understands that the full sums authorized under that section have not yet been expended.

Section 8.—Section 8 of the bill would authorize the Secretary of Transportation to conduct a study and submit to the Congress, not later than January 1, 1971, a report on the extent, causes and means of prevention of agricultural tractor accidents on both public roads and farms. This section further directs the Secretary to make such legislative proposals as he determines are needed, and it specifically directs him to give careful consideration to the advisability of establishing uniform Federal safety standards for the design and manufacture of all agricultural tractors sold in interstate commerce.

Over the past 8 years, more than 1,000 persons have died annually in farm tractor accidents and over five times this number are injured. Because of this surprisingly high rate of death and injury the committee agreed with the House that it would be desirable to authorize a study of tractor accidents in order to determine whether there were feasible methods of improving the safety characteristics of tractors. The committee would suggest, however, that the Secretary couple this tractor study with the study of the safety of tractors and other highway maintenance machinery which is required under section 301 of the act.

The committee has made two substantive amendments in the House language authorizing the tractor study. First, it has extended the report date from April 1, 1970, to January 1, 1971. In view of the late date at which this bill may finally be enacted, the committee decided that April 1 was an unreasonably early date for completion of the study. Since a report submitted after only 3 to 4 months study would be subject to criticism on the grounds that it is based on insufficient research, and since it is unlikely that any recommendations would be acted upon before the 92d Congress, the committee decided that a January 1, 1971, report date would be more reasonable.

In addition, the committee believed that it would be useful to draw more heavily upon the expertise of the Department of Agriculture in the preparation of the report. As a result, in the second substantive change to section 8, it has amended subsection 8(c) to require that the Secretary of Agriculture transmit his findings and recommendations with respect to the tractor study to the Secretary of Transportation by June 30, 1970. These findings and recommendations are then to be considered by the Secretary of Transportation and incorporated, where appropriate, in his report to Congress. The committee would also hope, however, that these findings and recommendations in their entirety would be transmitted as an appendix to the Secretary's report, so that the Congress would have the full benefit of the Department of Agriculture's thinking when reviewing this study.

The committee also understands that several other agencies, such as the Department of Health, Education and Welfare's injury control program, may have valuable data or information concerning agricultural tractor operations and accidents. The committee expects that these agencies will cooperate fully with both the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Transportation in developing the data on which the tractor study report is to be based.

In deliberating over H.R. 10105, the committee also considered adopting an amendment to the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act which would prohibit the tampering with motor vehicle odometers and which would require the Secretary of Transportation to develop standards for odometers which, so far as is practicable, are tamperproof. The committee recognized that resetting a vehicle's odometer so as to understate the number of miles it has traveled is a common practice among certain persons who desire to deceive car buyers with respect to the age and condition of a vehicle which is being offered for sale. It agreed that strong action should be taken to prevent this deceptive practice, but it expressed the belief that enforcement might better be handled on the State level.

As a result the committee would encourage the States to adopt legislation to prohibit tampering with motor vehicle odometers. In addition, it would suggest that the States consider including in their certificates of title for motor vehicles, or on any other evidence of vehicle ownership which is required by State law, a blank space where the vehicle's mileage can be recorded at the time of a transfer of ownership. The committee believes that such an arrangement could greatly facilitate effective enforcement of an antitampering statute by enabling law enforcement officers to verify the discrepancies between a vehicle's mileage and actual condition merely by examining the vehicle's title history at the State registry of motor vehicles. The committee would also encourage the Secretary of Transportation, under the general standard setting authority contained in section 103 of the act, to develop standards for odometers which, so far as is practicable, are tamperproof. Should these recommendations be implemented, the committee believes that there would be a significant reduction in the frequency with which used car buyers are deceived over the condition of motor vehicles which are being offered for sale.

COSTS

The bill would authorize the appropriation to the Department of Transportation of $23 million in fiscal 1970, and $40 million in fiscal 1971, for the implementation of the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966. In addition, it would authorize the appropriation to the Department of $10 million, to remain available until expended, for the planning and design of traffic safety research and test facilities, and $8,200,000, to remain available until expended for planning, design, and construction of a compliance test facility. The bill would also authorize the appropriation of $3,500,000 in both fiscal 1971 and fiscal 1972, for the operation of the compliance test facility and the purchase of motor vehicles and items of motor vehicle equipment for testing purposes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be considered en bloc.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendments are considered and agreed to en bloc.

The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill (H.R. 10105) was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended, so as to read: "An act to amend the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966, to authorize appropriations for fiscal years 1970 and 1971, and for other purposes."

NATIONAL CAPITAL TRANSPORTATION ACT OF 1969

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on S. 2185.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2185) to authorize a Federal contribution for the effectuation of a transit development program for the National Capital region, and to further the objectives of the National Capital Transportation Act of 1965 (79 Stat. 663) and Public Law 89-774 (80 Stat. 1324) which was to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. That this Act may be cited as the "National Capital Transportation Act of 1969".

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this Act—

(1) The term "Adopted Regional System" means that system described in the Transit Authority's report entitled "Adopted Regional Rapid Rail Transit Plan and Program, March 1, 1968 (revised February 7, 1969)", as that system may hereafter be altered, revised, or amended in accordance with the Compact.

(2) The term "Compact" means the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority Compact (Public Law 89-774; 80 Stat. 1324).

(3) The term "Transit Authority" means the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority established under article III of the Compact.

AUTHORIZATION OF FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS

SEC. 3. (a) To provide the Federal share of the cost of the Adopted Regional System, which system supersedes that heretofor authorized by the Congress in the National Capital Transportation Act of 1965 (Public Law 89-173; 79 Stat. 663), the Secretary of Transportation is authorized to make annual contributions to the Transit Authority in amounts sufficient to finance in part the cost of the Adopted Regional System; except that the aggregate amount of Federal contributions for the Adopted Regional System, including the $100,000,000 authorized to be appropriated by section 5(a)(1) of the National Capital Transportation Act of 1965, shall not exceed the lower amount of $1,147,-044,000 or two-thirds of the net project cost of the Adopted Regional System.

(b) Federal contributions for the Adopted Regional System shall be subject to the following limitations and conditions:

(1) The work for which contributions are authorized shall be subject to the provisions of the Compact and shall be carried out substantially in accordance with the plans and schedules for the Adopted Regional System.

(2) The aggregate amount of such Federal contributions on or prior to the last day of any given fiscal year shall be matched by the local participating governments by payment of the local share of capital contributions required for the period ending with the last day of such year in a total amount not less than 50 per centum of the amount of such Federal contributions.

(c) There is authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of Transportation, without fiscal year limitation, not to exceed $1,047,-044,000 to carry out the purposes of this section. The appropriations authorized by this subsection shall be in addition to the appropriations authorized by section 5(a)(1) of the National Capital Transportation Act of 1965.

AUTHORIZATION OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CONTRIBUTIONS

SEC. 4. (a) To provide the District of Columbia share of the cost of the Adopted Regional System, the Commissioner of the District of Columbia is authorized to contract with the Transit Authority to make annual capital contributions aggregating not to exceed $216,500,000. To carry out the purposes of this section there is authorized to be appropriated out of the general fund of the District of Columbia, without fiscal year limitation, not to exceed $166,500,000.

(b) The last sentence of paragraph (3) of subsection (b) of the first section of the Act of June 6, 1958 (D.C. Code, sec. 9-220(b)(3)), is amended by striking out "$50,000,000 of the principal amount of the loans authorized to be made to the Commissioners under this subsection shall be utilized to carry out the purposes of the National Capital Transportation Act of 1965 (D.C. Code, secs. 1-1404, 1-1421-1-1426); and" and inserting in lieu thereof "$216,500,000 of the principal amount of the loans authorized to be made to the Commissioner under this subsection shall be utilized to make the contributions authorized by section 4 of the National Capital Transportation Act of 1969. To such extent, not exceeding $166,500,000, as may be necessary for this purpose, the District of Columbia may exceed the limitation on aggregate indebtedness established pursuant to this subsection."

(c) The appropriations authorized by subsection (a) of this section shall be in addition to the appropriations authorized on behalf of the District of Columbia by section 5(a)(2) of the National Capital Transportation Act of 1965.

(d) The Commissioner of the District of Columbia is further authorized to contract with the Transit Authority and to pay in accordance with the terms thereof for the service to be provided to the District of Columbia by the Adopted Regional System.

CONSTRUCTION APPROVALS

SEC. 5. (a) No portion of the Adopted Regional System shall be constructed within the United States Capitol Grounds except upon approval of the Commission for Extension of the United States Capitol.

(b) Construction of the Adopted Regional System in, or, under, or over public space in the District of Columbia under the jurisdiction of the Commissioner of the District of Columbia shall, in the interest of public convenience and safety, be performed in accordance with schedules agreed upon between the Transit Authority and the Commissioner, to the end that such construction work will be coordinated with other construction work in such public space; and the Commissioner shall so exercise his jurisdiction and control over such public space as to facilitate the Transit Authority's use and occupation thereof for construction of the Adopted Regional System.

REPAYMENT FROM EXCESS REVENUES

SEC. 6. To the extent that revenues or other receipts derived from or in connection with the ownership or operation of the Adopted Regional System (other than service payments under transit service agreements executed between the Transit Authority and local political subdivisions, the proceeds of bonds or other evidences of indebtedness issued by the Transit Authority and capital contributions received by the Transit Authority) are excess to the amounts necessary to make all payments, including debt service, operating and maintenance expenses, and deposits in reserves required or permitted by the terms of any contract of the Transit Authority with or for the benefit of holders of its bonds, notes, or other evidences of indebtedness issued for any purpose relating to the Adopted Regional System, other than extensions thereof, two-thirds of such excess revenues shall, at the end of each fiscal year, beginning with the fiscal year in which the Adopted Regional System (exclusive of extensions) is first put into substantially full revenue service, be paid into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

STUDY OF DULLES AIRPORT EXTENSION

SEC. 7. (a) The Secretary of Transportation is authorized to contract with the Transit

Authority for a comprehensive study of the feasibility, including preliminary engineering, of extending a transit line in the median of the Dulles Airport Road from the vicinity of Virginia Route 7 on the I–66 Route of the Adopted Regional System to the Dulles International Airport.

(b) The study to be undertaken pursuant to subsection (a) of this section shall be completed within six months after execution of the contract authorized therein at a cost not in excess of $150,000; and there is authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $150,000 to carry out the purposes of this section.

REPEAL AND AMENDMENT OF EXISTING LAWS

SEC. 8. (a) The following provisions of law are repealed:

(1) The National Capital Transportation Act of 1960 (Public Law 86–669; 74 Stat. 537).

(2) Sections 3 and 4 of the National Capital Transportation Act of 1965 (Public Law 89–173; 79 Stat. 664–665).

(b) Section 5(a) of the National Capital Transportation Act of 1965 is amended by striking out "authorized in section 3 hereof" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "of the Adopted Regional System (as defined in section 2(1) of the National Capital Transportation Act of 1969)".

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Montana.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, with the passage of S. 2185 today, the Senate has given final congressional authorization for the long delayed, urgently needed 98-mile rapid mass transit system for the Washington metropolitan area.

Congressional action on this bill has been prompt, efficient, and overwhelmingly favorable. President Nixon submitted the bill to Congress on May 16. The House and Senate District of Columbia Committees met in unusual joint session to conduct hearings on the bill on June 10 and 11. The Senate passed the bill July 8 without a single dissenting vote. The House took final action last Monday, approving the bill by a vote of 12 to 1, 285 to 23. Today, the Senate has cleared the bill for the President's signature.

While congressional action has been swift, we had no time to lose. The entire financial plan on which the transit system depends has been jeopardized by the passage of time and inflation. Three times in this decade Congress has enacted legislation to authorize this transit system. Actual construction has been delayed for 2 years, however, while the freeway controversy has been ironed out. During these delays, inflation has driven transit construction costs up at a rate of a quarter of a million dollars a day, eroding the transit financial plan to the peril point.

Now that the controversies and delays are past history, it is time to go full speed toward completion of the full 98-mile system at the earliest possible date.

The House of Representatives has voted to appropriate the full amounts necessary to move forward with the subway plan at the maximum speed economic and fiscal prudence dictate. I hope Congress can agree on this full level of appropriations so that the triumph of 10 years' effort will not slip away.

Further delay for the transit system spells financial disaster. The final congressional hurdle for the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit System is Senate action on the appropriations.

I urge my colleagues to continue their 10-year support of this vital transit program by supporting full appropriations this session.

AMERICAN TAXPAYERS PAID FILIPINO MERCENARIES

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, when we consider that billions of dollars of taxpayers' money have been spent since 1961 in maintaining an undeclared war in Vietnam, one begins sorrowfully and thoughtfully to wonder when and how we Americans can find the resources for needed projects in our own country. One wonders how we can raise the standard of living of our own people, provide adequate housing for millions of Americans undergoing privation in miserable slums, and end starvation in our country which should all along have had top priority.

Mr. President, 30 million of our neighbors, most of them women and children, are living below the poverty level. Little children in every State of our Union go to bed hungry every night. It is sad that in this the wealthiest country in the world, blessed by the Almighty with abundance, millions live in abject poverty, denied adequate schooling with many youngsters denied even the oportunity to attend school but for a few years or to obtain any job training to enable them to live like human beings should live in decency and with dignity.

Yet, during these years we have poured our resources by the billions of dollars into an undeclared war in Vietnam. Beyond all that, the cost of priceless lives of Americans serving in our Armed Forces has exceeded 50,000 with approximately 260,000 men wounded, many of them maimed for life. All this, by reason of President Johnson and now President Nixon yielding to the demands of the generals of our Joint Chiefs of Staff and the CIA. They have prevailed by their false statements and persuasive propaganda in causing first President Johnson and now President Nixon to maintain half a million fighting men at one time throughout these years in an undeclared, immoral, and unpopular war in Vietnam. They have involved us in a civil war in South Vietnam where we now support the Saigon government of militarists headed by 10 generals, nine of whom were born and reared in what has been termed North Vietnam since the Geneva Agreement of 1954.

President Thieu and Vice President Ky and seven of the eight other generals who govern in Saigon by force and violence all came from North Vietnam. Ky and others of the present leaders of the Saigon regime fought with the French against their own fellow countrymen seeking national liberation from 1946 to 1954 when the French sought to reestablish their lush Indochinese empire.

Now, Americans learn that President Ferdinand Marcos of the Philippine Republic having been safely reelected for a 4-year term has scornfully recalled from Vietnam the noncombat force of 1,500 Filipino engineers who were conveyed to Vietnam from the Philippines by American ships and planes. Now, even this token force is recalled.
